VYAS J. This is an application made by the petitioner Sham Kekhushru under art. 227 of the Constitution of India wherein the petitioner has prayed for the setting aside of the order made by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal on November 22, 1957.

This application raises an interesting point under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948. The point is: Has the Mamlatdar got jurisdiction under s. 10 of the Act to decide a tenant's application for the refund of the excess amount if any tendered by him to the landlord under s. 25(1) for obtaining relief against forfeiture? This point arises in the following circumstances:

The petitioner-landlord filed an application on October 11, 1954, for ejecting opponent No. 2, who was his tenant, from S. Nos. 285, 289, 290 and 297 of village Bakrol situated in the District of Baroda. The ejectment was sought by the landlord upon the ground that opponent No. 2 had committed three defaults in the payment of rent and the defaults alleged to have been committed by the tenant were in respect of the years 1951-52, 1952-53 and 1953-54. A notice terminating the tenancy of opponent No. 2 was duly given by the petitioner-landlord. On May 30, 1955, the Mamlatdar rejected the application of the landlord as he held that the defaults for the three years alleged by the landlord were not proved. From this order of the Mamlatdar the landlord appealed to the Prant Officer. The Prant Officer held that the three defaults in the payment of rent, which were alleged by the landlord, were established in this case and accordingly he allowed the appeal of the landlord and passed an order for ejectment against the tenant. This order was passed on August 18, 1955. It may be noted at this stage that the petitioner's case is that the contractual rent for the aforesaid lands which the tenant had agreed to pay to him was Rs. 501 per year. On the other hand, the case of opponent No. 2 is that the contractual rent was Rs. 325 per year. The Prant Officer who heard the appeal of the petitioner-landlord held that even on the assumption that the contractual rent was Rs. 325 per year, the defaults in the payment of rent for the years 1951-52, 1952-53 and 1953-54 had been established by the landlord. It was upon this finding which he arrived at that the Prant Officer passed an order directing the ejectment of the tenant from the lands of the petitioner. From the aforesaid order of the Prant Officer opponent No. 2 went in revision before the Revenue Tribunal. The Revenue Tribunal accepted the finding of the Prant Officer to the effect that the defaults alleged by the landlord were proved. It is to be noted, however, that when the matter was pending before the Tribunal, opponent No. 2 asked for relief against forfeiture. He agreed that the contractual rent for the survey numbers in question was Rs. 501 per year and he agreed to pay all the arrears of rent at that rate. On June 4, 1956, the Tribunal ordered that relief against forfeiture be granted to opponent No. 2 upon his paying the rent at the rate of Rs. 501 per year till the end of 1955-56. On June 12, 1956, opponent No. 2 paid the amount of Rs. 2,505, that is to say, all the arrears of rent up to date at the rate of Rs. 501 per year. Two days thereafter, on June 14, 1956, opponent No. 2 applied to the Mamlatdar under s. 12 of the Act, as it stood before amendment, for determination of the reasonable rent. To that application the petitioner-landlord filed his objections, wherein he contended that such an application was not tenable. Thereafter on October 25, 1956, opponent No. 2 filed another application, which was an application under s. 10 of the Act, claiming refund of a part of the amount tendered by him under s. 25(1) of the Act. It may be noted that the Amending Act came into force on August 1, 1956, with the result that upon that date the old s. 12 stood deleted from the statute book. On October 31, 1956, the Mamlatdar rejected both the applications which were made by opponent No. 2, viz., the application under s. 12 and also the application under s. 10 of the Act. The application under s. 12 was rejected upon the ground that with effect from August 1, 1956, s. 12 had been deleted from the statute book. The application under s. 10 of the Act was rejected by the Mamlatdar in view of the fact that opponent No. 2, consequent upon the Tribunal's order, had voluntarily paid up all the arrears of rent at the agreed rate of Rs. 501 per year. From the aforesaid order of the Mamlatdar dated October 31, 1956, rejecting both the applications of opponent No. 2, opponent No. 2 appealed to the Prant Officer. The Prant Officer dismissed the appeal on March 27, 1957. Thereupon opponent No. 2 went in revision before the Tribunal and by an order made on November 22, 1957, the Tribunal remanded the case to the Mamlatdar, directing the Mamlatdar to determine the reasonable rent for the survey numbers concerned under s. 12 of the Act as it stood before amendment and also to hear and decide the application of opponent No. 2 made by him under s. 10 of the Act. It is this order made by the Tribunal on November 22, 1957, which is challenged by the petitioner in this application.

Now, at the outset, the learned advocate Mr. Gokhale appearing for opponent No. 2 raised a preliminary objection to the maintainability of this application. Mr. Gokhale said that the Tribunal by its order of remand dated November 22, 1957, did not pass any final order. The rights of the parties were not affected by reason of that order. All that the Tribunal had done was to direct the Mamlatdar to determine the reasonable rent and to decide the application of opponent No. 2 made under s. 10 of the Act. Mr. Gokhale contended that unless the Mamlatdar had determined the reasonable rent and had decided the application of opponent No. 2 for refund under s. 10, no question would arise of the rights of the parties being affected and therefore the present application of the petitioner-landlord was not tenable.

We are unable to uphold Mr. Gokhale's preliminary objection. By the order of remand passed by the Tribunal the rights of the parties are affected, in that the Tribunal has laid down a principle which the Mamlatdar would follow. Upon the principle so laid down by the Tribunal the Mamlatdar would merely make arithmetical calculations, i.e., he would determine the rent under s. 12 as directed by the Tribunal, would deduct the amount of the said rent from the amount tendered by opponent No. 2 under s. 25(1) for obtaining relief against forfeiture and would direct refund of the balance by the landlord. The Prant Officer, upon the facts of the case, took the view that since opponent No. 2 had voluntarily tendered the amount under s. 25(1) of the Act to obtain relief against forfeiture, this could not be said to be a case of recovery of excess amount by the landlord and therefore no question could arise of opponent No. 2 legitimately claiming a refund. The Tribunal did not accept that view and held that merely because the agreed rent was tendered to the landlord under s. 25(1) it could not be said that "the landlord had not recovered the rent so as to bring him within the mischief of sec. 10". It is this principle laid down by the Tribunal by its remand order which affects the rights of the parties and which is challenged by the landlord by this petition. In these circumstances, the preliminary objection taken by the learned advocate Mr. Gokhale must be rejected.

Mr. Gokhale says that since s. 12 of the Act stood deleted from the statute book with effect from August 1, 1956, the Mamlatdar could now determine competently only the rent under s. 9 of the Act and not reasonable rent under s. 12. It is to be noted that opponent No. 2 had applied for determination of reasonable rent under s. 12 on June 14, 1956, i.e., before the Amended Act came into force on August 1, 1956. In other words, he had already instituted a legal proceeding viz., an application under s. 12 in respect of his right to have reasonable rent determined. That legal proceeding was pending on August 1, 1956, the date upon which the Amended Act came into force. Under s. 89(2) (b)(ii) of the Act that proceeding was saved and therefore the application made by opponent No. 2 under s. 12 of the old Act could be decided as if s. 9 of the new Act had not been on the statute book. The remand order of the Tribunal directing determination of reasonable rent under s. 12 of the Act, as it stood before amendment, is therefore right. It must, however, be pointed out that the determination of reasonable rent in this case must be confined to a period after June 12, 1956, the date upon which opponent No. 2 tendered the amount of Rs. 2,505 under s. 25(1) to obtain relief against forfeiture. Opponent No. 2 having tendered the amount under s. 25(1), no enquiry as to reasonable rent for the period preceding the tender is permissible under the Act. The Mamlatdar would, therefore, determine the reasonable rent for the period subsequent to June 12, 1956, and not prior to it.

The next point is whether the Mamlatdar has jurisdiction under s. 10 of the Act to decide an application for refund made by a tenant who has tendered the amount to the landlord under s. 25(1) to obtain relief against forfeiture. The learned advocate Mr. Buch for the petitioner-landlord says that the Mamlatdar has no jurisdiction under the Act to decide such an application, whereas the learned advocate Mr. Gokhale for opponent No. 2 says that under s. 10 it is competent to the Mamlatdar to decide such an application and determine the amount of refund. In our view, upon examination of the language of s. 10, s. 25(1) and s. 70, cl. (f) and (h), of the Act, Mr. Buch's contention appears to be correct and must be upheld. It would be appropriate at this stage to set out the provisions of s. 10. Section 10 provides:

"If any landlord recovers rent from any tenant in contravention of the provisions of ss. 8, 9, 2A or 9C, he shall forthwith refund the excess amount recovered to the tenant and shall be liable to pay such compensation to the tenant as may be determined by the Mamlatdar in this behalf and shall also be liable to such penalty as may be prescribed by rules made under this Act."

It is significant to note that the Legislature has coupled "refund" with "compensation" and "penalty" while enacting s. 10. Now, coupling of "compensation" and "penalty" with "refund" in s. 10 would show that when the Legislature used the expression "recovers rent" in s. 10, it contemplated recovery of rent by the landlord in a manner contrary to law or otherwise improper or objectionable. If the recovery of rent by the landlord is in order and does not offend against any provision of law, no question can possibly arise of compensation and penalty in respect of the said recovery. A scope for compensation and penalty could only arise when something which is not right, something which offends against the provisions of law, is done by a person. Now, when a tenant tenders the amount under s. 25(1) and when the landlord accepts it, the acceptance is in conformity with the law; it is not an improper or offensive recovery. In other words, in our view, it is not recovery which would fall under s. 10 of the Act. Therefore, when a tenant has tendered the amount under s. 25(1) to obtain relief against forfeiture, no subsequent application by him for the refund of a portion of that amount can lie under s. 10 of the Act.

Then, again, we have no doubt that the expression "as may be determined by the Mamlatdar" which is used in s. 10 of the Act, is used in relation to "compensation" and not in relation to "refund". This becomes clear upon a perusal of cls. (f) and (h) of s. 70. Now, whatever jurisdiction the Mamlatdar has under the Act to decide the various matters and questions falling under the Act, it is derived from s. 70 of the Act. Clause (f) of s. 70 provides that for the purposes of the Act it shall be the duty and function of the Mamlatdar to determine the amount of compensation under s. 10 for contravention of ss. 8, 9, 9A and 9C. Clause (h) provides that it shall be the duty and function of the Mamlatdar to determine the amount to be refunded to a tenant under s. 13(5). It is thus clear from the provisions of cls. (f) and (h) of s. 70 that the only applications under s. 10 which the Mamlatdar has jurisdiction under the Act to hear and decide are applications claiming compensation for the contravention of ss. 8, 9, 9A and 9C of the Act. I have mentioned above that s. 10 consists of three elements, viz., the elements of refund, compensation and penalty. It is impossible to believe that while referring to s. 10 while enacting cl. (f) of s. 70, the Legislature did not have before its mind all the elements of s. 10; and yet when it came to enacting cl. (f) the Legislature purposely omitted the words "refund" and "penalty" and used only the word "compensation". If the intention of the Legislature was to confer jurisdiction upon the Mamlatdar to hear and decide applications for refund made under s. 10 of the Act, we have no doubt that alongside the word "compensation" the Legislature would have used the word "refund" also in cl. (f) of s. 70. The Legislature did not do so and herein lies a clear clue to the intention of the Legislature upon the question of conferring jurisdiction upon the Mamlatdar so far as an application for refund under s. 10 is concerned. In our view, the Legislature did not intend to confer jurisdiction upon the Mamlatdar to entertain and decide an application for refund under s. 10. Then again, if we turn to cl. (h) of s. 70, it would be clear that the only applications for refund which the Mamlatdar is given jurisdiction to hear and decide are applications for refund under s. 13(5) of the Act. In cl. (h), which is a clause specifically dealing with applications for refund, the Legislature omitted a reference to s. 10. The learned advocate Mr. Jathar appearing for Mr. Gokhale says that s. 70 of the Act is not comprehensive or exhaustive and, therefore, even if the expression "refund" does not find place in cl. (f) of s. 70 and even if s. 10 does not find place in cl. (h) of s. 70, it would be competent to the Mamlatdar to decide an application made by a tenant for refund under s. 10. Mr. Jathar has invited our attention to the provisions of s. 29, sub-s. (3) and has contended that under this sub-section the Act has cast a duty upon the Mamlatdar to hold an enquiry and pass an appropriate order in the matter of delivering possession either to the landlord or to the tenant as the case may be. Mr. Jathar says that although such a jurisdiction is conferred by the Act upon the Mamlatdar under s. 29(3), there is no reference to s. 29 in s. 70. Therefore, says Mr. Jathar, s. 70 is not a comprehensive section, laying down all the duties of the Mamlatdar under the Act. We have examined this contention of Mr. Jathar, but we are unable to see substance in it. Mr. Jathar has probably overlooked cl. (n) of s. 70. Clause (n) provides that for the purposes of the Act it shall be the duty and function to be performed by the Mamlatdar to take measures for putting the tenant or landlord or the agricultural labourer or artisan or person carrying on an allied pursuit into the possession of the land or dwelling house under the Act. There is no doubt that when the Legislature enacted cl. (n) of s. 70, it was clearly conferring jurisdiction upon the Mamlatdar to decide questions of handing over possession to the tenant or the landlord as the case may be. In our view, the fact that the Legislature, while conferring jurisdiction under cl. (f) of s. 70 upon the Mamlatdar to determine certain applications made under s. 10, did not refer to applications for refund and the further fact that while conferring jurisdiction upon the Mamlatdar under cl. (h) of s. 70 the Legislature referred only to applications for refund made under s. 13(5) would clearly show that the Legislature did not intend to confer any jurisdiction upon the Mamlatdar to decide the question of refund agitated by a tenant under s. 10. That being so, the present application made by opponent No. 2 under s. 10, claiming refund of a portion of the amount tendered by him for claiming relief against forfeiture under s. 25(1), would not be competent.

Then again, there is another reason why opponent No. 2 cannot invoke the assistance of s. 10 in this case for claiming refund of a portion of the amount tendered by him under s. 25(1). Unless opponent No. 2 is able to establish in the first place that this is a case in which the landlord had recovered rent from him, the provisions of s. 10 cannot assist him. In order that the provisions of s. 10 can come into operation, it must first be established that the landlord had recovered rent from a tenant. Now, in this case, as I have mentioned above, opponent No. 2 tendered the amount of Rs. 2,505 on June 12, 1956, to obtain relief against forfeiture. It was a tender by a person who was a one time tenant of the landlord, but whose tenancy had been terminated and whom the landlord had become entitled to evict from the land. This is clear enough, if we turn to the provisions of s. 25(1). It is to be remembered that it was under this section that the tender of the amount of Rs. 2,505 was made by opponent No. 2. Section 25(1) provides:

"Where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated for non-payment of rent and the landlord files any proceeding to eject the tenant, the Mamlatdar shall call upon the tenant to tender to the landlord the rent in arrears together with the cost of the proceeding, within three months from the date of order, and if the tenant complies with such order, the Mamlatdar shall, in lieu of making an order for ejectment, pass an order directing that the tenancy had not been terminated and thereupon the tenant shall hold the land as if the tenancy had not been terminated."

The words italicised above are the important words in s. 25(1). They would show that the tender which is made under this section is made by a person whose tenancy was terminated for non-payment of rent and whom his landlord has become entitled to eject from the land, in other words by a person who had ceased to be a tenant. The section speaks of an artificial revival of tenancy, which had already come to an end, upon a certain event happening, viz., upon the tender of a certain amount being made by the one time tenant to the owner of the land. In these circumstances, it is impossible to say that when the amount of Rs. 2,505 was tendered by opponent No. 2 and was made over to the petitioner, the petitioner recovered rent from his tenant within the meaning of s. 10 of the Act. For these reasons also we are of the view that a recourse to s. 10 of the Act cannot avail opponent No. 2.

Apart from what has been stated above, it is clear in this case that if oppo-nant No. 2 had not tendered the amount of Rs. 2,505 to be paid over to the petitioner, he would not have obtained the relief against forfeiture. His tenancy had been terminated by the landlord giving him a notice under the Act and the landlord had become entitled to an order of ejectment, which the Court would have passed, but for the tender of the amount. His tenancy which had been terminated would not have been revived, but for the tender of the amount. In these circumstances, to entertain an application from opponent No. 2 for the refund of a portion of the amount tendered by him under s. 25(1) would be permitting him to approbate and reprobate at the same time. We cannot allow this in the absence of a specific provision to that effect in the Act. He cannot expect to retain the benefit of relief against forfeiture, obtained by him under s. 25(1), and at the same time ask for the refund of a portion of the amount tendered by him. We are referring to this aspect of the case quite independently of what has been stated above.

In the result, the application of opponent No. 2 made by him for refund under s. 10 of the Act fails and is rejected. The case shall be remanded to the Mamlatdar for determination of the reasonable rent, bearing in mind the provisions of ss. 8 and 9 of the Act, for the period after June 12, 1956. So far as the question of costs is concerned, opponent No. 2 will bear his own costs as also the petitioner's costs of this application.

Order accordingly.

Before Mr. Justice Vyas and Mr. Justice Tambe.

MARZBAN RUSTOMJI v. KHUSHALBHAI PITAMBAR.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 31B(1), 31—Termination of tenancy with dissection of lands originally leased out to tenant whether permissible under Act—Whether notice of termination of tenancy can relate to a part of property leased and sought to be possessed or must relate to the entire property.

Under s. 31B(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, a tenancy can be terminated in such a way as would result in a landlord getting back possession of only a part of the land leased out to the tenant. A notice given under s. 31 of the Act terminating the tenancy of only a part of the property leased out, of which part the possession is sought by the landlord, is a good notice.

Woodward v. Dudley, referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

N. C. Shah, for the petitioner.

I. C. Dalal, with J. B. Nagarsheth, for opponents Nos. 1 to 3.

VYAS J. This is an application made under art. 227 of the Constitution of India by the petitioner Marzban Rustomji, wherein the petitioner has prayed for the quashing of an order made by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal on February 8, 1958, by which order the Revenue Tribunal confirmed the order passed by the Prant Officer on October 21, 1957. The circumstances under which this application arises may be briefly stated:

The petitioner-landlord let out his lands, comprising two survey numbers, being S. No. 409 admeasuring 7 acres 12 gunthas and S. No. 410/2 admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas, of Olpad, to opponents Nos. 1, 2 and 3 under a registered lease dated August 18, 1942. On December 20, 1956, the petitioner served opponents Nos. 1, 2 and 3 with a notice under s. 31 of the Tenancy Act, asking the opponents to quit S. No. 410/2. The ground upon which the petitioner required the opponents to hand over possession of S. No. 410/2 to him was that he (the petitioner) bona fide required possession of the said land for personal cultivation. After serving opponents Nos. 1, 2 and 3 with notice in respect of S. No. 410/2 only as stated above, the petitioner made an application in April 1957, under s. 29(2) of the Act, to the Mamlatdar for obtaining possession of the land in respect of which he had given the notice. The Extra Aval Karkun, Olpad, who heard the application of the petitioner-landlord, observed in the course of his order that the notice which was given by the petitioner-landlord to his tenants was not in respect of both the survey numbers, viz., S. No. 409 and S. No. 410/2, but that the notice related only to S. No. 410/2, admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas, and that, therefore, at best the possession of only half the said S. No. 410/2, i.e., possession of only half of 2 acres 25 gunthas could be awarded to the landlord, and that if that be done, there would result a fragmentation of land which would be contrary to law, and in that view of the matter the Extra Aval Karkun dismissed the application of the petitioner-landlord. From that order the petitioner-landlord went in appeal before the Prant Officer, and the Prant Officer by an order made on October 21, 1957, dismissed the appeal and confirmed the order of the Extra Aval Karkun. From that order of the Prant Officer the petitioner-landlord went before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal by way of a revisional application and the Tribunal by an order made by them on February 3, 1958, rejected the said revisional application of the landlord. It is from that order of the Revenue Tribunal that the landlord, feeling aggrieved, has approached this Court under art. 227 of the Constitution.

Now, in our view, the conclusion of the Extra Aval Karkun that if the landlord's application for possession of S. No. 410/2 be allowed, there would be a violation of the provisions of law contained in s. 31B(1) of the Tenancy Act is clearly erroneous. It is difficult to understand why the Extra Aval Karkun took the view that although the landlord asked for possession of the entire S. No. 410/2 he could be awarded possession of only half of that survey number, i.e., possession of only half of 2 acres and 25 gunthas. The learned advocate Mr. Dalal appearing for the tenants in this case has not been able to point out to us any provision of law in the Tenancy Act, pursuant to which the Extra Aval Karkun could validly hold that although the landlord had asked for possession of the entire S. No. 410/2 he could only be entitled at best to possession of half of that survey number. If we turn to the relevant provision of law contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 31B, the law only lays down that a tenancy in no case shall be terminated in such a way as will result in leaving with a tenant, after termination, less than half the area of the land leased to him. Now, in this case, it is to be borne in mind that the lease under which the petitioner leased out his lands to the tenants was only one transaction. There were no two distinct leases although the lands leased out were two survey numbers. The transaction was one, although the subject-matter of the transaction was lands more than one. Bearing this position in mind, namely, that the lands leased out by the petitioner-landlord to the tenants admeasured 7 acres 12 gunthas plus 2 acres 25 gunthas, i.e., in all 9 acres 37 gunthas, it is necessary to remember that even if the possession of the entire S. No. 410/2 admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas has to be returned by the tenants to the petitioner-landlord, even so the tenants would continue to remain in possession of much more than half of the lands originally leased out to them. They would still have the possession of 7 acres 12 gunthas out of 9 acres 37 gunthas of lands that were leased out to them. That being so, it is difficult to understand how it could be validly contended that the provisions of law contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 31B of the Act would be violated by handing over possession of the entire S. No. 410/2 to the petitioner-landlord.

The learned advocate Mr. Dalal appearing for the tenants contends that it is not known whether the notice which was given by the petitioner-landlord to the tenants referred only to S. No. 410/2 or referred only to S. No. 409 or referred to both S. No. 410/2 and S. No. 409; and, says Mr. Dalal, if the notice related only to S. No. 409, then, if the possession of S. No. 409 is to be given back by the tenants to the petitioner-landlord, less than half of the lands leased out to the tenants would thereafter remain in the possession of the tenants. Of course, Mr. Dalal would be right, if we were to act on the assumption that the notice given by the landlord to the tenants was a notice in relation to S. No. 409. Survey No. 409 admeasures 7 acres 12 gunthas and therefore if that survey number is to be handed over by the tenants to the landlord, what would thereafter remain in the possession of the tenants would be only S. No. 410/2 admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas, and obviously, on the very face of things, 2 acres 25 gunthas would be much less than half of 9 acres 37 gunthas. But this contention of Mr. Dalal rests entirely upon the assumption made by him that the notice given by the landlord to the tenants might be a notice in relation to S. No. 409 only and not in relation to S. No. 410/2; and for this assumption we find no justification on the record. It is true that the Bombay Revenue Tribunal has pointed out in the course of its order that the notice itself has not been produced in the lower Courts nor is a copy of it placed on the record even now. However, if we turn to the order passed by the Extra Aval Karkun, whose Court was the first Court to deal with this matter in the first instance, it would appear that in the proceedings before him a reference was made to a notice which related only to S. No. 410/2 admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas. This is what the Extra Aval Karkun observed in the course of his order:—

"The applicant has not given a notice to the opponent for the S. No. 409, admeasuring 7 acres 12 gunthas, for handing over the possession. He has only given notice for the land of S. No. 410/2 admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas and hence he is not entitled for getting possession of S. No. 409 admeasuring 7 acres 12 gunthas."

If we turn to the order made by the Prant Officer in this case, once again it would appear that he referred to a notice which related to S. No. 410/2. The Prant Officer says in the course of his order:—

"In the notice under s. 31 the applicant had failed to mention S. No. 409 and therefore the lower Court had dismissed his application."

It may be, as the Bombay Revenue Tribunal has observed in the course of its order, that no notice was brought on the record of the case before any Court. But even so, we have got before us, in this proceeding under art. 227 of the Constitution, a finding of fact recorded by the Extra Aval Karkun and confirmed by the final fact finding authority, namely, the Prant Officer, the finding being to the effect that the notice which was given by the landlord to the tenants related only to S. No. 410/2 and that it did not relate to S. No. 409. The finding may be an erroneous finding. Nevertheless, it is a finding of fact and, therefore, in the exercise of our jurisdiction under art. 227 of the Constitution, it would not be open to us to go behind that finding and take the view, which the learned advocate Mr. Dalal is contending for, that the notice might be a notice relating to S. No. 409 only and not relating to S. No. 410/2.

The next point which Mr. Dalal has sought to make before us is that it is well settled that a tenancy cannot be dissected. What Mr. Dalal means by this contention is that a tenancy cannot be kept intact in respect of a part of the land leased out and cannot be terminated in respect of the other part of the land leased out. In effect, what Mr. Dalal contends is that the petitioner-landlord could either get possession of both the S. Nos. 409 and 410/2 or could get possession of neither of them. We have considered this contention of Mr. Dalal, but we are unable to see force in it. In our view, termination of tenancy, with the dissection of lands originally leased out to the tenants, is made expressly clear in sub-s. (1) of s. 31B, which provides:—

"In no case a tenancy shall be terminated under s. 31 in such manner as will result in leaving with the tenant, after termination, less than half the area of the land leased to him."

It is, therefore, clear in our view that when the Legislature enacted s. 31B(1) it had in its mind the restoration of possession by a tenant to the landlord.

upon the termination of tenancy, of a portion of lands leased out by the landlord to the tenant. Besides, it is clear that a lease is a matter of contract. There might have been a contract between the landlord and the tenants in this case that the lease of S. No. 410/2 alone could be terminated. In this connection it is to be noted, and this is relevant, that no plea was taken by the tenants at any stage of the proceedings in this case that the tenancy of one survey number only could not be terminated.

Mr. Dalal has invited our attention to an English case of *Woodward v. Dudley*¹. In this case there was an agreement between a landlord and his two tenants in respect of agricultural property which was described in two parcels. These two parcels were Jeffries Farm and Langley Lodge Farm. The agreement was dated September 24, 1928, and by the said agreement the landlord let out the above two parcels of land to his tenants A and B. On December 17, 1952, B died and the probate of his will was granted to C, his sole executor, who remained in possession of the demised property. On February 5, 1953, D's agents, on behalf of D, gave C a notice to quit which required the delivery of "land known as Jeffries Farm" and contained no reference to Langley Lodge Farm. It was held that the notice referred to part only of the demised property and therefore it was a bad notice. Relying upon this decision Mr. Dalal for the tenants contends that as the notice given by the landlord in this case referred to only a part of the lands leased out, it was a bad notice. In this connection, it is to be noted, however, that by s. 81B(1) the Tenancy Act itself has expressly created a tenancy which could be terminated in such a way as would result in a landlord getting back possession of only a part of the land leased out. If the landlord under the law contained in the Tenancy Act could legitimately ask for restoration of possession of only a part of the property leased out to the tenants, then naturally the notice must relate only to a part of the property leased out and it cannot relate to the entire property leased out. The present application which we are deciding is an application which raises a point under the Tenancy Act and, therefore, the intention which the Legislature had in view in enacting the Act must be the governing factor on the point of construction whether the notice given by the landlord was a good notice or a bad notice. Apart from this, it is to be borne in mind that the principle laid down by the English case, which is a principle of common law, would be subject to the contract to the contrary, since leases are matters of contract between the parties; and, as I have stated above, the tenants in this case do not plead, and have not pleaded at the previous stages of the proceeding, that the contract was that the landlord would ask for possession either of both the survey numbers or of none of them. In this view of the matter, we cannot accept Mr. Dalal's contention that the landlord cannot ask for possession of only a part of the lands leased out to the tenants.

I have already stated above that even if the possession of S. No. 410/2 admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas be handed over by the tenants to the landlord, even so the tenants would continue to be in possession of 7 acres 12 gunthas, which is much more than half of the lands originally leased out to them, the lands originally leased out being 9 acres 37 gunthas in area.

It is important to bear in mind at this stage that the Courts below have not gone into the question whether the requirement of the petitioner-landlord for personal cultivation of S. No. 410/2 is a bona fide requirement or not. Somehow, for reasons which are not clear to us, the Extra Aval Karkun took the view that if the possession of S. No. 410/2 were to be given over to the landlord, only half the survey number could be given to the landlord and not the entire survey number, and the Extra Aval Karkun thought that if only half of S. No. 410/2 were to be returned to the landlord, there would be a fragmentation which would be contrary to the provision of law. The Prant Officer, on appeal, seems to have shared the same view, namely, that only half the S. No. 410/2 could be given back to the landlord and not the whole of it. The Bombay Revenue Tribunal, who could not go into questions of fact, confirmed the orders passed by the Prant Officer and the Extra Aval Karkun. The result of all this has been that there has been no finding upon a question of fact, namely, whether the petitioner-landlord bona fide requires possession of S. No. 410/2 admeasuring 2 acres 25 gunthas for personal cultivation.

In these circumstances, we set aside the order passed by the Revenue Tribunal and remand the case to the Mamlatdar with a direction that the Mamlatdar shall give a finding on the point raised by the petitioner-landlord, namely, that he bona fide requires possession of the entire S. No. 410/2 for personal cultivation. The Mamlatdar shall decide the case bearing in mind the provisions of s. 31A of the Act. So far as the question of costs is concerned, the costs shall abide by the result.

Order accordingly.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. M. C. Chagla, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

THE ENGINEERING STAFF UNION v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), Sec. 12(5)—Whether open to Government not to refer dispute to adjudication on ground that demands of workers not justified or not appropriate in context of times or financial conditions—Statutory satisfaction of Government whether must be based only on report of Conciliation Officer—Such satisfaction arrived at whether a judicial or quasi judicial act—When reasons given by Government for not making reference disclose extraneous matter taken into consideration or reasons disclose failure to consider relevant factor required by law, whether in such case Court can compel Government to give proper reasons—Whether incumbent on Government to give particulars for reasons given—Whether competent to Court to make reference where Court satisfied that it should be made.

Under s. 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, it is open to Government to consider in each case whether conciliation has failed and whether the demands of the workers are such as required adjudication. Not only when the demands are frivolous, but even if they are not justified, even if they are not appropriate in the context of the times or in the context of financial conditions, it would be open to Government not to refer the disputes to adjudication.

Section 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, makes it obligatory upon the Government to consider the report of the Conciliation Officer. The section does not provide that the satisfaction ultimately required by the Government is a satisfaction that can only be based upon the report of the Conciliation Officer. It would, therefore, be open to Government to rely on other materials, other facts, other statistics other than those which appear in the report of the Conciliation Officer. All that is relevant and germane to the statutory satisfaction can be availed of by the Government in coming to its conclusion.

The satisfaction that the Government has got to arrive at is not a judicial or quasi judicial act. It does not call for any judicial process, although it would be more satisfactory if Government were to discuss various matters in the presence of both the parties before it came to a particular conclusion.

When reasons are given by Government under s. 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, for not making a reference, and the Court is considering those reasons, if the reasons disclose any extraneous matter taken into consideration by the Government, or if they disclose a failure on the part of the Government to take into consideration any relevant factor required by law, the Court can say that these reasons are not reasons which fall within the ambit of s. 12(5) and compel the Government to give proper reasons.

*Decided September 5, 1958. O. C. J. Appeal 383 of 1957.
No. 58 of 1958: Miscellaneous Application No.

The reasons must disclose the mental process which has resulted in Government not being satisfied. The Court will not be concerned with how that mental process worked or how the conclusion was arrived at. But if the conclusion is germane to the failure on the part of the Government to be satisfied, then the Court cannot ask the Government to give particulars for the reasons given so that the particulars could be considered and investigated by the Court.

The satisfaction of the Government is a condition precedent to the making of a reference under s. 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, and, therefore, however satisfied the Court may be, the Court, on a petition made to it to direct the Government to make a reference, cannot place itself in the position of the Government and make a reference by reason of its own satisfaction.

Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan,¹ Allcroft v. Lord Bishop of London, *Lighton v. Lord Bishop of London*² and Associated Provincial Picture House Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation,³ referred to.

THE Engineering Staff Union (petitioners) was a Union registered under the Trade Unions Act, 1926, and a majority of the workmen of Messrs. Heatly and Gresham Ltd.,⁴ Bombay, were its members. In March 1956, the petitioners formulated certain demands of the workmen of the company and forwarded these to the company by the letter of its Secretary, dated March 27, 1956. As the company did not send a reply thereto, the General Secretary of the petitioners by his letter dated April 6, 1956, requested the Conciliation Officer appointed by the State Government under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, to take up the demands of the Union in conciliation with a view to bringing about an amicable settlement. Between May 8, 1956, and September 12, 1956, certain preliminary discussions took place between the parties and the Conciliation Officer. Ultimately the Conciliation Officer took certain of the demands of the Union in conciliation under the provisions of the Act. Several meetings were thereafter held by the Conciliation Officer in order to bring about a settlement of the disputes. The conciliation proceedings, however, did not fructify.

On April 2, 1957, the Conciliation Officer made his report to the Government of Bombay under s. 12(4) of the Act reporting his failure to bring about a settlement. By an order dated July 30, 1957, the Government of Bombay in exercise of the powers conferred under s. 12(5) of the Act referred to the adjudication of an Industrial Tribunal the disputes with regard to some of the demands of the workmen. The Government, however, did not refer for adjudication the disputes with regard to several other demands of the workmen giving their reasons therefor.

On November 18, 1957, the petitioners filed the present petition, praying for the issue of a writ of mandamus or any other writ and/or directions and/or orders in the nature of the said writ ordering and requiring the State of Bombay (respondent No. 1) to cancel and withdraw their letter dated August 14, 1957, whereby the Deputy Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Labour and Social Welfare Department, informed the petitioners that the Government having considered the report submitted by the Conciliation Officer under s. 12(4) of the Industrial Disputes Act had referred certain of the demands to an Industrial Tribunal and that as regards the other demands the Government was satisfied that there was no case for a reference and giving reasons therefor. The petitioners further prayed that respondent No. 1 may be directed to refer to the adjudication of an Industrial Tribunal the various items of dispute forming the subject-matter of the petitioners' demands, except those which had already been referred by the Government, or in the alternative, at least

"those aspects of the demands which have not been so referred and for the non-reference of which proper reasons within the meaning of section 12(5) of the Act have not been furnished by Government."

The petition was heard by K. T. Desai J. who delivered the following judgment on August 7, 1958:—

K. T. DESAI J. [His Lordship after stating the facts proceeded]: The principal contentions urged by the petitioners are that the reasons given by Government for not referring some of the demands made by the workmen are not reasons warranted by the provisions of the Act, that in giving some of the reasons the Government has usurped the functions of an Industrial Tribunal and has in fact adjudicated upon some of the demands and that the Government has not, in respect of some of the demands, applied its mind to the matter.

I will proceed to deal with the various items, disputes in connection where-with have not been referred by the Government and the grounds given in respect thereof.

Pay Scales: The demand of the Union in connection with pay scales is set out in exh. A to the petition. The Union demanded that the existing pay of the employees should be revised and adjusted according to the scales set out. The Union further demanded that the scales of pay should be made effective retrospectively from the date of joining of each employee. The Union demanded that while giving effect to the new scales of pay "adjustment should be made on a point to point basis" taking into account the service and/or experience of the employees prior to their joining the company and/or their age also and that the adjustment should be done in such a manner that no junior employee should receive basic pay higher than that of any senior employee of the same category. It further demanded that in the case of an employee whose present pay was less than the minimum of the scale applicable to him, his pay should be first brought to the minimum of the scale and then he should be adjusted in the scale, the adjustment being effective from April 1, 1955. The reason given by Government for not referring the demand in connection with pay scales is as follows:—

"The pay scales in the company compare favourably with those obtaining in other comparable concerns in Bombay."

The petitioners contend that it is not permissible to the Government to refuse a reference on the ground of the alleged adequacy of the existing pay scales. They further contend that there were no pay scales in the company applicable to a number of categories of workmen such as store-keepers, assistant store-keepers, fitters and carpenters and that the reason given by Government was non-existent as regards such workmen and could not possibly arise out of consideration of the report of the Conciliation Officer. The petitioners further contend that in fact the pay scales offered by the company do not compare favourably with those obtaining in other comparable concerns in Bombay and that the Government had committed an error which was apparent on the face of the record. It is further urged that the Union had demanded adjustment of pay of various categories of workmen in their respective demanded scales of pay and that the company had not offered any adjustment whatsoever even in respect of those categories of workmen in respect of whom they had offered some scales of pay.

Reliance has been placed by the learned counsel for the petitioners on two decisions of this Court. The first decision relied upon is the one given in *Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan*¹. It is a decision of a division bench of this Court, consisting of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai. The other judgment relied upon is an unreported judgment of Mr. Justice S. T. Desai, in Engineering Masdoor Sabha v. The State of Bombay.² In the case of Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan, the Government had refused to refer a dispute under s. 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act, on the ground that the workmen had resorted to go-slow tactics. In that case the learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the appeal Court, observed that under s. 12(5) of the Act an obligation had been imposed on the Government in connection with making of a reference to an Industrial Tribunal. Section 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act runs as follows:—

"12. (5) If, on a consideration of the report referred to in sub-section (4), the appropriate Government is satisfied that there is a case for reference to a Board, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, it may make such reference. Where the appropriate Government does not make such a reference it shall record and communicate to the parties concerned its reasons therefor."

In dealing with this section, the learned Chief Justice observes as follows (p. 1145):—

"...The Government undoubtedly has been given the power to make a reference, but that power has been coupled with a duty and the duty is that if on a perusal of the report Government is satisfied that there is a case for reference, the duty imposed upon it clearly arises and the Government cannot refuse to discharge that duty. In that sense, therefore, 'may' has the implication of an obligation, an obligation to discharge a duty which follows upon the satisfaction arrived at on a perusal of the report... The next part of sub-s. (5) makes it obligatory upon Government when it does not make a reference to record and communicate to the parties concerned its reasons therefor. It is perfectly true that the reasons given by Government are not justiciable in the sense that the Court will not consider the weight or value or the quality or even the adequacy of the reasons given by Government. But it is equally clear that the reasons which the Government has to give under this sub-section are reasons connected with the perusal of the report and with Government not being satisfied that there is a case for reference. It is because Government is not satisfied that there is a case for reference that the duty to refer does not arise, and what the Legislature required was that Government must give reasons why it was not satisfied that there was a case for a reference. In our opinion, therefore, the reasons must be connected with the failure on the part of Government to be satisfied that there was no case for reference. It is equally clear that if the reasons had no connection, no bearing and no relevance to this question, then they are not reasons at all contemplated by sub-s. (5), and if there are not reasons contemplated by sub-s. (5), then it would be open to the Court to ask Government to give proper reasons which the law requires under sub-s. (5)."

Proceeding further, the learned Chief Justice observes as follows (p. 1145):—

"...therefore in our opinion the only question we have to consider in this appeal—and it is a very short question—is whether the reason given by Government for not making the reference is a reason germane to their not being satisfied that there was a case for reference... A reason which is not germane to the industrial dispute or is not connected with the industrial dispute would obviously not be the reason contemplated by s. 12(5)."

The learned Chief Justice at p. 1146 observes as follows:—

"...If the Government took the view that there was no case whatever on merits, that the demands of the workers were frivolous or vexatious, that merely the time of the Industrial Court would be wasted by making the reference, that the decision was a foregone one, undoubtedly all these considerations would lead to the Government being satisfied that there was no case for a reference."

The appeal Court in that case confirmed the decision of Mr. Justice Tendolkar who dealt with the matter in the first instance. In the course of his judgment, which appears at pp. 1139 to 1143 of the same report, Mr. Justice Tendolkar observes at p. 1140 as under:—

"Now, in the first instance it is quite plain that the authority that is to be satisfied under s. 5 is the Government, and no doubt where the Government gives a reason, the adequacy or validity of that reason shall not be inquired into by any Court of law, provided the reason is germane to the question of making or not making a reference... The question, therefore, that I have to determine is whether the reason that has been assigned by the Government in this case is germane to the consideration of the question of making or not making a reference or wholly extraneous to it."

The lower Court as well as the appeal Court held that the reason given by Government in that case for not making a reference viz. the workers' resorting to go slow tactics, was not a reason germane to the matter and an order was made directing the issue of a writ of mandamus against the State of Bombay to reconsider the question of making or refusing to make a reference under s. 12(5) ignoring the fact that there was a slow down and taking into account only such reasons as were germane to the question of determining whether a reference should or should not be made. This decision is an authority for the proposition that the reason given by Government for not making a reference must be germane to the industrial dispute. In this case observations have been made to the effect that if the reason is germane to the matter, then it is not open to the Court to enquire into the weight or value or the quality or even the adequacy of the reason given by the Government.

It is urged by the learned counsel for the petitioners that the remarks of the learned Chief Justice when he says that the reasons given by the Government are not justiciable in the sense that the Court will not consider the weight or value or the quality or even the adequacy of the reasons given by Government are remarks which do not constitute a binding pronouncement on the subject. He urges that the remarks made merely show the trend of the mind of the learned Chief Justice. He urges that what the Court in that case had to consider was whether the reason given by Government for not making a reference viz. go slow tactics adopted by the workmen was a valid reason under the Act. It was sufficient for the purposes of that case to hold that the reason given was clearly not germane to the question of referring or not referring the dispute. He urges that in that case the wider question as to whether the Court could consider the weight, value or the quality or adequacy of the reasons given by Government did not directly arise for decision.

The learned counsel for the petitioners has placed strong reliance upon the observations of the House of Lords in the case of *Quinn v. Leathem*³. At page 506 the Earl of Halsbury in that case observes as follows:—

"...that every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved, or assumed to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are to be found...case is only an authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it."

I am in respectful agreement with these observations.

The appeal Court in the case of Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan was dealing with a matter which arose under s. 12(5) of the Act. The Court had to consider what meaning should be given to the words "may refer" appearing in that section. The Court had also to consider the question in connection with the reasons that may be given by the Government for not making a reference and the power of the Court to interfere in respect of a matter where reasons are given by Government. It was not, strictly speaking, necessary for the purpose of that case to decide the question about the weight, value, quality or adequacy of the reason given in view of the fact that the Court held that the reason given was not germane to the question of making or not making a reference. However, the remarks of the learned Chief Justice, when he observes that the Court would not consider the weight or value or the quality or even the adequacy of the reasons given by Government where the reasons given are germane to the matter, represent, if I may say so with respect, a correct enunciation of the law on the subject. The Court is not constituted an appellate authority in connection with the decision of the Government and is not entitled to consider the question of the weight, value, quality or adequacy of the reason given by Government which is germane to the matter.

The unreported decision of Mr. Justice S. T. Desai, given in the case of Engineering Maadoor Sabha v. The State of Bombay, on which a strong reliance has been placed by the learned counsel for the petitioners, does not in any way militate against what is stated above. The dispute in that case related to dearness allowance. After the Conciliation Officer made his report under s. 12(4), Government entered into an agreement with the persons in management of the company whereunder those in management of the company agreed to revise the dearness allowance payable to the monthly rated employees whose monthly basic salaries did not exceed Rs. 330 with effect from a particular date. This agreement was arrived at without the knowledge and behind the back of the Engineering Mazdoor Sabha, the petitioners in that case. The Government refused to make a reference of the dispute to an Industrial Tribunal. The only reason given by Government was as follows:—

"The management have agreed to revise the dearness allowance payable to the monthly rated employees whose monthly basic salaries do not exceed Rs. 330/- at the following rate with effect from 1st July 1953."

Dealing with this case the learned Judge observes as follows:—

"...the whole controversy that has arisen before me is whether the Government has given a reason which was relevant or germane to the matter which came up for its consideration on the report made by the Conciliation Officer."

The learned Judge after discussing the matter further observes as follows:—

"The conclusion which I have reached is that the reason given by the first respondent in the order challenged before me is not germane to the matter and was one which in a case under s. 12(5) it was not permissible to the first respondent to take into consideration in declining to make the reference. Therefore, the effect of this is that there is no valid reason recorded by the Government and communicated to the parties concerned for the refusal to make a reference, in the matter of the report made by the Conciliation Officer to the Government under s. 12 of the Act."

This decision also lays down that the question which the Court has to consider is whether the reason given is germane to the matter. There are other observations made in this judgment which are relied upon by the learned counsel for the petitioners. They are as follows:—

"It was repeatedly stressed that the Government had gone outside the bounds of its sphere of action in a matter arising under s. 12(5) and taken upon itself the functions of the Tribunal which was to decide whether dearness allowance should or should not be given or on what basis the same should be given. There is considerable force in this argument...Moreover, it is not competent to the Government to adjudicate upon the dispute between the parties. That is the province of the Tribunal. The Government in a case falling under s. 12(5) has to consider the report of the Conciliation Officer and decide whether there is a case for making a reference. The section itself lays down the scope and ambit of the powers of the Government in any such case."

I am in respectful agreement with the observations made as above. It is the duty of the Government to examine the matter for the purpose of considering whether it should or should not make a reference. It is not the function of the Government to adjudicate upon the dispute. It may be that for the purpose of considering whether the Government should refer or should not refer a dispute to the Industrial Tribunal the Government may have to evaluate the demands, Government may have to consider whether the demands are frivolous or vexatious, and the Government may have to consider whether the demands are such that no reasonable Tribunal could be expected to grant them. In doing so the Government does not take upon itself the function of the Tribunal or adjudicate upon the dispute. The adjudication of a dispute by a Tribunal would be an adjudication binding on the parties. The decision of Government not to refer a dispute to an Industrial Tribunal does not result in an adjudication of the dispute. It only leaves the dispute unresolved and leaves the parties to their other remedies.

It is next urged that in not making a reference under s. 12(5) Government cannot travel beyond the report made by the Conciliation Officer and that the reasons given by Government for not making a reference must be such as can be given only on a perusal and consideration of the report. It is urged that if any reason is given the basis for which cannot be found in the report, then the reason would be one which it is not open to the Government to give under s. 12(5) of the Act and the decision of Government would be vitiated by reason thereof. Reliance has been placed by the learned counsel for the petitioners on some of the observations of Mr. Justice S. T. Desai in the unreported judgment referred to above. In the course of his judgment in that case the learned Judge has observed as follows:—

"I have already observed that the reasons on which the decision must be based must have for their basis the report made by the Conciliation Officer. The reason cannot be anything which may have subsequently transpired between the Government and the employers."

He further observes as follows:—

"The Government in a case falling under s. 12(5) has to consider the report of the Conciliation Officer and decide whether there is a case for making a reference."

The Court in that case was concerned with considering whether the happening of an event subsequent to the making of the report, behind the back of the petitioners, could be relied upon for the purpose of not making a reference, and the Court held that it could not be done. This is not the same thing as saying that the report and nothing but the report can be considered and that the reasons which can be given are only those found by a person only on a perusal and consideration of the report. The report has to be considered. It is nowhere provided that it should constitute the only material from which Government must derive its reasons. I have on several occasions found that the report merely sets out the disputes between the parties and says that the Conciliation Officer in spite of his best efforts has not been able to resolve the disputes. If Government had only to look to the report for its reasons and nothing else, a situation may arise where it would be impossible for Government to apply its mind to the matter and come to a conclusion one way or the other whether a reference should or should not be made. The mere statement of the disputes between the parties and the mere statement that the Conciliation Officer has not been able to resolve the disputes would not furnish any reason whatsoever for either making a reference or for not making a reference. No doubt, it is obligatory on the Government to consider the report of the Conciliation Officer in considering whether to make a reference or not to make a reference. But the reasons given by Government for not making a reference need not be drawn only from what is stated in the report.

There is an unreported judgment of a division bench of this Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Baydekar and Mr. Justice Shah, in *Baroda City Municipal Servants Union v. The State of Bombay*⁴, dealing with a case arising under s. 12(5) of the Act. In that case, Government refused to refer the dispute that had arisen for adjudication by an Industrial Tribunal after considering the report of the Conciliation Officer. The reasons given by Government for not doing so were as follows:—

"(1) The decision of the Municipality to reduce the retiring age from 60 to 55 is in keeping with the current policy of Government for fixing the retirement age;

(2) The present case is for the enforcement of contractual conditions and in such cases the matter should be settled through a Civil Court rather than through adjudication proceedings;

(3) The dispute was raised after more than two years and it is not proper to refer stale cases for adjudication; and

(4) The dispute is between a public body in a merged State area which has acted in keeping with its former practice of passing a resolution and the want of a technical sanction was due to ignorance of the rules of this State during the transaction period."

In that case it was urged on behalf of the petitioner that if there was a primo

facie case made out by the petitioner, then the Government was under an obligation to refer the dispute for adjudication by an Industrial Tribunal. In dealing with this argument, Mr. Justice Baydekar, who delivered the judgment of the Court, observes as follows:—

"The meaning of the words 'there is a case' therefore is that there is a case for reference, not only because a prima facie case has been made out, but also because of several other reasons which the Government is entitled to take into consideration, as they appear to have taken into consideration in the present case. Government may, for example, refuse to make a reference in spite of the fact that the employee has got a good case if the employee comes up—say after ten years. There may be other grounds upon which the Government may refuse to make a reference in spite of the fact that the employee has got a good case. It is unnecessary to go into the various reasons for which the Government may refuse to make a reference. But there is no reason whatsoever for restricting the discretion which the Government has got only to such cases in which there is no prima facie case either for the employer or the employee as the case may be..."

"In this case Government have given reasons as they were required by law to do. The considerations for which they would not make a reference are obviously such as they could take into consideration in deciding whether a reference should be made or not. It is obvious that none of them is irrelevant to the question which the Government had to decide viz. whether a reference should be made or should not be made. In that case whether we think that the reasons which were given were good in the sense that we would have made a reference if the matter had been left to us is neither here nor there. Government having made up their mind that they would not make a reference for the reasons which are all relevant for the consideration of the question which was before them, it could not be said that the exercise of discretion was arbitrary."

This decision also lends support to the conclusion to which I have arrived at. The reasons there given by Government were germane to the question whether a reference should or should not be made. Some of the reasons given were such that they could not have been drawn from the report and the report of the Conciliation Officer could not be regarded as the only material from which the Government had to find its reasons for not making a reference.

Coming to the facts of the present case, as regards pay scales the reason given by Government for not making a reference is that the pay scales in the company compared favourably with those obtaining in other comparable concerns in Bombay. That is a reason germane to the question whether a reference should or should not be made and the Court is not concerned with the adequacy of that reason. The mere fact that the pay scales of company did not meet all the demands of the Union could not be made a ground for challenging the decision of Government in not referring the dispute in relation to pay scales to the Industrial Tribunal. The statement made by Government that the pay scales compare favourably with those obtaining in other comparable concerns does not, in any sense, amount to an adjudication of the dispute between the Union on the one hand and the company on the other. There is in fact no adjudication by the Government in the matter. Government has merely evaluated the demand of the Union which it has every right to do in not making a reference. It is not possible to say that Government has in any way exceeded its powers or functions in giving the aforesaid reason for not making a reference in connection with this demand.

The next item in respect whereof a complaint is made is as regards the demand of the workmen under the heading "Confirmation". The ground given by Government in not referring the same is as follows:—

"The offer made by the company during the conciliation proceedings to make employees permanent after six months of continuous service is reasonable."

It is urged on behalf of the petitioners that there was no such concrete offer whatsoever "as could be easily ascertained" and that the reason given was non-existent. In the affidavit in reply filed by Shri B. B. Brahmabhat, Deputy Secretary to Government, Labour and Social Welfare Department, dated April 25, 1958, it is stated as follows:—

"Government's decision for not referring this demand is based on the Conciliation Officer's report and the said reason is germane to the dispute. I further say that the second respondent company's offer to make every employee permanent after completion of six months continuous service was acceptable to the Union in respect of clerical staff, but not in respect of subordinate staff."

There was, in fact, an offer made by the company. The complaint made is that there was no "concrete offer" such as could be easily ascertained. The Conciliation Officer's report in this connection is as follows:—

"The management agreed to make every employee permanent after completion of 6 months continuous service. This was acceptable to the Union only in respect of clerical staff. The Union wanted subordinate staff, however, to be made permanent after completion of 4 months continuous service. The management was not agreeable to this." In view of what is stated in the conciliation report there is no substance in this objection. At the hearing before me, the learned counsel for the petitioners contended that the reason given by Government for not making a reference in this connection amounts to an adjudication of the matter. In my view, there is no adjudication by the Government of the dispute that had arisen in connection with this demand.

It was further urged before me that there was non-application of the mind by Government in giving this reason. In my view, there is no such non-application of the mind in giving this reason.

The third item complained of relates to 'Provident Fund'. The reason given by Government for not referring the matter in connection with provident fund is as follows:—

"The demand was not pressed by the Union during the conciliation proceedings." It is contended on behalf of the petitioners that this statement is totally divorced from the facts. The petitioners say that during the conciliation proceedings they at no time did not press the demand. The report of the Conciliation Officer supports them in what they say. In connection with the demand for provident fund, the Conciliation Officer observes as follows:—

"The Union contended that the company was having some kind of provident fund for employees since 1st April 1939 and the initial rate of contribution by an employee was 5% of his basic pay and the contribution by the company was only 1.25% of an employee's basic pay. This unequal rate continued upto 1947. From 1947 to 1950, the company's contribution was raised to the same level as that of an employee i.e. 5% of his basic pay for both sides. From 1-4-1950 to 1-2-1956 this rate was raised to 6½% of basic pay for both sides. Since 1-2-1956 the rate of contribution has been increased to 8½% on total emoluments i.e. basic pay including dearness allowance. The Union further contended that provident fund has been in existence in Bombay in various companies at the rate of 8½/3% of basic pay. The Union also contended that as the company had no gratuity scheme upto now, the rate of contribution should be increased to 10% of the total emoluments from the date of the joining of each employee. The management contended that a provident fund has been in existence in the company since 1939. For the benefit of those employees who joined prior to 1939, a supplementary provident fund was instituted consisting of 15 days' basic wages for each completed year of service prior to the date when provident fund came into being. The rates of contribution to provident fund varied progressively from time to time, the present rate being 6½% of total emoluments i.e. basic plus dearness allowance with an equal contribution by the company. The company was not prepared to consider any change in the existing provident fund."

This clearly indicates that the Union pressed its demand for provident fund during the course of the conciliation proceedings and that the company was not prepared to consider any change in the existing provident fund. The statement made by Government is clearly erroneous, and it cannot be made a ground for refusing to refer the question relating to provident fund for adjudication by the Industrial Tribunal. It seems, however, that after the conciliation proceedings were over and the Conciliation Officer had made his report, the General Secretary of the Union on April 11, 1957, made a representation to the Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Labour and Social Welfare Department, in connection with the reference of the disputes by Government, for adjudication to an Industrial Tribunal. In the course of that letter, under the heading 'Provident Fund', he stated as under:—

"If our demand for Gratuity is either conceded in toto or referred to adjudication in toto without any modification we would not press this demand."

The only time when the Union stated that it would not press the demand for provident fund is by this letter. This offer was a conditional offer, the condition being that the demand for gratuity should be conceded in toto or referred to adjudication "in toto" without any modification. This demand for gratuity was neither conceded in toto nor referred to adjudication in toto without any modification as stipulated by the Union. As a matter of fact, Government has itself in its letter dated August 14, 1957, whilst giving reasons for not referring the demands of the Union under the heading "Additional Gratuity" stated that the demand was not justified. In my view, whatever other reason might be open to Government for not referring the demand in connection with provident fund, the reason as given is not warranted by the facts, and the Government's decision not to refer the demand in connection with provident fund cannot be justified for the reason stated by Government. Really, that reason having no foundation in fact is no reason at all. The Government would be under an obligation to reconsider the matter and if it decides not to refer the matter, to give a reason for not doing so which is germane to the question.

The fourth item complained of is the item relating to "Additional Gratuity". The reason given by Government for not referring that item is as follows:—

"The demand is not justified."

The demand in connection with additional gratuity is as follows:—

"Employees should be given additional gratuity at the rate of one month's pay for the period from the date of his joining till the date when Provident Fund with 10% rate of contribution by employees and company comes into effect."

The Government having declined to refer the question relating to provident fund for adjudication, this demand for additional gratuity was liable to meet with the same fate inasmuch as the demand was for payment at the rate of one month's pay for the period commencing from the date of an employee's joining till the date when provident fund with 10 per cent. rate of contribution by the employees and the company was to come into effect. Under the provident fund scheme which was in operation the contribution was at the rate of 6½ per cent. and not at the rate of 10 per cent. It was the demand of the Union that it should be at the rate of 10 per cent. The aforesaid demand was not referred. The Government, consistently with its decision in not referring the question relating to provident fund, could not refer the dispute relating to additional gratuity. The question of reference of the dispute as regards provident fund is connected with the question of the reference of the dispute relating to additional gratuity. As the reason given by Government for not referring the demand in connection with provident fund is not warranted by facts and the question of referring the dispute in connection with provident fund is again opened up, the question relating to referring the dispute in connection with additional gratuity is liable equally to be opened up and the reasoning given in connection with additional gratuity cannot be sustained. Government would be under an obligation to consider the question of referring or not referring the demand in connection with the additional gratuity afresh.

The next item complained of relates to leave under the headings "Privilege Leave", "Sick Leave" and "General". The ground for not referring the dispute relating to privilege leave given by Government is as follows:—

"The 21 days privilege leave per year granted by the company is adequate."

It is urged on behalf of the petitioners that this really amounts to an adjudication of the matter and that the Government has usurped the functions of the Industrial Tribunal in connection therewith. In my view, the reason given by Government is germane to the question whether a reference should or should not be made. It does not amount to an adjudication between the parties and the action of Government in not referring that dispute is not liable to be challenged.

As regards sick leave, the reason given by Government for not referring the dispute in connection therewith is as under:—

“The Union is satisfied with the 30 days sick leave per year granted by the company.”

The demand in connection with sick leave was as follows:—

“Each employee should be granted one month's sick leave with full pay and dearness allowance for every eleven months' service, and it should be allowed to be accumulated throughout the entire period of service. This leave should be available retrospectively from the date of joining of each employee.”

In the report of the Conciliation Officer, in connection with the question of sick leave, it has been stated as follows:—

“Sick leave: 30 days annually subject to medical certificate when absence is over two days (3 days under exceptional circumstances) and subject to a maximum of 12 months in all during the whole of an employee's period of service.

The Union is satisfied with 30 days sick leave with pay and dearness allowance. As regards accumulation of sick leave, the Union contended that there should not be any ceilings. The Union wanted the privilege leave and sick leave to be given effect to from January 1951.

The management was not prepared for the retrospective effect.”

The reason given by Government in connection with sick leave is not factually correct. The Union's demand about giving retrospective effect to the provisions relating to sick leave was not satisfied. The Union's demand that there should be no ceilings in connection therewith was not met. The Union was not satisfied with the same. The reason given by the Government does not apply to those two aspects of the matter. There is no reason given for not referring the dispute in connection with these two matters. The Government will have to consider the question about referring the demand in connection with sick leave to the extent stated above afresh, and if Government decides not to refer the question, Government would be under an obligation to give reasons therefor.

The demand in connection with leave under the heading “General” has not been referred by the Government on the ground that the demand was not reasonable. The reason given is germane to the question of referring or not referring that demand. The contention that Government has adjudicated upon that demand is not tenable.

Then comes the dispute relating to “Standing Orders”. The reason given by Government for not referring the same is as follows:—

“The company is not covered by the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946, but it has agreed to frame service rules providing, inter alia, for classification, leave, retirement, discharge etc.”

The reason given by Government is germane to the question of referring or not referring the aforesaid demand and that reason is not liable to be challenged. It is, however, urged that the company had agreed before the Conciliation Officer to frame service rules providing, inter alia, for classification, leave, retirement, discharge etc. within two months. The conciliation proceedings had ended on March 19, 1957, and the said period of two months would in any event expire by May 19, 1957. It is urged that on the date Government refused to make a reference in connection with that dispute, there was already a breach of the agreement by the company to frame the service rules within the time mentioned by the company. I am informed by Mr. Joshi, the learned counsel for the company, that the service rules have hitherto not been framed.

and that they are in the process of being framed. The fact that the company has failed to frame service rules within the time mentioned by it does not mean that after the lapse of two months the company did not remain under an obligation to frame service rules. The question about the advisability of the Government relying upon an agreement which had not been carried out within the time mentioned by the company is not one which can be agitated before the Court. The Court cannot consider the question of the adequacy of the reason given. The reason given is germane to the question of reference, and the action of Government cannot be challenged on the ground of the alleged inadequacy of the reason given. The Court on a petition for the issue of a writ is not sitting in appeal against the decision of the Government. The objection urged in this connection must fail.

The last item complained of is the item relating to "Mr. Ferns". The reason given by Government for not referring the dispute in connection with that item is as follows:—

"The demand is not reasonable. Shri Ferns had resigned and was offered re-employment later on but he refused to accept it."

The reason given by Government is germane to the matter and it cannot be said that the Government has usurped the functions of an Industrial Tribunal or has adjudicated upon the matter in giving the aforesaid reason. The objection in connection with this item is not tenable.

In the result, the petitioners are entitled to the issue of a writ of mandamus against respondent No. 1 requiring them to reconsider the question of making or refusing to make a reference under s. 12(5) of the Act in connection with the disputes under the headings "Provident Fund" and "Additional gratuity" and "Sick Leave", in so far as the dispute relates to retrospective effect to be given to the provisions relating to sick leave and the imposition of ceilings, taking into consideration only such reasons as are germane to the question of determining whether a reference should or should not be made in connection therewith. The Rule is made absolute to that extent.

The petitioners appealed.

N. V. Phadke, and M. C. Bhandare, for the appellants.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, with R. J. Joshi, for the State.

CHAGLA C.J. This appeal raises some important questions as to the interpretation of s. 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act, and we have listened to a very able argument from Mr. Phadke about the manner in which that section should be construed. It appears that appellant No. 1 which is a union of workers who were employed in respondent No. 2 company made certain demands on March 27, 1956, and as these demands were not accepted by respondent No. 2 company, an application was made to the Conciliation Officer on April 6, 1956. After some preliminary discussions between May and September 1956 conciliation proceedings commenced and ultimately, as unfortunately so often happens in labour disputes, they failed. The Conciliation Officer made a report under s. 12 on April 2, 1957. On July 30, 1957, Government referred to adjudication certain items in the disputes. But they refused to refer certain other items and on August 14, 1957, the Government communicated to the parties the reasons for their refusal. Now, the items which the Government refused to refer were ten. They dealt with pay scales, confirmation, provident fund, additional gratuity, leave, overtime payment, uniforms, allowance, standing orders and the case of one Mr. Ferns. On receiving this intimation, appellant No. 1 and appellant No. 2, who is an employee of respondent No. 2 company, presented this petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the Government to refer these matters for adjudication. Mr. Justice K. T. Desai issued a limited writ of mandamus calling upon the Government to reconsider their decision with regard to the question of provident fund and sick leave. With regard to the rest of the matters, he held that it was not open to the Court to interfere with the decision arrived at by the Government. It is against this decision that this appeal is preferred.

Now, before we go to the merits of the matter, it is necessary to look at the section and to consider what is the obligation of Government under that section. The section came up for consideration in *Firestone T. & B. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan*¹, and in that judgment we pointed out that the expression 'may' referred to in s. 12 refers to a duty imposed upon Government and that, although the Government undoubtedly had been given the power to make a reference, that power had been coupled with a duty and the duty was that if on a perusal of the report Government was satisfied that there was a case for reference, the duty imposed upon it clearly arose and the Government could not refuse to discharge that duty. We also pointed out that the next part of sub-s. (5) made it obligatory upon Government, when it did not make a reference, to record and communicate to the parties concerned its reasons therefor. We were at pains to observe that it was perfectly true that the reasons given by the Government were not justiciable in the sense that the Court would not consider the weight or value or the quality or even the adequacy of the reasons given by the Government; but we pointed out that it was equally clear that the reasons which the Government had to give under this sub-section were reasons connected with the perusal of the report and with Government not being satisfied that there was a case for reference. It was observed that it was because Government was not satisfied that there was a case for reference that the duty to refer did not arise, and what the Legislature required was that Government must give reasons why it was not satisfied that there was a case for reference. It was under these circumstances that we came to the conclusion that the reasons must be connected with the failure on the part of the Government to be satisfied that there was no case for reference. We, therefore, decided what our power in this case was by observing that it was equally clear that if the reasons had no connection, no bearing and no relevance to this question, then they were not reasons at all contemplated by sub-s. (5), and if they were not reasons contemplated by sub-s. (5), then it would be open to the Court to ask Government to give proper reasons which the law required by sub-s. (5). One further observation may be noted:

"A reason which is not germane to the industrial dispute or is not connected with the industrial dispute would obviously not be the reason contemplated by s. 12(5)."

Now, this matter has been further elaborated in this case by Mr. Phadke and his first contention is that it is not open to Government to refuse to refer a matter by deciding the matter themselves. According to him, it is only in a limited class of cases that Government could exercise its powers of not referring a matter for adjudication; and he contends that to the extent that refusal to refer is connected with the merits of the dispute, it is only when the Government comes to the conclusion that the demands made by the workers are frivolous or they are such as no reasonable Tribunal could possibly entertain, that Government can refuse to refer the matter for adjudication. Therefore, according to Mr. Phadke, if the reason given by Government suggests that in exercising their power, they have considered the merits of the matter and have satisfied themselves that on merits the workers had no case, then they are giving a reason which is not a reason contemplated by sub-s. (5). Mr. Phadke uses a rather impressive expression that a distinction must be drawn between deciding a dispute and deciding whether a dispute should be referred to arbitration; and according to him the power of Government is merely to decide whether the dispute should be referred and not to decide the dispute itself. According to him, the Legislature has set up competent Tribunals to decide disputes between the workers and the employers and under sub-s. (5) of s. 12, it is not the function of the Government to arrogate to themselves the power of Industrial Tribunals. Now, in considering this matter, we must not overlook the important object of this legislation and that object is to maintain peace in industry and to bring about good and friendly relations between employers and employees. Section 12 comes into operation only after there is a failure in the conciliation proceedings, and if Mr. Phadke's contention were to be accepted, the result would be this that however intractable the attitude taken up by the workers may be in the conciliation proceedings, when these proceedings fail by reason of that intractability, the Government was bound to refer the dispute for adjudication and it did not have the power to consider whether the offer made by the employer in the conciliation proceedings was a fair and reasonable offer or whether the demands made by the employees were unreasonable demands. To take that view of the matter would be to make the provisions of s. 12 entirely nugatory. It is true, as again pointed out by Mr. Phadke, that under the Industrial Disputes Act, the Government may itself be an employer and Mr. Phadke says that to assume that the Government has the power to go into the merits of a dispute would lead to serious prejudice being caused to the workers when the dispute is between the workers on the one hand and the Government as the employer on the other hand. Now, the fallacy underlying this argument is that the "appropriate Government" referred to in s. 12(5) is not the Government which is acting as an employer in a particular case. That Government is the executive power of the State and when the Legislature entrusts certain power to Government it does so in the hope and expectation that that power would be exercised in the interest of the people at large. When Government is functioning under s. 12(5), it is not functioning in the interest of employers or of employees. It is functioning in the interest of industrial peace and in order to bring about a fair and equitable settlement in the disputes between the parties. Therefore, we refuse to assume that in any dispute—even in a dispute to which Government as employer is a party—Government would not act with that sense of duty and responsibility which the Legislature required of it. It would be improper and in our opinion contrary to the plain language of the section to cut down the power of Government in the manner suggested by Mr. Phadke. It is open to Government and indeed it may be the duty of Government to consider in each case whether conciliation has failed and whether the demands of the workers are such as required adjudication. Not only when the demands are frivolous such as reasonable people would not put forward, but even if they are not justified, even if they are not appropriate in the context of the times or in the context of financial conditions, it would be open to Government not to refer the disputes to adjudication. To suggest that in any decision of Government, the element of decision should be absent is to make s. 12(5) entirely nugatory. Even in the case given by Mr. Phadke, if Government were to come to the conclusion that certain demands were wholly unreasonable or frivolous, even in that conclusion there would be inevitably an element of decision. In this connection, question arises whether the only material which the Government is entitled to consider under s. 12(5) is the report made by the Conciliation Officer. The language of the sub-section is:

"If, on a consideration of the report referred to in sub-section (4), the appropriate Government is satisfied that there is a case for reference..."

What is made obligatory is the consideration of the report of the Conciliation Officer. But the section does not provide that the satisfaction ultimately required by the Government is a satisfaction that can only be based upon the report of the Conciliation Officer. It would, therefore, be erroneous to suggest that it would not be open to Government to rely on other materials, other facts, other statistics other than those which appear in the report of the Conciliation Officer. All that is relevant and germane to the statutory satisfaction can be availed of by the Government in coming to its conclusion. The satisfaction that the Government has got to arrive at is not a judicial or quasi-judicial act. It does not call for any judicial process, although undoubtedly it would be more satisfactory if Government were to discuss various matters in the presence of both the parties before it came to a particular conclusion. But the law does not cast any obligation upon the Government to do so and the very fact that the Legislature has left the matter to the subjective satisfaction of Government clearly shows that any idea or suggestion of judicial process is excluded.

Then, the next question that we have to consider is what is the nature of the reasons which the Government has to record and communicate to the parties under sub-s. (5) when it does not make a reference. Now, in Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan, we laid down that the reasons contemplated under this sub-section were reasons which must be germane to the issue before the Government. It must be relevant to the industrial dispute and to the demands made by the workers, to the answer given by the employer and all matters with which, in substance, the Conciliation Officer was concerned. Therefore, we can straight away exclude one possible reason from the category of the statutory reasons referred to in s. 12(5), and that reason is the reason which we defined and excluded in Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan. Therefore, when reasons are given and the Court is considering those reasons, if the reasons disclose any extraneous matter taken into consideration by the Government, or if they disclose a failure on the part of the Government to take into consideration any relevant factor required by law, undoubtedly the Court would say that these are not the reasons contemplated by the statute. Now, it is obligatory upon the Government to consider the report of the Conciliation Officer. If Government were to state in its reasons that it has not taken that report into consideration, obviously the reason would be bad; equally so as laid down in Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan if the Government takes into consideration the conduct of a worker in deciding whether he is entitled to a bonus or any other circumstance which is foreign to any determination as to the question of the right of a worker to get bonus. But Mr. Phadke has contended for a much wider obligation being cast upon the Government and what he says is that reasons should not be conclusions of fact or expressions of opinion. They should disclose facts and circumstances on the basis of which the conclusion is arrived at. Now, this test would be perfectly sound if the reasons which the Government has to give were subject to judicial review or subject to judicial correction. As we pointed in Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan it is not for this Court to consider the value or quality or even the inadequacy of these reasons and this Court cannot constitute itself a Court of Appeal from the decision of the Government. The very limited jurisdiction that the Court has to exercise is to compel Government to give proper reasons if the reasons given by Government are not reasons which fall within the ambit of s. 12(5). It is true that it would not be sufficient for Government merely to assert ipse dixit and to say that we are not satisfied that a reference should be made. That would be no reason at all. The reason must disclose the mental process which has resulted in Government not being satisfied. The Court would not be concerned with how that mental process worked or how the conclusion was arrived at. But if the conclusion is germane to the failure on the part of the Government to be satisfied, then the Court cannot ask the Government, as it were, to give particulars for the reasons given so that the particulars could be considered and investigated by the Court. Mr. Phadke referred to a legislation, which is not strictly in pari materia but which has some bearing on the question which we are considering, which is well known or notorious whichever way you call it, the Preventive Detention Act. What Mr. Phadke says is that under that law there is an obligation upon the detaining authority to furnish grounds and this Court very early in the history of that legislation held that it was incumbent upon the Government to give particulars in respect of those grounds. Now, the reason for that decision is obvious. The reason was that that legislation gave a statutory right to the detainé to make a representation to the Government against his detention after he had received the grounds and what we said was that if a statutory right of making a representation was given, that should be considered to be an effective right and that right could not be effective if the grounds given were vague and did not contain necessary particulars. Now, applying that principle, if s. 12(5) had given a right to the parties to make a representation to Government against the reasons given by it for not making a reference, then undoubtedly we would have told the Government to give particulars so that that right could be effectively exercised. No such right is given nor is there any right of appeal or review provided against the decision. But says Mr. Phadke there is always the jurisdiction of this Court under the Constitution under arts. 226 and 227. But before a party can invoke the jurisdiction of this Court, he must satisfy us that there is any obligation upon the Government to give particulars, which obligation must be found in the statute itself. If we were to accept Mr. Phadke's argument, then really we would be submitting the reasons to be given by the Government under s. 12(5) to judicial scrutiny and, as already pointed out earlier, that was not the intention of the Legislature. It may then be asked: Why is it then that law requires the Government to give reasons? If they are not subject to judicial scrutiny, if no particulars need be given, if Government can go into the merits of the matter, why provide for something which is so pale and ineffective in its potentialities. The reason for this provision is obvious and, as we shall presently point out, in a well-known House of Lords decision it has been stated that the object of the Legislature of providing for Government giving reasons is to ensure that Government will act with a sense of responsibility. A mere satisfaction without giving reasons is apt to be abused. But when Government has to give reasons, it would apply a much closer mind to the question because otherwise it may not be easy for the Government to give reasons for the decision it has come to. The further reason for making this provision is that reasons given by Government can be subjected to public scrutiny and public criticism and no Government—surely not a democratic Government—would ever take the risk of giving a reason which would be open to public criticism and even condemnation.

Now, there are two decisions both very interesting to which reference has been made by Mr. Phadke. The first is a decision of the House of Lords reported in Allcroft v. Lord Bishop of London, Lighton v. Lord Bishop of London.² That case arose under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, which provided for a representation to be sent to the Bishop of the diocese with a view that he should take specified steps to have the matter of the representation tried in one of the ways prescribed by the Act and then the Act went on to say:

"unless the bishop shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken on the representation in which case he shall state in writing the reason for his opinion."

Now, this case contains many answers to the questions raised by Mr. Phadke. At p. 675 Lord Halsbury gives a conclusive and convincing answer to the contention of Mr. Phadke that it is only when the demands of the workers are frivolous that Government can refuse to make a reference. This is what the Lord Chancellor says (p. 675):

"It is to my mind obvious that if the only discretion intended to be vested in the bishop was 'a particular discretion,' that is to say, whether the complaint was frivolous or that there had been really some infraction of the law, it would have been very easy to find appropriate language to give effect to such a provision; but the language of the Legislature has, I think, been careful to shew that the bishop's discretion is not so fettered, and that the inquiry into all the circumstances of the case is one which may justly include considerations of the good to be done or the mischief involved in proceedings which, unless they obtain the bishop's sanction, cannot proceed."

Just as under the Act which the House of Lords was considering the discretion of the Government here is unfettered and to suggest that Government can only take into consideration only certain facts and not the others is to limit and qualify the discretion which the Legislature has not thought fit to do. At p. 678 in the speech of Lord Bramwell, the learned Law Lord says:

"Then it was said that there was something he had considered which he ought not to have considered, and something he had not considered which he ought to have, and so he had not considered the whole circumstances and them only. It seems to me that this is equivalent to saying that his opinion can be reviewed. I am clearly of opinion it cannot be. If a man is to form an opinion, and his opinion is to govern, he must form it himself on such reasons and grounds as seem good to him", and lower down the page, the Law Lord says:

"Then it is said why if his decisions cannot be reviewed is he to state his reasons? Lindley L.J. has given an excellent answer to this. It is that he may be under the necessity of forming a careful opinion, and one that will bear public examination."

And Lord Herschell, on a reference to the same topic, at p. 681 says:

"It was contended that inasmuch as the Legislature requires the bishop to state the reasons for his opinion, it was contended that these reasons should be reviewed to the extent at least of seeing that the bishop had considered all the circumstances of the case. I can draw no such conclusion. I think this obligation was imposed upon him, in order to secure, as I think it was calculated to do, a careful consideration of the circumstances of the case, and a conclusion for which in the bishop's opinion, he was able to disclose adequate reasons. The knowledge that his reasons would be made public and be the subject of criticism, would manifestly tend to prevent capricious and ill-considered action."

The other judgment is a recent judgment of Lord Greene reported in Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation.³ There the English Court of Appeal was considering the discretion exercised by the Licensing Authority under the Cinematograph Act and the power given to the local Authorities was to allow a licensed place to be open and used on Sundays subject to such conditions as the authority thinks fit to impose and when a local authority granted to the plaintiffs leave for Sunday performances subject to the condition that no children under fifteen years of age should be admitted to Sunday performances with or without an adult, the condition was challenged and the Court held that the local authority had not acted unreasonably or ultra vires in imposing this restriction. At p. 228 Lord Green says:

"...When an executive discretion is entrusted by Parliament to a body such as the local authority in this case, what appears to be an exercise of that discretion can only be challenged in the courts in a strictly limited class of case. As I have said, it must always be remembered that the court is not a court of appeal."

And then the Master of the Rolls says (p. 228):

"...When discretion of this kind is granted the law recognizes certain principles upon which that discretion must be exercised, but within the four corners of those principles the discretion, in my opinion, is an absolute one and cannot be questioned in any court of law", and then he enunciates these principles. The first is that the exercise of such a discretion must be a real exercise of the discretion. If the statute requires the authority to have regard to certain matters, then the authority must have regard to those matters. If the nature of the subject-matter and the general interpretation of the Act makes it clear that certain matters would not be germane to the matter in question, the authority must disregard those irrelevant collateral matters. Bad faith and dishonesty, as the Master of the Rolls says, constitute a class by themselves. Then he considers the argument that was advanced by counsel that the discretion must be exercised with reason and the Master of the Rolls says at p. 230:

"...but once it is conceded, as it must be conceded in this case, that the particular subject-matter dealt with by this condition was one which it was competent for the authority to consider, there, in my opinion, is an end of the case."

He concedes that if a decision on a competent matter is so unreasonable that no reasonable authority could ever have come to it, then the Court can interfere but to prove a case of this kind—and here the Master of the Rolls gives a necessary warning "to prove a case of that kind would require something overwhelming" and he again repeats that the decision of the local authority can be upset if it is proved to be unreasonable. The proposition really means that it must be proved to be unreasonable in the sense that the Court considers it to be a decision which no reasonable body could have come to. He sums up the discussion by saying that (p. 230):

"...The effect of the legislation is not to set up the court as an arbiter of the correctness of one view over another. It is the local authority that are set in that position and, provided they act, as they have acted, within the four corners of their jurisdiction, this court, in my opinion, cannot interfere."

These observations apply in their full vigour to the question of the power of the Government that we are considering under s. 12(5). Mr. Phadke is right that there may be cases where the Court would come to the conclusion that the action of the Government is unreasonable as disclosed by the reasons given by them. But those cases would be extremely rare and it would require, as the Master of the Rolls said, something overwhelming.

One thing more with regard to the law and then we come to the facts. It is clear that when the Court is satisfied that the reasons given by the Government are not proper or not the reasons contemplated by the law, the Court can compel the Government to give proper reasons as indeed the Court did in Firestone T. & B. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan and as the learned Judge did with regard to certain matters. But what is urged by Mr. Phadke is that if Government has given all the reasons and if the Government does not suggest that there are any other reasons and if the Court comes to the conclusion that those reasons are not proper reasons, the Court must perform a ministerial task of referring the matter for adjudication. Now, it is clear that it is only if the Government is satisfied that there is a case for reference that a duty arises to make a reference. The satisfaction of the Government is a condition precedent to the making of the reference. However satisfied the Court may be, the Court cannot place itself in the position of the Government and make a reference by reason of its own satisfaction. As we pointed out in Firestone T. & B. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan we may have an extreme case where the Government were to say: "We are satisfied and yet we do not propose to make a reference." In such a case the Court would have the power to order the Government to make a reference and it is highly doubtful that from the reasons given by the Government it will be possible for the Court to infer that those reasons disclose satisfaction on the part of the Government to make a reference. In such a highly hypothetical eventuality, we do not dispute the power of the Court to compel the Government to make a reference under s. 12(5).

Now, turning to the facts and dealing with each reason given by Government, the first is with regard to pay scales and the reason given by Government is:

"The pay scales in the Company compare favourably with those obtaining in other comparable concerns in Bombay."

Now, it is pointed out that all that the report of the Conciliation Officer on this point stated was that the management also contended that the total emoluments of their employees in each category were higher than concerns comparable to their concern. The management was not prepared to change its scales and the rate of dearness allowance. Now, what is urged is that there was no reference in the report to pay scales in comparable concerns. The only reference was to the total emoluments of the employees and according to Mr. Phadke, the two matters are entirely distinct. Now, the Advocate General has satisfied us that pay scales of comparable concerns were actually annexed in the Memorandum submitted by respondent No. 2 company to the Conciliation Officer and these papers were before the Government when they gave reasons for not referring the question of pay scales for adjudication. In view of what we have said earlier, it is difficult to take the view that this is not a reason which comes within the ambit of s. 12(5).

With regard to the second demand, confirmation, the reason given by the Government is:

"The offer made by the company during the conciliation proceedings to make employees permanent after six months of continuous service is reasonable."

In the report of the Conciliation Officer itself it is stated that the management agreed to make every employee permanent after completion of 6 months continuous service. Now, what is pointed out by Mr. Phadke is that the offer made by the company was a conditional offer and the condition was that the confirmation depended on whether or not there existed a permanent vacancy and that the departmental head should report upon temporary worker's ability as good. It is clear that the offer of the company, whether it was conditional or not, being before the Government and the Government taking a view that the offer was reasonable, the reason does not suffer from any infirmity.

With regard to provident fund and additional gratuity, the learned Judge has taken the view, with which we agree, that it requires reconsideration by the Government, and as the cross-objections filed by the Government, as fairly conceded by the Advocate General in view of our judgment in Firestone T. & R. Co. v. K. P. Krishnan, are not pressed, it is unnecessary to say anything more about these two matters.

Coming to leave, with regard to privilege leave, the reason given by Government is that 21 days privilege leave per year granted by the company is adequate, and the grievance, which seems to us to be justified, of Mr. Phadke is that the Government has not given any reason with regard to the other aspects of the question of privilege leave; one is the question of accumulation and the other is with regard to its retrospective effect. Now, the learned Judge dealing with sick leave, where also Government has not given any reason with regard to this aspect of the matter, has asked Government to reconsider their decision. In our opinion, the privilege leave stands on the same footing as sick leave and we will vary the judgment of the learned Judge by including in it the head of privilege leave among the heads which the learned Judge has referred back to Government for giving proper reasons.

With regard to casual leave, that point has not been pressed by Mr. Phadke.

With regard to leave in general, all that the Government says is that the demand is not reasonable. Now, prima facie we would have taken the view that this is hardly a reason contemplated by s. 12(5), but when we turn to the demand of the employees, the demand is:

"Any leave taken in any year should be treated as part of service of 11 months. Leave should be available according to the convenience of the employees."

And it seems to us that on the face of it, this demand is untenable and the Government was right in characterising it as unreasonable. Even Mr. Phadke could not say anything in support of this rather extra-ordinary demand on the part of the workers.

The demands with regard to overtime payment, uniforms and allowances are not pressed.

With regard to Standing Orders, the reason given by the Government is that the company is not covered by the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946, but it has agreed to frame service rules providing, inter alia, for classification, leave, retirement, discharge etc. Now, what Mr. Phadke says is that it is left to the sweet will of the company to frame Standing Orders or not. Now, the Government points out that there is no obligation upon the company to frame Standing Orders as it does not fall within the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946. But even so, in the interest of industrial peace it has accepted the agreement of the company to frame rules dealing with certain service conditions. We are sure that the company will carry out this agreement. If it does not, it is always open to the employees to raise a dispute with regard to this matter, and we are sure that if such a dispute is raised and the Government finds that the company has not abided by this agreement, it will take necessary action.

Now, finally coming to the case of Mr. Ferns, the reason given by the Government is:

"Shri Ferns had resigned and was offered re-employment later on but he refused to accept it."

Now, in the report of the Conciliation Officer, what is stated with regard to Mr. Ferns is that:

"the Union contended that the management had forced Mr. Ferns to retire and as such he should be given all benefits retrospectively in particular different types of leave, bonus, gratuity, provident fund and medical expenses. The management contended that Shri Ferns had resigned of his own accord, due to ill-health, the management was not prepared to consider the demand."

Now, what is urged by Mr. Phadke is that there is nothing in the report of the Conciliation Officer to suggest that Mr. Ferns was offered re-employment. Now, the fact that Ferns was offered re-employment is stated in the affidavit made by Mr. Brahmabhatt on behalf of the Government and the Advocate General has also pointed out to us that in the notes maintained by the Conciliation Officer, which were before the Government, there is a clear statement that during the conciliation proceedings the company had stated that it had offered re-employment to Mr. Ferns who refused to accept it.

Mr. Phadke also argued that the learned trial Judge should not have referred the matter back to the Government in respect of the heads to which reference has been made but should have issued a writ of mandamus to Government to refer these matters to adjudication. In view of what we have stated earlier in the judgment about the law, it is clear that this contention of Mr. Phadke is untenable and must fail.

Under the circumstances, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the trial Court should be maintained except with the slight modification that the Government will reconsider the question of making or refusing to make a reference under s. 12(5) not only with regard to the disputes under the heads provident fund, additional gratuity and sick leave but also with regard to privilege leave. In substance, the appeal fails.

With regard to the costs, the learned Judge made the order that each party should bear its own costs. It is true that in substance the appellants have failed. But the appeal had raised questions of considerable importance and it is just as well as far as this Court is concerned that the law should be finally settled by the Court. Under the circumstances we think the fairest order to make should be—no order for costs of the appeal and no order for costs of the cross-objections. The order made by Mr. Justice K. T. Desai directing the Government to pay Rs. 75 as costs of an adjournment will be vacated.

Liberty to the appellants' attorneys to withdraw the sum of Rs. 1,000 deposited in the Court.

THE STATE OF BOMBAY v. MORARJI COOVERJI.*

Bombay Land Requisition Act (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), Sec. 6—Intimation of vacancy given by landlord to authorised officer in prescribed form—Intimation sent by ordinary post and beyond time prescribed under s. 6(2)—Intimation received by officer—Whether such intimation effective—Mode prescribed by s. 6(2) that intimation to be given by registered post whether mandatory or directory—Intimation referred to in s. 6(3) whether intimation referred to in s. 6(1) or whether such intimation must fulfil requirements of ss. 6(1) and 6(2)—Failure to give intimation under s. 6(2) whether precludes landlord from giving intimation subsequently—When Court can construe expression "shall" in statute as directory or procedural.

Where an intimation of vacancy of premises was given by the landlord under s. 6(1) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, to an authorised officer, in the prescribed form, but it was given by ordinary post and not within the time prescribed by s. 6(2) of the Act, and it was established that the officer had received it, such an intimation would be an intimation within s. 6(3) of the Act, and the landlord could occupy the premises after the lapse of one month from the date of the receipt of the intimation by the officer and it is not open to the State Government to requisition the premises after the lapse of such period unless there was a fresh vacancy.

In order to get relief from the Court on a writ petition, not only must the petitioner come with clean hands, not only must he not suppress any material facts, not only must he show the utmost good faith, but he must also satisfy the Court that the making of the order will do justice and that justice lies on his side.

The mode prescribed by s. 6(2) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, that the intimation shall be given by registered post is directory.

The intimation referred to in s. 6(3) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, is the intimation referred to in s. 6(1) of the Act.

The failure on the part of the landlord to give the intimation required by s. 6(2) of the Act does not debar him from giving a subsequent intimation.

In order to place a proper construction on the expression "shall" in a statute the Court must look to the scheme of the Act in order to determine what are the consequences which the law has laid down as a result of non-compliance with that mandatory direction. The consequence may be penal, the consequence may be that a particular order passed is invalidated, the consequence may be that a particular right is not acquired or a particular obligation is imposed, or the consequence may be not stated in the law at all. When no consequence is apparent in the law it is possible for the Court to take the view that although the statute has used the expression "shall" it must be construed as being directory or procedural rather than mandatory in the strict sense of the term.

ONE Morarji Cooverji (petitioner) was the manager and karta of a joint Hindu family and as such was the owner of an immoveable property known as Hirji Mansion, situate at Darabshah Road, Bombay. Prior to 1953 flat No. 5 in this building was in the occupation of one Ashraf Dharamsey. The petitioner sent a notice to Ashraf Dharamsey terminating his tenancy as from April 30, 1953, as the said Ashraf Dharamsey was in arrears of rent and had sub-let the premises and as the petitioner claimed that he required the premises reasonably and bona fide for his own use and occupation. petitioner filed a suit for ejectment against the said Ashraf Dharamsey in the Court of Small Causes at Bombay. On September 23, 1953, a decree was passed in the said suit in favour of the petitioner whereunder Ashraf Dharamsey was ordered to vacate and deliver up possession of the flat to the petitioner on or before October 23, 1953. The petitioner in execution of the decree obtained a warrant for possession and on January 18, 1954, the bailiff of the Court of Small Causes delivered to the petitioner possession of the flat with the exception of the kitchen which was found locked. On January 20, 1954, the bailiff also gave delivery of possession of the kitchen by breaking open the lock thereof. On January 27, 1954, the petitioner gave an intimation of vacancy in the official form to the Controller of Accommodation in respect of the flat. The intimation was enclosed with a letter dated January 27, 1954, addressed to the Controller of Accommodation. By that letter the petitioner informed the Controller of Accommodation that the flat was required by the petitioner for "the joint family residential purposes" and that he proposed to use the same as the landlord for the residence of the members of the said joint family. He requested the Controller of Accommodation to sanction his request for retaining the premises for the residential purposes of the members of the joint family. This intimation was received by the Controller of Accommodation on February 1, 1954. This intimation was not given by registered post.

On January 11, 1954, a notification was issued by the Deputy Custodian of Evacuee Property in pursuance of sub-s. (3) of s. 7 of the Administration of Evacuee Property Act, notifying the tenancy rights of Ashraf Dharamsey in the flat as evacuee property. The petitioner filed an appeal against the same and obtained a stay order as the Deputy Custodian was taking steps to obtain possession of the flat. On February 2, 1954, the petitioner by his advocate's letter of that date intimated to the Controller of Accommodation, Bombay, about the said notification issued by the Deputy Custodian of Evacuee Property, about the appeal filed by the petitioner and the stay order obtained by him and requested the Controller to allot the premises in question to the petitioner. It was stated in that letter that if the petitioner lost the appeal before the Custodian of Evacuee Property, he would have no other alternative but to hand over possession of the said premises to the Custodian. On February 12, 1954, the Controller of Accommodation acknowledged receipt of the letter of the petitioner, dated January 27, 1954, giving intimation of the vacancy of the premises and stated that as the property was declared as an evacuee property and vested in the Deputy Custodian of Evacuee Property, the petitioner may report the vacancy to Government if and when he succeeded in the appeal and the property was declared as non-evacuee property. On March 3, 1954, the petitioner having waited for a period of over a month from the date of the receipt by the Controller of Accommodation of the letter dated January 27, 1954, went in actual occupation of the said flat. The petitioner having thereafter realised that some objection may be taken to the intimation of vacancy that had been given, on the ground that it had not been sent by registered post, addressed a letter on November 3, 1954, to the Controller of Accommodation and asked the Controller of Accommodation to confirm if the intimation sent by him was in regular form and complied with all the requirements of law. For the sake of abundant caution, however, the petitioner enclosed therewith an intimation of vacancy in the official form duly signed by him and forwarded the same to the Controller by registered post. By that letter he requested the Controller to let him know whether the first intimation, which had not been sent by registered post, or the intimation which was then being sent by registered post, was complete.

On November 15, 1954, the petitioner through his advocate sent to the Controller of Accommodation a certified copy of the notification issued by the Deputy Custodian of Evacuee Property, dated January 11, 1954. By his letter dated November 30, 1954, addressed to the petitioner the Controller of Accommodation referred to the aforesaid intimation dated November 27, 1954, given by the petitioner and received in the office of the Controller on February 1, 1954, and also to the aforesaid intimation dated November 3, 1954, received in the office of the Controller on November 8, 1954, and stated that as the property vested in the Custodian of Evacuee Property, his office had no jurisdiction in the matter. The petitioner was asked to report the vacancy to the office of the Controller of Accommodation as soon as the appeal filed by the petitioner against the decision of the Deputy Custodian of Evacuee Property had been decided and possession was handed over to the petitioner.

The vacancy in respect whereof the Controller of Accommodation required the petitioner to report was the vacancy which might arise on possession of the flat being handed over to the petitioner on the appeal filed by the petitioner being decided in favour of the petitioner. At this time, the flat in question was in the actual possession and occupation of the petitioner.

The appeal filed by the petitioner before the Custodian of Evacuee Property was allowed and the order of the Deputy Custodian notifying the tenancy of Ashraf Dharamsey in the flat as evacuee property was set aside on the ground that no notice under s. 7 of the Administration of Evacuee Property Act, 1950, had been given to the petitioner, who was interested in the property. The case was remanded back to the Deputy Custodian for a rehearing and decision on the merits after the petitioner and other interested persons, if any, were given an opportunity of being heard. On a rehearing of the matter, the tenancy rights of Ashraf Dharamsey were again declared as evacuee property. The petitioner appealed therefrom to the Custodian of Evacuee Property. On February 1, 1956, the Custodian of Evacuee Property allowed the appeal, holding that "on the date of the notification no property existed which could either be notified or could be taken into possession". He directed the tenancy rights in the flat to be de-notified.

On July 14, 1956, the petitioner received a letter from the Inspector of Accommodation Department calling upon the petitioner to appear before him on July 16, 1956, in connection with the flat with rent receipts, ration cards etc. The petitioner appeared before the Inspector as required. On February 5, 1957, the petitioner received a letter from the Controller of Accommodation stating that there was a suppressed vacancy in respect of the said flat. The petitioner thereafter made a representation in that connection. On May 11, 1957, the State Government passed an order, which ran as follows:—

"Whereas, on inquiry it is found that the premises specified below had become vacant on the 20th day of January 1954.

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by clause (a) of sub-section (4) of section 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948 (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), the Government of Bombay is pleased to declare that the said premises had become vacant after 4th December 1947 and to requisition the said premises for a public purpose, namely, for housing a Bombay State Government Servant.

Premises.

Flat No. 5, 2nd Floor, Hirji Mansion, 4, Darabai Road, Nepean Sea Road, Bombay."

On May 30, 1957, another order was passed authorising Mr. J. B. Desai, an Inspector in the office of the Controller of Accommodation, to take possession of the said flat.

On June 6, 1957, the petitioner filed the present petition for the issue of a writ of mandamus or a writ in the nature of mandamus or a direction, order or other appropriate writ under art. 226 of the Constitution of India against the State of Bombay ordering the State of Bombay to withdraw, cancel and set aside the said requisition order dated May 11, 1957, and the order dated May 30, 1957, and further ordering the State of Bombay to forbear from enforcing and/or taking any steps or proceedings in the enforcement of the said requisition order and the said order dated May 30, 1957. The petition was heard by K. T. Desai J. who held that the order of requisition was invalid and directed the issue of a writ of mandamus, delivering the following judgment on April 29/30, 1958:—

K. T. DESAI J. [His Lordship after stating the facts as above, proceeded:] The vacancy referred to in the order of requisition, dated May 11, 1957, is the vacancy which occurred on January 20, 1954, when the bailiff of the Court of Small Causes completed giving possession of the whole of the said flat No. 5 to the petitioner. The said order proceeds on the footing as if no intimation of vacancy had been given. It is urged on behalf of the petitioner that the vacancy which occurred on that day was the vacancy in respect whereof due intimation had been given by the petitioner, that after the expiration of a period of one month from the date of the receipt of such intimation the petitioner was entitled to occupy the said premises and that he had in fact lawfully occupied the same on March 8, 1954, after the expiration of the said period of one month. It is further urged that the said vacancy having ceased, the Government could not thereafter requisition the said premises as it had purported to do.

The learned counsel for the petitioner relies upon the decision in *Dwarkadas Jivraj v. State of Bombay*¹. In that case Mr. Justice Tendolkar at page 969 observes as under:—

“...Where in the exercise of the rights conferred upon him by sub-s. (3) a landlord proceeds to exercise his rights as a landlord after waiting for a period of one month from the date on which intimation is received and either goes into occupation or lets the premises to a tenant, it appears to me that by that act which is lawful and expressly permitted by the Bombay Land Requisition Act, the vacancy of which intimation was given comes to an end and therefore the right of Government to requisition the premises comes to an end with the termination of the vacancy, as it has been repeatedly laid down that the existence of a vacancy is a condition precedent to the exercise of the power to requisition. Therefore, in a case in which the landlord has so exercised his right, it appears to me that as there is no vacancy the power of Government to requisition comes to an end from the date when the landlord has exercised his rights.”

It is urged on behalf of the respondent that the intimation given in this case on January 27, 1954, is not an intimation in due compliance with the provisions of s. 6(2) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, inasmuch as the said intimation was not given by registered post as required by that section. Strong reliance was placed on behalf of the respondent on an unreported judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Tendolkar in *Sayed Abdul Hamid v. The State of Bombay*². In that case the learned Judge held that no proper notice was given by registered post of the vacancy that had arisen and that any letting of premises without giving such notice did not prevent the State from making inquiries and making the requisite declaration of vacancy and requisitioning the premises. Section 6(2) in terms now provides that “the intimation shall be given by registered post”. It is not disputed that the intimation given on January 27, 1954, was not given by registered post. In view of the aforesaid decision I must hold that the giving of the said notice did not preclude the State from making the requisite declaration after due inquiry and requisitioning the premises even though the premises had been occupied one month after the receipt of the aforesaid notice, dated January 27, 1954.

It is, however, urged on behalf of the petitioner that an intimation by registered post was in fact given on November 8, 1954, that the said intimation was received by an officer authorised in that behalf by the respondent on November 8, 1954, that after the expiry of one month from the date of the receipt of such intimation the petitioner continued to occupy the said premises and that even though the occupation of the said premises by the petitioner prior thereto may not be authorised, the occupation subsequent to the expiration of the period of one month from the date of receipt of the intimation given by registered post became authorised and that from the date of such occupation the vacancy ceased and the Government ceased to have any right thereafter to requisition the premises in respect of the vacancy which had thus lawfully ceased.

It is contended on the other hand on behalf of the respondent that under sub-s. (2) of s. 6, the intimation is not merely required to be given by registered post, but it is required to be given in the case like the one before me "within seven days of the premises becoming vacant or becoming available for occupation". It is urged that as the intimation which was given by registered post was an intimation given more than seven days after the premises became vacant or became available for occupation, it was not a proper intimation as contemplated by sub-s. (2) of s. 6 and that the petitioner was not authorised under the provisions of sub-s. (3) to occupy the said premises so as to terminate the vacancy which had arisen.

It is necessary in order to appreciate the rival contentions to set out the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 6. It runs as follows:—

"A landlord shall not, without the permission of the State Government let, occupy, or permit to be occupied such premises before giving the intimation and for a period of one month from the date on which the intimation is received."

It is urged on behalf of the respondent that the words "before giving the intimation" in that sub-section mean "before giving the intimation by registered post within the time specified in sub-s. (2) of section 6." On the other hand, it is urged on behalf of the petitioner that there is no warrant for adding in that section the words "within the time mentioned in sub-section (2) of section 6." It is further urged that if the words "before giving the intimation" are held to mean "before giving the intimation within the time mentioned in sub-section (2) of section 6", a result would be produced which could never have been contemplated by the Legislature and it would be contrary to the very object and spirit of the Act. Under the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 6 it is provided that any landlord who lets, occupies or permits to be occupied the premises in contravention of the provisions of sub-s. (3), shall, on conviction, be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year and shall also be punished with fine. If the contention of the respondent is accepted, then if seven days once expire after the premises become vacant or become available for occupation without the requisite intimation being given, then thereafter the premises could not be let out or occupied or permitted to be occupied by the landlord without incurring the penalty of imprisonment and fine provided by sub-s. (5), as any notice that may thereafter be given by him would not be an intimation within the period specified in sub-s. (2) of s. 6. The State Government, though it has the power to requisition such premises, is under no obligation to requisition the same. If the contention of the State is accepted, the result would be that a landlord who does not wish to court imprisonment and incur the liability for a fine would have to allow the premises to remain vacant and unoccupied during the subsistence of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, unless in the meantime the Government chose to requisition the premises.

The Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, was enacted in view of the housing shortage prevailing in the city of Bombay. It was never intended that any premises should remain vacant indefinitely. An obligation has been cast upon the landlord to give intimation of the vacancy and not to let, occupy or permit to be occupied the premises for a period of one month after an intimation of such vacancy was received without the permission of the State Government in order to enable the Government to requisition the premises, if it so desired. If the Government did not requisition the premises within the said period of one month then the landlord is at liberty to let, occupy or permit to be occupied the said premises. It could never have been the intention of the Legislature that if on account of sickness, insanity of mind, minority, absence from Bombay, want of knowledge or any other cause, the intimation is not given within a period of seven days after the premises became vacant or became available for occupation, they should be kept vacant or unoccupied during the subsistence of the Act by a law-abiding landlord. Where the Legislature intended to refer to the period within which the intimation is required to be given, it has expressly stated so. The language used in sub-s. (3) of s. 6 may well be contrasted with the language used in sub-s. (5) of s. 6. In sub-s. (5) the words used are as follows:—

"Any landlord who fails to give such intimation within the period specified in sub-section (2) shall on conviction be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months or with fine or with both."

If the Legislature intended by sub-s. (3) to refer also to the time of giving the intimation, it would equally have used the words "before giving the intimation within the period specified in sub-section (2)," instead of the words "before giving the intimation". The contravention of the provisions of sub-s. (2) is constituted a distinct offence punishable separately. The only reasonable construction that could be placed upon the words in sub-s. (2) which would safeguard the rights of the Government to requisition the premises and which would carry out the object and spirit of the Act is that no landlord is entitled, without the permission of the State Government, to let, occupy or permit to be occupied any premises, which have become vacant or become available for occupation, without giving an intimation in the prescribed form by registered post and without waiting for a period of one month from the date on which such intimation is received.

In Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn., p. 229, it is observed as follows:—

"Where the language of a statute, in its ordinary meaning and grammatical construction, leads to a manifest contradiction of the apparent purpose of the enactment, or to some inconvenience or absurdity, hardship or injustice, presumably not intended, a construction may be put upon it which modifies the meaning of the words, and even the structure of the sentence."

In the present case, it is not necessary to modify the meaning of any words or the structure of any sentence to give the meaning to sub-s. (3) of s. 6 which I hold it bears. The meaning which I have given to the words used is the plain, ordinary meaning which the words bear. The construction suggested by the State is one which would lead to inconvenience, absurdity and injustice not intended or contemplated by the Act.

In the present case, the petitioner did give the intimation by registered post on November 3, 1954, and the same was received on November 8, 1954. After the expiry of one month from the date of the receipt of such intimation it would have been lawful for the petitioner to occupy the said premises without incurring the liability provided for by sub-s. (5) if he had not occupied the premises earlier. His continuing in occupation after the said period must be regarded as authorised occupation of the premises with the result that the vacancy which occurred on January 20, 1954, must on such authorised occupation be considered to have ceased to exist and the power of the respondent to requisition the premises on account of such vacancy must equally be regarded as having ceased. In my view, the State Government was not entitled in law to issue the order of requisition, dated May 11, 1957, in respect of the vacancy which arose on January 20, 1954, and to pass the order, dated May 30, 1957, for taking possession of the said premises.

It was urged before me on behalf of the petitioner that under sub-s. (2) of s. 6 a provision has been made for giving the intimation to the Government by registered post for the benefit of the Government, that it is open to the Government to waive that condition and that in the present case the Government has in fact waived that condition. On the other hand, it has been strongly urged on behalf of the respondent that this is a statutory condition the non-observance of which is visited by the Legislature with the penalty of imprisonment and fine and that such a condition is incapable of being waived and has in fact not been waived. It is not necessary for the purpose of the present case to decide these points.

The petitioner has challenged the order of requisition, dated May 11, 1957, also on the ground that by the said order a declaration has been made to the effect that the premises had become vacant after December 4, 1947, and that such a declaration is bad as it refers to a vacancy which may have arisen prior to the coming into force of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, i.e. prior to April 11, 1948. It is further urged that as the said declaration is bad in law, the requisition order itself is bad in law. The order itself recites that the premises had become vacant on January 20, 1954, a date subsequent to the date of the coming into operation of the Bombay Land Requisition Act. I have held in a decision given by me in *Kulsumbai J. G. Padamsey v. The State of Bombay*³ that such a declaration is a valid declaration and that the order is not liable to be challenged by reason thereof. For the reasons given by me in that judgment, I hold that the order is not invalid on the aforesaid ground.

There is no substance in the plea that the order was passed mala fide or that the order indicates a non-application of the mind on the part of the respondent.

It was urged on behalf of the State that the petitioner has not shown abundant good faith, which he is bound to show in proceedings for the issue of a writ, and that he has thereby disentitled himself from claiming any relief. The statements complained of are statements in relation to the occupation of the premises by persons other than the petitioner in the year 1956. The statements made in that connection are totally immaterial for the purpose of the present petition. Even if there was any substance in the complaint of the respondent, the petitioner is not disentitled to relief by reason thereof.

In my view, the order of requisition, dated May 11, 1957, and the order for taking possession, dated May 30, 1957, are bad and are liable to be set aside. The petitioner is entitled to succeed and I direct the issue of a writ of mandamus in terms of prayer (a) of the petition. In view of the fact that the petitioner succeeds only on a ground taken after the case was heard for a considerable length of time, the fair order to make as regards costs is that there should be no order as to costs.

At this stage, without prejudice to their rights and contentions, the parties are agreed that the Government will be at liberty not to deliver up possession of the premises upto June 10, 1958.

The State of Bombay appealed.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, with R. M. Kantawala, for the appellant.
S. V. Gupta, with K. H. Bhabha, R. L. Dalal, Shelton Samuel, and Jivabhai, for the respondent.

CHAGLA C. J. Although this appeal is capable of being disposed of on a very narrow ground, viz., that the petitioner has disentitled himself for any relief from this Court on the ground of misconduct and on the ground that justice is not on his side, as the matter is of considerable importance and has been argued at some length, it is necessary to dispose of the various questions that were argued at the Bar.

The appeal arises out of a petition filed challenging an order of requisition passed by Government on May 11, 1957, and what was requisitioned was flat No. 5 in Hirji Mansions, Darabshah Road, off Nepean Sea Road. It appears that this flat was let by the landlord to one Ashraf Dharamsey, and the landlord, who is the respondent before us, filed an ejectment suit on June 21, 1953, and obtained a decree on September 23, 1953, from the Small Causes Court. By this decree possession was to be given to the landlord within one month. On January 13, 1954, the respondent obtained a warrant of possession. On January 18, 1954, possession was taken of the premises, except for the kitchen and the possession of the kitchen was taken on January 20, 1954. Therefore, the landlord took possession of the vacant premises on January 20, 1954. On January 11, 1954, a notification was issued declaring the tenancy rights in this flat to be evacuee property. On January 27, 1954, the landlord gave intimation to the Controller of Accommodation of this vacancy. The letter was sent by ordinary post, and it is common ground that it was received by the Controller on February 1, 1954. On February 2, 1954, the advocate of the respondent informed the Controller of Accommodation of the proceedings under the Evacuee Property Act. On February 12, 1954, the Controller wrote to the respondent that "since the property is already declared as an evacuee property and vests in the Deputy Custodian of Evacuee Property, you may report the vacancy to Government, if and when you succeed in the appeal and the property is declared as no Evacuee Property." On November 3, 1954, the landlord wrote to the Controller stating that the premises still continued to be notified as evacuee property. He asked the Controller to confirm if the intimation sent by him was in regular form and did comply with all the requirements of law. But he pointed out in this letter that as the intimation of vacancy had to be given by registered post and as that had not been done, by way of abundant caution he was sending an intimation in the prescribed form by registered post, and such intimation was sent by registered post. On November 12, 1954, the Custodian of Evacuee Property allowed the appeal of the respondent and remanded the matter to the Deputy Custodian. On November 25, 1954, the Custodian of Evacuee Property wrote to the Controller that the tenancy rights in respect of the premises prima facie appear to vest in the Custodian and the matter was pending, and he requested the Controller not to take any action in the matter pending the disposal of the matter. The ultimate result of the proceedings taken by the respondent was that the tenancy rights were de-notified by the Custodian on February 1, 1956. On July 14, 1956, an inquiry was held by the Inspector of Accommodation with regard to the vacancy in this flat and statements of the respondent and one Kalyanji Dhanji were recorded. It appears that by this time Kalyanji Dhanji was in occupation of the flat. On May 11, 1957, after the inquiry was held the impugned requisition order was passed. This requisition order relies on the vacancy having taken place on January 20, 1954, and the premises are requisitioned under the powers conferred by cl. (a) of sub-s. (4) of s. 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act. The order of enforcement was issued on May 30, 1957, and the possession was taken on June 7, 1957. The learned trial Judge, after consideration of the law and of the facts and circumstances of the case, came to the conclusion that the requisition order was invalid and gave the necessary relief to the respondent, and the State of Bombay has come in appeal.

The first question that arises is whether the intimation given by the landlord on January 27, 1954, is the intimation required by the law. Turning to the section, s. 6(1) imposes upon the landlord of vacant premises a duty to give intimation in the prescribed form to an officer authorised in this behalf by the State Government. It is not disputed by the State that the intimation was given by the landlord in the prescribed form to an officer authorised in that behalf by the State Government and that intimation was given on January 27, 1954, and was received by the Controller of Accommodation on February 1, 1954. But the difficulty is caused by sub-s. (2) of s. 6. That sub-section provides that intimation shall be given by registered post within one month of the date of the notification in the case of premises which are vacant on such date and in other cases within seven days of the premises becoming vacant or becoming available for occupation. Now, the intimation referred to in sub-s. (2) is undoubtedly the intimation to which reference has been made in sub-s. (4) of s. 6. The law, after imposing the obligation upon the landlord to give an intimation, as prescribed by s. 6(1), proceeds under s. 6(2) to lay down the mode by which the intimation is to be given and the time within which it is to be given. The mode prescribed is registered post and the time, prescribed in this particular case, is within seven days of the premises becoming vacant or becoming available for accommodation. With regard to time, the intimation in this particular case would be in time if it was given on January 27, 1954. There is some controversy about it with which we shall deal later. Admittedly in this case the intimation was not given by registered post and the question that arises for our consideration is whether the failure on the part of the landlord to give intimation by registered post as required by s. 6(2) renders that intimation of no effect. Turning to sub-s. (3) of s. 6 it provides:—

Therefore, this places an impediment in the way of the landlord from making such use as he wants of his premises which have become vacant. He can only make use of these premises after the lapse of one month from the date on which the intimation is received. In other words, during this period Government is given the power to requisition the premises. If they exercise that power within the period prescribed, the premises become requisitioned premises and the premises would be given to such allottee as the Government may nominate. If the Government do not exercise their power, the right of the landlord to make use of his premises arises and on the lapse of that period he may let, occupy or permit to be occupied the premises in any manner he likes. But it will be noticed that if he does not give the intimation he has no right to deal with the premises, and therefore what we have to consider in this case is—what is the proper effect to give to the expression “the intimation” used in sub-s. (3)? The rival contentions are that the intimation referred to in s. 6(3) is the intimation referred to in s. 6(1), and the other contention is that the expression “the intimation” in s. 6(3) is the intimation with all its requirements set out not only in s. 6(1) but also in s. 6(2). In other words, it is only that intimation which is in the prescribed form which is given to an officer authorised in that behalf, which is given by registered post, and which is given within seven days of the premises becoming vacant that constitutes the intimation required to be given by the landlord under s. 6(3), and if any of these requirements is absent a landlord cannot be deemed to have given the intimation required by law. It is, therefore, pointed out that admittedly in this case the intimation of January 27, 1954, was not by registered post and therefore the landlord never gave the intimation, and not having given the intimation the right of the Government to requisition the premises continued and any use that the landlord might make of his premises would be an unauthorised use and any person occupying the premises would be an unauthorised occupant. It is also urged on behalf of the State that the only intimation that a landlord can give is the intimation within seven days of the premises becoming vacant. If that period elapses and an intimation is not given, a landlord can never give the intimation required in s. 6(3). In other words, if the landlord fails to give the intimation with all its requisites as contained in s. 6(1) and 6(2), even though the premises may not be required by the State and even though the premises may not be requisitioned at any time, the landlord has no right at all to let or occupy those premises. In other words, those premises must continue to remain untenanted during the whole period that the Bombay Land Requisition Act is in force. That, indeed, is a startling conclusion to come to, and unless justified by the clear language of the law, the Court would be reluctant to accept such a construction being put upon a law which although intended for social good is also intended to restrict and control the proprietary rights of a landlord.

It is said that the Court must give effect to the mandatory words used by the Legislature in s. 6(2). The Legislature has used the words of obligation when it provides that the intimation shall be given by registered post and within the time mentioned in sub-s. (2). Now, the expression “shall” normally connotes undoubtedly a mandate on the part of the Legislature and also connotes an obligation upon the person or authority to whom the mandate is issued. In order to place a proper construction on that expression the Court must look to the scheme of the Act in order to determine what are the consequences which the law has laid down as a result of non-compliance with that mandatory direction. The consequence may be penal, the consequence may be that a particular order passed is invalidated, the consequence may be that a particular right is not acquired or a particular obligation is imposed, or the consequence may be not stated in the law at all. When no consequence is apparent in the law it is possible for the Court to take the view that although the Legislature has used the expression "shall" it must be construed as being directory or procedural rather than mandatory in the strict sense of the term. The Legislature may be anxious that a particular procedure may be followed. The Legislature may require that procedure to be followed in the interest of the party for whose benefit the direction is laid down. But it does not follow that because the party does not follow that particular procedure or give effect to that particular direction, the result would be so serious or so calamitous as for the party losing his rights to deal with and use his own property. It is clear, in our opinion, that the mode prescribed by s. 6(2) that the intimation shall be given by registered post is directory. It is clearly in the interest of the landlord himself that he should leave no possibility of any dispute about his having given an intimation at the proper time, and therefore the Legislature as a safeguard in his interest has provided that he should give intimation by registered post. But it is too much to suggest that even though in fact intimation has been given and although the intimation is admitted by the State, merely because the landlord has failed to follow the mode prescribed in s. 6(2) he should be totally deprived of the right to make use of his property although the Government may at no time requisition it.

Now, an indication and a very clear and emphatic indication as to what the Legislature thought of this particular provision in s. 6(2) is to be found in s. 6(5) of the Act. That is the penal section and that section provides that:—

"Any landlord who fails to give such intimation within the period specified in sub-section (2) shall, on conviction, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months or with fine or with both and any landlord who lets, occupies or permits to be occupied the premises in contravention of the provisions of sub-section (3), shall, on conviction, be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year and shall also be punished with fine."

Therefore, the first part of sub-s. (5) creates an offence with a certain punishment and the offence consists in failing to give such intimation within the period specified in sub-s. (2). It is clear that "such intimation" refers to the intimation set out in s. 6(1). If the intimation referred to here was the intimation with all its requirements as set out in sub-ss. (1) and (2), then the Legislature would not have proceeded to mention in this part of sub-s. (5) only one requirement of sub-s. (2) because what is made penal is failure to give intimation within the time specified in sub-s. (2). It will be noticed that failure to give intimation by registered post is not made penal. Therefore, the two ingredients to which the Legislature attached the greatest importance were the ingredients with regard to failure to give intimation required by sub-s. (1) and the failure to give the intimation within the time specified in sub-s. (2). The Legislature itself thought that the mode of giving the intimation, viz., by registered post, was not a matter of substance, it was a matter of procedure; it was a matter of detail, the failure to follow which would not and should not result in penal consequences. The second part of sub-s. (5) constitutes an offence with a higher punishment and that offence is constituted by the landlord using the premises in contravention of the provisions of sub-s. (3). Coming back to the provisions of sub-s. (3), it is difficult to take the view that the intimation referred to in this sub-section is not the intimation referred to in sub-s. (1); but the intimation referred to in sub-s. (1) with the additional requirements set out in sub-s. (2). It is undoubtedly true that it is possible to take the one or the other view of the expression "the intimation" in sub-s. (3), but we should rather take the view which will lead to the least inconvenience and which will serve the purpose of the Act without causing unnecessary hardship to the landlord.

Now, if we were to take the view that the intimation refers to an intimation with all its details and requirements as contained not only in s. 6(1) but also in s. 6(2), the result would be that if an intimation is not given by registered post and within seven days, the landlord thereafter could never give an intimation. As already pointed out, he would be perpetually, or at least for the duration of the Act, deprived of his right to deal with the premises although the State may not choose to requisition it. On the other hand, if we place upon the expression "the intimation" the narrower construction, especially in view of what we have already stated with regard to s. 6(5) that the intimation referred to in s. 6(3) is only the substance of the intimation as set out in s. 6(1), then no serious consequences ensue either to the landlord or to the State because the position will be this. So long as an intimation is not given, the State will have the full right to requisition the premises. The Advocate General says that this would give the right to the landlord at any time he thinks proper to give an intimation. Assuming that is so, the only consequence of a landlord giving such intimation would be not to deprive the Government of the right to requisition, but on the contrary it will draw the attention of the Government to a vacancy and will permit the Government to requisition the premises within the time specified in s. 6(3). It is only after the lapse of that time that the right of the landlord to use the premises would arise. If there is a vacancy under s. 6(1) the landlord would not be in a position to make use of those premises. As already pointed out, any use that he might make would be an unauthorised use and any person he might put in occupation would be an unauthorised person. Therefore, it would be in the interest of the landlord himself, if he wants to make use of the premises, to give the intimation, because not only would the landlord be making an unauthorised use of the premises, but he would be liable to penal consequences under s. 6(5). Therefore, it is difficult to understand what possible good the landlord can achieve by not giving the intimation required by s. 6(3).

The Advocate General said that assuming the time mentioned in s. 6(2) has passed, there is no intimation, and Government starts making the inquiry which it has a right to do under the proviso to s. 6(4)(a) to which we shall presently come, and if the landlord gives the intimation subsequently, the inquiry would be rendered futile and serious inconvenience might be caused. Now, the inquiry contemplated by the proviso to s. 6(4)(a) is in cases where no intimation is given. It is a case of what is popularly known as a suppressed vacancy. The landlord having suppressed the vacancy, someone having informed the Controller of such a vacancy, the State launches upon an inquiry as provided in the proviso to s. 6(4)(a). But if the landlord himself comes forward and says that there is a vacancy and gives intimation, we should have thought that the purpose of the Government would be better achieved than by holding an inquiry under the proviso. But the answer of the Advocate General to this contention is that the destination—and this is his expression—of the requisitioned premises in the case of a vacancy declared by the landlord is different from the destination of the vacancy which is found as a suppressed vacancy, and the Advocate General wanted to draw our attention to the policy of Government that when there is a suppressed vacancy, the vacancy should go to the first informant and when intimation was given by the landlord it should be used for a public purpose and given to a Government servant or used for some other similar purpose. Now, in construing the Act we are not concerned with the policy of Government. It is sufficient for us to note that even when an inquiry is being held by Government with regard to a suppressed vacancy, and the landlord gives intimation, the premises would become available for being requisitioned for a public purpose. For what particular public purpose the Government may use that vacancy we are not concerned. There is nothing in the law which compels the Government not to give a vacancy declared by the landlord to a homeless person, nor is there anything in the law which compels the Government to give a suppressed vacancy to the first informant and not to a Government servant. Policy of Government cannot possibly influence us in construing provisions of a law in a particular manner.

Now, sub-s. (4) of s. 6 also throws some light on the construction we should place upon the expression "the intimation" used in s. 6(3). Sub-section (4) provides:

"Whether or not an intimation under sub-section (1) is given and notwithstanding anything contained in section 5, the State Government may by order in writing—" and then follows the power to requisition. Therefore, here the Legislature gives the power to the State to requisition, whether an intimation is given or is not given. Where an intimation is given, the power to requisition is as laid down in s. 6(3). Where intimation is not given, it is dealt with by the proviso to s. 6(4)(a). But the relevant fact to be noticed is that in referring to the intimation in sub-s. (4), the reference is only to sub-s. (1) and not to sub-s. (2). This again shows that what the Legislature was emphasising was the substance and the important ingredients of the intimation which are contained in sub-s. (1) and not in sub-s. (2). Turning to the proviso to sub-s. (4)(a), the proviso deals with a case where no intimation is given and makes an inquiry by Government obligatory and permits the Government to make a declaration with regard to a vacancy which is conclusive.

Therefore, looking at the whole scheme of the Act, it seems to us that the Legislature itself in various parts of s. 6 has made a distinction between the intimation referred to in sub-s. (1) and the other requirements of the intimation referred to in sub-s. (2). It is equally clear that the Legislature has emphasised the giving of intimation in the prescribed form and to an officer authorised in that behalf by the State Government; and that the Legislature has attached less importance to the question of time except to the extent that failure to give this intimation has been made penal; and for the obvious reason that it was the policy of the law that the landlord should report vacancies as soon as possible. But because the policy of the law was to put compulsion upon the landlord to report a vacancy, it does not follow that if the vacancy was not reported in time and if the landlord made himself liable to penal consequences, the landlord was deprived for all time from giving an intimation subsequently; and it is equally clear that the Legislature has laid the least emphasis on one particular aspect of this intimation, which is the mode of giving the intimation, viz., by registered post.

Reliance was also placed at the Bar on a judgment of Mr. Justice Kania in *Nurshedrai B. Dave v. The Asian Assurance Co. Ltd.*¹ There the learned Judge construed a provision in a rule, which required notice to be given by registered post, as mandatory. In that case the learned Judge was dealing with the right of policy holders to elect a director and he was considering the Election Rules, and it is well known that when you construe Election Rules you have to construe them technically and have to take the view that every requirement of the Election Rules is intended to be given effect to. Therefore, the judgment of Mr. Justice Kania is not in pari materia with the question we have to consider under the Land Requisition Act.

Mr. Gupte also referred to another judgment of Mr. Justice Tendolkar in *Jethanand Moorjmal Mehta v. N. S. Varma*², where he seems to have taken a view contrary to the view he took in Sayed Abdul Hamid v. The State of Bombay.³ There the learned Judge was construing r. 117 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955, and sub-r. (1) of that rule provided that every order made under the Act or the Rules shall be served by registered post, and the learned Judge was at pains to repel the contention at the Bar that "shall" was a word of obligation and no order made under the Act or the Rules could take effect until it was served in the manner provided, and the learned Judge says:

"There is no doubt that the rule requires that an order shall be served by registered post but it does not necessarily follow therefrom that if it is not served, it does not take effect. The word 'shall' is undoubtedly a word of compulsion or obligation, but from that alone it does not follow that the rule is mandatory and not procedural only. That a rule has to be observed does not necessarily make it mandatory, because even procedural rules ought to be observed, and whether or not the requirement of rule 117 is mandatory or whether it is merely procedural must be determined having regard to what it provides and the purpose for which the provision is made. Obviously, the particular mode of service, viz., registered post, is merely a convenient method of service and it seems to me difficult to hold that if the order is in fact known to the person who is affected by the order, there yet has to be service by registered post, because the object of service is to acquaint the person affected with the contents of the order so that he can, if he so chooses, seek to challenge it by any method open to him."

With respect, we subscribe to the view taken by the learned Judge in this judgment and, differ from the view taken by the learned Judge in the earlier judgment which is relied upon by the Advocate General.

In passing, a reference might be made to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in State of U.P. v. Manbodhan Lal,⁴ where the Supreme Court, differing from this Court, took the view that the expression "shall" used in art. 320(3)(c) was not mandatory and there was no obligation upon the State Government to consult the Public Service Commission in the cases set out in that article, and the observation in the judgment to which reference might be made is at p. 917:

"This result could not have been contemplated by the makers of the Constitution. Hence, the use of the word 'shall' in a statute, though generally taken in a mandatory sense, does not necessarily mean that in every case it shall have that effect, that is to say, that unless the words of the statute are punctiliously followed, the proceeding or the outcome of the proceeding, would be invalid."

On this view of the law, let us turn to the facts before us and see what is the consequence. We have here an intimation given by the landlord on January 27, 1954. If it was sent on that day, it is sent within seven days. It is in the prescribed form and it is sent to the authorised officer. Admittedly, it is not sent by registered post. Therefore, in the view that we take, it would be an intimation contemplated by s. 6(3), and if that is so, the landlord was within his rights in occupying these premises after the lapse of one month and it was not open to the State Government to requisition these premises on May 11, 1957, unless there was a fresh vacancy. But some difficulty is caused in this case by the fact that there is no clear evidence on the record that the intimation was in fact sent by the landlord on January 27, 1954. All that the record shows is that the particular letter bears the date January 27, 1954, but there is no averment in any affidavit or any oral evidence that the letter was posted on that day. It may be that in most cases when a letter bears a particular date it is posted on that date or it is put by post in transmission. But it is not necessarily so. A letter may be written on a particular day, it may be laid aside, it may be posted on the next day or even a day later; and here we have a fact that the letter was only received by the Controller on February 1, 1954, although the letter was sent from Bombay by post and received in Bombay by post. It may be that there was delay in the post office, it may equally be that the letter was posted after January 27, 1954, but we agree with the Advocate General that it is difficult to take the view on the record as it stands that the intimation was given within the time prescribed by s. 6(2). But even so it would be an intimation within the meaning of s. 6(3), because it is an intimation in the prescribed form and it is given to an officer authorised in that behalf, and as it was admittedly received on February 1, 1954, the landlord was debarred from making use of his property for one month from February 1, 1954.

Now, the learned Judge came to the conclusion that this was not an intimation within the meaning of s. 6(3) by reason of an unreported judgment of Mr. Justice Tendolkar in Sayed Abdul Hamid v. The State of Bombay. With great respect to the learned Judge, the view that he took was, having called to his assistance the provisions of the General Clauses Act, that the provision in the Act before it was amended by Act V of 1952 which required the intimation to be given by post, that post must be read as registered post and that it was obligatory upon the landlord to give intimation by registered post, and he refused to permit evidence being led to prove as a fact that intimation had been received by Government. His view was that if the intimation was not sent by registered post, the intimation was not the intimation required by law. As this was a judgment of a co-ordinate authority, Mr. Justice K. T. Desai felt bound to follow it and, therefore, he came to the conclusion that in this case the intimation of January 27, 1954, was not the intimation required by s. 6(3). Now, we have had a look at the judgment. In our opinion, again with respect, the construction placed by the learned Judge on s. 28 of the Bombay General Clauses Act is not warranted by the language used by that Act. But that is a question that does not arise in this appeal. But we are unable to agree with the learned Judge that the failure to comply with any of the requisites contained in s. 6(2) with regard to the intimation makes that intimation one which does not fall under s. 6(3). In other words, the view taken by the learned Judge was that the intimation referred to in s. 6(3) is not only the intimation referred to in s. 6(1) but with all the requisites set out in s. 6(2). In view of what we have stated, that view does not commend itself to us. The Advocate General has strongly emphasised the fact that after this judgment of Mr. Justice Tendolkar, the Legislature altered the law and substituted "registered post" for "post". From that he wants us to draw the inference that the Legislature adopted the view of Mr. Justice Tendolkar, and instead of leaving the matter to the General Clauses Act, the Legislature incorporated in the Act itself the provision that the intimation should be by registered post. Now, in the first place, the judgment of Mr. Justice Tendolkar was an unreported judgment, and there is nothing before us to show that it was the result of that judgment which led to this legislative amendment. But assuming that was so, all that it means is that the Legislature thought in the interest of the landlord that he should send the intimation by registered post rather than by ordinary post. Even so, the requirement with regard to registered post still remains directive and not mandatory in the sense in which we have explained the expression.

The view of the learned Judge below was that even assuming this intimation was not a proper intimation, the landlord was entitled to rely on the subsequent intimation of November 3, 1954, which was admittedly by registered post, in the prescribed form, and sent to the requisite authority. Of course, the objection taken by the Advocate General to this intimation is that it was not sent within the period prescribed by s. 6(2). But as we have already pointed out, the failure on the part of the landlord to give the intimation required by s. 6(2) did not debar him from giving a subsequent intimation. It only prevented him from making use of the premises because he could not make use of his premises in a authorised manner till he had given the intimation and till the period mentioned in s. 6(3) had elapsed.

Therefore, whichever way one looks at it, the requisition order passed by Government on May 11, 1957, is not justified by law. It was passed after the lapse of the period mentioned in s. 6(3), whether the period commenced from February 1, 1954, when the intimation of January 27, 1954, was received, or it commenced from November 8, 1954, when the second intimation was received by the Controller.

But it is not sufficient that a party should come to this Court and make out a case that a particular requisition order is not valid. In order to get that relief from the Court on a writ petition, not only must he come with clean hands, not only must he not suppress any material facts, not only must he show the utmost good faith, but he must also satisfy the Court that the making of the order will do justice and that justice lies on his side. The Advocate General has drawn our attention to the rather curious attitude taken up by the petitioner with regard to this intimation of January 27, 1954. In his petition as originally presented he relied on a vacancy of October 23, 1953, and he relied on an intimation of November 27, 1953, and he actually denied any knowledge about the intimation of January 27, 1954. Now, this was partly due to the confusion created by the letter written by the Controller himself by which he erroneously referred to the intimation of January 27, 1954, as of November 27, 1953, having been received on February 1, 1954. But this particular fact would not have induced us to refuse relief to the petitioner. This is not a case where the intimation of January 27, 1954, is being challenged as a fabricated document, in which case we would certainly consider the averments of the petitioner with regard to this document. It is an admitted document and whatever the petitioner might have said about this document, the undisputed fact remains that he did send it to the Controller and the Controller received it.

But the position is different with regard to what happened after the intimation was sent by the landlord and the use that he made of the premises and the statements that he made with regard to that use. It appears from the record that for about a year preceding the requisition order, one Kalyanji Dhanji was occupying this particular flat, the landlord and his family were occupying the adjoining flat, and the curious case put forward by the landlord on the affidavits was that this Kalyanji was a relation of his, that he was staying as a guest, that he had his own kitchen and cooked his own food, and that technically the premises were still in his occupation. Now, we have before us the statement of this Kalyanji himself and he admits that for one year he had been staying in this flat with the members of his family, that he was cooking independently in this flat and making payments to the cook and servant. He said that he was not paying any rent to the landlord who was his relative. But he had furniture in this flat—cupboards, tables, chairs, etc.—, although some furniture belonged to the landlord, and that he had his visiting card where he showed his business office as in this flat. Now, the traditions of Indian hospitality are very great, but the manner in which Kalyanji stayed in this flat is not quite in conformity with those traditions. We have a person who is described as a guest, who does his own cooking, who pays his own servants, who carries on business, and who prints on his card the business address of this flat. But whatever that may be—and Mr. Gupte is right that it is a disputed fact on the record—, whether Kalyanji was a mere guest as the landlord alleges, or was a licensee, or an invitee, or even a tenant of the landlord as suggested by the State, the important fact that emerges is that the landlord was not actually in occupation of this flat for a year before it was requisitioned and it was in the occupation of this Kalyanji. At the date of the petition Kalyanji had left, the premises were requisitioned, a Government officer was put in possession, and the result of setting aside this requisition order would be to throw this Government servant out and restore possession to the landlord when in fact the landlord was not staying there. There is also force in the Advocate General's contention that on the record it would be open to the Government to requisition these premises afresh on the ground of vacancy constituted by Kalyanji Dhanji leaving these premises, and that the Court will not make an order which could be, in substance, set aside by the Government issuing a fresh requisition order. This is not a case where a landlord has been deprived of his possession. This is not a case where a tenant in occupation has been thrown out. This is, on the contrary, a case where the premises requisitioned for a public purpose are occupied by a Government servant and are sought to be taken possession of by the landlord by asking the Court to throw the Government servant out and restore possession to the landlord when that landlord has never shown his need of those premises by occupying them himself. Therefore, this is clearly a case where justice is not on the side of the petitioner; it is on the side of the State, and we see no reason why we should grant any relief to the petitioner.

We would not have interfered if the learned Judge had exercised his discretion in favour of the petitioner. But as appears clearly from the judgment, this is not a case where the learned Judge has exercised his discretion. On this aspect of the matter the learned Judge says:

"It was urged on behalf of the State that the petitioner has not shown abundant good faith, which he is bound to show in proceedings for the issue of a writ, and that he has thereby disentitled himself from claiming any relief. The statements complained of are statements in relation to the occupation of the premises by persons other than the petitioner in the year 1956. The statements made in that connection are totally immaterial for the purpose of the present petition. Even if there was any substance in the complaint of the respondent, the petitioner is not disentitled to relief by reason thereof."

With respect to the learned Judge, the matter is much more serious than merely the question of this particular vacancy of 1956 not being relevant to the vacancy which is the subject-matter of the requisition order. On a writ petition, as we have already said, the petitioner has not merely to show good faith, but he has not to suppress any facts and has also to show that justice lies on his side. If the learned Judge had taken these circumstances into consideration and then had come to the conclusion that the discretion should be exercised in favour of the landlord, then undoubtedly we would not have interfered with the order passed by the learned Judge.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal will be allowed, the order of the trial Judge will be set aside, and the petition will be dismissed. There will be no order as to costs of the petition and no order as to costs of the appeal.

EAST INDIA TRADING CO., NEW YORK v. BADAT AND COMPANY, BOMBAY.

Foreign judgment—Decree passed by foreign Court on award of domestic tribunal—Suit by plaintiff based on award—Pleadings establishing that defendants carrying on business within jurisdiction accepting terms of business including submission to arbitration—Whether cause of action had arisen within jurisdiction—Suit on award where foreign judgment passed on it whether maintainable—Whether suit can be filed only on award enforceable as such—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Secs. 13, 14—Award given by domestic tribunal not set up by laws of foreign country—Whether open to party to such award to contend that award not given on merits—Whether an ex parte decision necessarily a decision not on merits—Copy of judgment of foreign Court duly certified by legal keeper thereof and with proper certificate from Indian Consul but evidence to prove character of such document not led—Whether such document admissible in evidence—Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), Secs. 78(6), 74(1) (iii).

A suit was filed in the High Court by the plaintiffs, a company incorporated in the State of New York, which was based on an award given by a domestic tribunal in New York and on which award a decree was obtained from the Supreme Court of the State of New York. It was established on the pleadings that the defendants, who were alleged to be carrying on business in Bombay, had accepted the terms of business in Bombay which terms of business included a submission to arbitration to the tribunal in New York. On the question whether the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit, it was contended by the defendants that no part of the cause of action had arisen in Bombay, that as a foreign judgment was passed on the award, the only suit that could be filed was a suit on the foreign judgment and not on the award and that a suit could be filed only on an award which was enforceable by itself and which did not require in any way to be completed in order that it should become enforceable:—

Held, that the agreement to go to arbitration constituted an important material and necessary part of the cause of action and that part of the cause of action had arisen in Bombay, that as it is open to a party who has obtained a foreign judgment to sue in the alternative on the original cause of action which resulted in his obtaining the foreign judgment, it was competent to the plaintiffs who had obtained a foreign judgment on the award to rely on the original cause of action which in the present case was the award, that the plaintiffs were suing on the award which could be enforced in the State of New York and it was made enforceable and complete by obtaining the foreign judgment, and that, therefore, the suit on the award was maintainable and the Court had jurisdiction to hear the suit on the award.

Oppenheim & Co. v. Mahomed Haneef,¹ referred to.

Section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is wide enough to permit the Court to raise a presumption not only with regard to oral evidence, but also with regard to documentary evidence.

Where a copy of the judgment of a foreign Court duly certified by the legal keeper thereof and with a proper certificate obtained from the Indian Consul was sought to be admitted in evidence but its production was objected on the ground that under s. 78(6) of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, further proof of the character of the document according to the law of the foreign country was not given:—

Held, that this was a clear case where the necessary presumption as to the character of the document could be drawn under s. 114 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and, therefore, the failure to tender formal evidence as to the nature of the document did not prevent the document from being admitted into evidence.

Where an award is given by a tribunal selected by the parties and when the tribunal is a domestic tribunal and not a tribunal set up by the laws of a foreign country, it is not open to a party, who is a party to the award, to contend that the award was not given on merits. If the award was given against the rules of natural justice or it was fraudulently obtained, the party may not be prevented from putting forward that contention.

It is only in those cases where the Court for some reason or other passes a judgment against a party without investigating into the merits of the matter that it could be said that the decision is not given on the merits. The mere fact that the decision is ex parte, the mere fact that the defendant after being served does not choose to appear, does not make an ex parte decision a decision not on merits.

Keymer v. Visvanatham Reddi,² referred to.

There are cases where it can be said that a Court or a tribunal has not considered the point and therefore the decision, in the absence of such consideration, is not a decision on a particular matter. But there are also cases where the point is so obvious that it would have been taken if it was a good point, and then it is open to the Court to say that indirectly the matter has been decided by that Court because the decision was not based upon the acceptance of that particular submission.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. R. Parpia, with M. S. Sanghvi, for the appellants.

J. M. Thakore, with P. B. Vakil, for the respondents.

CHAGLA C.J. This is an appeal against a judgment of Mr. Justice Mody and the learned Judge begins his judgment by stating: "This is a normal case wherein abnormal developments have taken place." We wholly subscribe to that proposition. We might add that this is not only a normal case but a very simple case where every conceivable technical defence has been taken in order to put off the evil day when judgment will be passed against the respondents, who are the defendants in the suit. Mr. Thakore, who has done his best for his client, realising how dishonest the defence was and arguing before what he might have felt a very hostile Bench, did not omit to put before us every possible circumstance which could help his clients. But the more he argued the more we felt that the attempt was, as Mr. Thakore frankly conceded, to see that the judgment was delayed as far as possible, and Mr. Thakore also told us that as his clients were not in a position to pay any amount at all it did not matter to them whether heavy costs were incurred and the litigation became as protracted as possible. According to Mr. Thakore, his clients might as well be adjudicated insolvent for a larger amount as for a smaller amount, and perhaps they prefer to be adjudicated later for a larger amount than for a smaller amount at present.

Now, the suit out of which this appeal arises is substantially based on a foreign judgment and in the alternative on an award given by a domestic tribunal functioning in New York and the judgment and the award came to be given under the following circumstances. The plaintiff company was incorporated in the State of New York and the defendant company, it is alleged, was at the relevant time carrying on business in Bombay, and the case of the plaintiffs was that by two letters dated September 7, 1948, and September 13, 1948, the first written by the plaintiffs and the second by the defendants, the terms of business were agreed upon between the parties. The terms with which we are concerned were that the business was to be done on the terms of the American Spice Trade Association contract with a letter of credit to the extent of 95 per cent. to be opened by the plaintiffs. Pursuant to these terms of business, according to the plaintiffs, two contracts were entered into. By these contracts it is alleged by the plaintiffs that the defendants agreed to sell certain number of tons of spices to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs opened the letter of credit as required by the terms of business, but ultimately the defendants failed to supply the goods and committed a breach of the contract. Thereupon, pursuant to the American Spice Trade Association contract the plaintiffs required that the dispute between the parties should be referred to arbitration. It was so referred, although the defendants did not nominate their own arbitrator or appear before the arbitrators who ultimately entered upon the arbitration. An award was made and a decree was obtained on this award from the Supreme Court of the State of New York. The plaintiffs then came to this Court to enforce that foreign judgment and in the alternative they asked for relief on the basis of the award itself. The learned Judge raised various issues and ultimately dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The first issue that we have to consider is the issue of jurisdiction. Now, it is normal to look to the jurisdiction clause in the plaint in order to ascertain what are the various facts on which the plaintiff is relying as conferring jurisdiction upon the Court, and when we turn to para. 10 of the plaint it is averred:

"The defendants used to carry on business and reside in Bombay. Their present whereabouts are not known. But the terms of business were accepted by the defendants in Bombay and the proposal of acceptance of the said contracts by the defendants took place in Bombay. The defendants' refusal to pay the said sum also took place in Bombay. A material part of the cause of action took place in Bombay and with leave granted under clause 12 of the Letters Patent this Hon'ble Court has jurisdiction to try this suit."

In fact leave was granted under cl. 12. Considering this paragraph it is clear that the averments with regard to the carrying on of business and residence in Bombay cannot confer jurisdiction upon the Court. The defendants must carry on business or reside within jurisdiction at the date when the plaint is presented to the Court and the fact that the defendants used to carry on business or used to reside in Bombay cannot help the plaintiffs to invoke the jurisdiction of this Court. Mr. Thakore may be right that to the extent that the suit is based on a foreign judgment, there is no necessary averment which would confer jurisdiction upon the Court. The foreign judgment was passed in New York and the defendants did not reside and carry on business within jurisdiction at the relevant date. The only way that jurisdiction could possibly have been attracted was by an averment that there was an obligation under the judgment on the part of the defendants to pay the amount in Bombay or that the defendants had undertaken the obligation to pay the judgment amount in Bombay. There is no such averment in the plaint, and in the absence of any such averment, if the plaint had been based only on the foreign judgment then we might have agreed with the learned Judge and held that the Court had no jurisdiction. But it is unnecessary finally to decide this matter.

We must now turn and consider whether the Court has jurisdiction if the suit is based on the award given by the domestic tribunal in New York. For that purpose the necessary averment is to be found in para. 10 of the plaint and that averment is that the terms of business were accepted by the defendants in Bombay and the proposal or acceptance of the said contracts by the defendants took place in Bombay. The learned Judge has taken the view that this averment is not an averment of fact but it is a submission of law. Although the latter part of this sentence may be characterised as a submission of law, it is difficult, with great respect to the learned Judge, to take the view that the statement that the terms of business were accepted by the defendants in Bombay is a submission of law and not an averment of fact. When we turn to the written statement, para. 15, which deals with this paragraph of the plaint, states:

"With reference to paragraph 10 of the plaint the defendants deny that any of the partners of the defendants reside and/or carry on business in Bombay. The defendants submit that no part of the cause of action has arisen in Bombay. The defendants therefore submit that leave granted to the plaintiffs under clause 12 of the Letters Patent should be revoked."

It is clear that the only averment of fact in para. 10 of the plaint which is denied by the draftsman is the averment that the defendants or any of the partners of the defendants reside or carry on business in Bombay. The averment that the terms of business were accepted by the defendants in Bombay has not been denied, and accepting that averment, the draftsman goes on to say:

"The defendants submit that no part of the cause of action has arisen in Bombay."

Mr. Thakore sought to argue that in the submission that no part of the cause of action has arisen in Bombay was implicit the denial that the terms of business were accepted by the defendants in Bombay. We refuse to put that interpretation upon para. 15. The written statement has been drafted by a senior and experienced counsel and Mr. Thakore found himself in this difficulty from stage to stage that the counsel not only was experienced and able but was also extremely conscientious because having the correspondence before him, as we shall point out later, it was impossible for him to allege that the terms of business had not been accepted by the defendants. Therefore, if there is no denial of the specific averment in para. 10, then we must by the rules of pleadings come to the conclusion that this averment has been accepted in the written statement. Therefore, we find ourselves in this position that the defendants accepted the terms of business in Bombay, which terms of business included a submission to arbitration. If, therefore, a suit can lie on an award, then we have here pleaded a necessary ingredient of the cause of action on the award, viz., that the agreement to submit disputes to arbitration was arrived at in Bombay. Whether the averment is proved or not is a different matter, but if that averment is established, it is difficult to contend that in a suit on an award the agreement to go to arbitration does not constitute an important material and necessary part of the cause of action, and if that part of the cause of action has arisen in Bombay the Court has undoubtedly jurisdiction.

It was then sought to be argued by Mr. Thakore that it is not competent to the plaintiffs to file this suit on the award, because the award has become merged in the foreign judgment, and Mr. Thakore urged before us that once a foreign judgment is passed on the award, the only suit that can be filed is the suit on the foreign judgment and not on the award. Now, it is clear and well established law that it is open to a party who has obtained a foreign judgment to sue in the alternative on the original cause of action which resulted in his obtaining the foreign judgment. Mr. Thakore does not dispute that principle of law, but he says that whatever may be the law with regard to a foreign judgment obtained on a contract or any other cause of action, that principle does not apply when a party obtains an adjudication from a domestic tribunal and then goes to a competent Court and obtains a decree or a judgment on the award. Apart from authorities, it is difficult to understand how the two positions can be distinguished on principle. If it is open to a party suing on a foreign judgment to rely in the alternative on the original cause of action, we should have thought that it would be equally competent to a party who has obtained a foreign judgment on the award to rely on the original cause of action which in this case happens to be the award. Therefore, the award is as much a cause of action quas the foreign judgment as a contract or any other right which the party has litigated and which has resulted in a foreign judgment. Instead of going to Court on the contracts which were entered into between the parties and obtaining a decree, the parties here first went to the domestic tribunal, obtained the award, and then proceeded to complete the award and make it enforceable by obtaining a judgment. Therefore, in this case, the cause of action was constituted by the award and the judgment was obtained because the plaintiffs had the award in their favour. Therefore, it would seem to us that on principle there is no reason why the plaintiffs should be debarred from relying on the award as the original cause of action which resulted in the foreign judgment being obtained.

The next contention of Mr. Thakore is that even so the only award on which a suit can be filed is an award which is enforceable by itself and which does not require in any way to be completed in order that it should become enforceable, and what is said is that in this case the award of the domestic tribunal in New York could not have been enforced as such. The parties had to go to the New York Supreme Court and obtain a judgment on it before it became enforceable, and it is said on authorities that such an award cannot be the subject-matter of a suit. Again, first looking to the principle of the matter, it may well be said that an award which is incomplete and unenforceable cannot be made a subject-matter of a suit, and that before a party can file a suit on the award he must make the award enforceable. In this case, if that be the true principle, that objection cannot survive because by obtaining a foreign judgment the plaintiffs have made the award enforceable and they are suing on an award which is not unenforceable but which has been made enforceable and which has been completed in every legal manner. But we fail to understand the principle of the submission made by Mr. Thakore that even though the award has been made enforceable and has been completed, still the party cannot sue on it because this award was not enforceable as such; that it could not be enforced without the aid of a competent Court in New York.

In our opinion, the matter is really concluded by a decision of the Privy Council which though not directly deciding these two questions indirectly has decided these questions, because it is patent from that decision that if these were good submissions in law they would have been urged before the Privy Council and the Privy Council would not have decided the matter as it did.

There are cases where it can be said that a Court or a Tribunal has not considered the point and therefore the decision, in the absence of such consideration, is not a decision on a particular matter. But there are also cases where the point is so obvious that it would have been taken if it was a good point, and then it is open to the Court to say that indirectly the matter has been decided by that Court because the decision was not based upon the acceptance of that particular submission. Turning to the Privy Council case, it is *Oppenheim & Co. v. Mahomed Haneef*¹. In that case, as the facts at p. 501 show, the appellants filed a suit against the respondent in the High Court of Judicature at Madras claiming a certain amount under a foreign judgment or in the alternative being the amount of the award. The respondent pleaded that the judgment of the High Court of Justice in London was not binding upon him as it was not given on the merits, that the claim under the contract was barred by limitation, and as to the award, it was not binding upon him as no notice was given to him by the arbitrator that he was proceeding to arbitrate. The suit was heard by Mr. Justice Coutts Trotter and he decided in favour of the plaintiffs on the award. There was an appeal to the Division Bench of the Madras High Court and the Division Bench reversed that decision, and the appellants came before the Privy Council, and it is to be noted that the respondent did not appear and the appeal was heard ex parte. We are specially mentioning this fact in order to emphasise that the Privy Council would have been even more careful in considering every possible defence that was open to the respondent as he was not represented before them. The Privy Council upheld the decision of the trial Court, thereby, as we said, indirectly repelling both the contentions of Mr. Thakore. The Privy Council had before it an award which according to Mr. Thakore was merged in the foreign judgment, and still the judgment was given on the award. The Privy Council had before it an award which was not enforceable as such because a decree on the award had been taken before the High Court of Justice in London. Both the features on which emphasis has been placed by Mr. Thakore were present in the case of the Privy Council. Notwithstanding these features, the Privy Council gave to the plaintiffs a decree on the award.

Strong reliance has been placed by Mr. Thakore on a statement of the law appearing in Russell on Arbitration. The two propositions of law are:

"An award made by foreign arbitrators, which requires an enforcement order to render it enforceable by the local law, is not a judgment of a foreign tribunal which can be enforced by action in English Courts."

This is a proposition, with respect, which is perfectly correct. Therefore, the learned author is dealing with an award which is unenforceable. Then comes the next proposition:

"But an award which is complete and could be enforced in the country where it was made is enforceable in England at common law, quite apart from any rights given by part II of the Act."

Mr. Thakore wants to read into this statement the words which do not appear there and the words are:

"But an award which is complete and could be enforced as such in the country where it was made."

Now, there is no warrant for reading these words into the statement of the law. As it stands, the statement, again with respect, is perfectly correct. If you have an award which is complete and could be enforced in the country where it was made, then it is enforceable in England. We have here an award which could be enforced in the State of New York and was made enforceable and complete and it is on that award that the plaintiffs are suing in this Court. We have had a look at the judgment on which reliance is placed by the learned author for these two statements of the law, and that is the case of Merrifield, Ziegler & Co. v. Liverpool Cotton Association,² and Mr. Thakore concedes that that authority is not a proposition for the submission for which he is contending.

Therefore, in our opinion, the plaintiffs' suit on the award was maintainable, and the Court had jurisdiction to hear the suit on this award.

Now, we must deal with a series of technical objections which were taken in the Court below with regard to the admission of certain documents. The first objection was to admitting the judgment given by the Supreme Court of New York on the award, and the view taken by the learned Judge was that the record of the Supreme Court was not certified as required by the provisions of the Evidence Act. Turning to the provisions of the Evidence Act, s. 74 defines "public documents" and the one with which we are concerned is cl. (1) (iii)—documents forming the acts or records of the acts of public officers, legislative, judicial and executive, of any part of India or of the Commonwealth, or of a foreign country. We are here concerned with the acts or records of the acts of judicial public officers of a foreign country. Turning now to s. 78, it deals with the proof of official documents, and it provides—

"The following public documents may be proved as follows (and we are concerned with cl. 6):

(6) public documents of any other class in a foreign country, by the original, or by a copy certified by the legal keeper thereof, with a certificate under the seal of a notary public, or of an Indian Consul or diplomatic agent, that the copy is duly certified by the officer having the legal custody of the original, and upon proof of the character of the document according to the law of the foreign country." Now, the appellants submitted the record of the Supreme Court with the certificate obtained from our Consul General in New York. That certificate was found to be unsatisfactory and not in compliance with the requirements of s. 78(6) and so a fresh certificate was obtained. This certificate was to the following effect:

"This is to certify (a) that the annexed proceedings have been duly had in accordance with the laws of the State of New York.

(b) that the annexed proceedings are duly certified by the officer having the legal custody of the originals thereof at the time such annexed proceedings were issued by the Supreme Court of New York.

(c) that the several persons named in the annexed proceedings as holding the respective offices stated therein in respect of each of them did in fact hold such respective office at the time the same took place."

We have the certificate of the County Clerk and Clerk of the Supreme Court of New York who has annexed the seal of the Supreme Court and which has been attested by one of the Justices of the Supreme Court and who certifies that the seal is in proper form affixed by the County Clerk, and then there is a further attestation by the County Clerk who certifies that the Hon. John E. Mc. Gheenan who is the Justice who testified to the fixing of the seal by the County Clerk is a Justice of the New York Supreme Court. It is difficult to imagine a certificate given with more elaboration or more thoroughness or completeness than the certificate that was produced by the appellants. But even so, the production of the record of the Supreme Court was objected on the ground that although the certificate of the Consul General might be in proper form, s. 78(6) further required proof of the character of the document according to the law of the foreign country and the appellants not having led any evidence as to the character of the document according to the law of the foreign country, the document was not proved as required by s. 78(6). The appellants wanted to rely on an affidavit produced by a citizen of the United States to prove the character of this document and that affidavit was also not allowed to be used.

Now, the Evidence Act is a very technical Act and a party is undoubtedly entitled to insist on every technicality being complied with. Fortunately for this Court, large amount of commercial litigation has gone on for years on the Original Side where solicitors and counsel have never insisted on any technical defence being pressed when the document on the face of it is a genuine document. It is very rare that a party objects to the record of the Supreme Court of a State in the United States being produced, although bearing all the insignia of genuineness and a certificate by the Consul General, on the technical ground that there is no proof as to the character of this document. In our opinion, work would become impossible on the Original Side if a little element of commonsense was not introduced into the application of the Evidence Act. Of course, the learned Judge is helpless if parties insist on the technicalities, but the question of mode of proof is entirely left to the good sense of the parties. No one suggests that if a document is inadmissible the parties by their consent can make it admissible. But if a document is admissible and when it is clearly genuine, to insist on technical proof is really to forget the substance for the letter of the law. We do not blame Mr. Thakore for having insisted upon every technicality in the conduct of this appeal because he told us that the instructions given to him were that he must resist the plaintiffs' suit on every available defence open to him. But let us see whether even this strict technicality of the Evidence Act has not been complied with.

It is clear that the proof required by s. 78(6) is for the purpose of the Court being in a position to decide whether a document is a document which falls within the definition of "public documents" in s. 74, because unless the character of the document is that it is an act of a public officer, legislative, judicial or executive, it would not be a public document. Can there be any doubt in this case that the document sought to be tendered was a public document within the meaning of s. 74? It is difficult to understand why the Court should insist upon proof of a matter which is so clearly self-evident. However technical the Evidence Act may be, fortunately it has a section which should often be resorted to by Courts and that is s. 114, because the Legislature realised that there are many matters which are so obvious, so clear, so demonstrably true, that formal proof would be sheer waste of time. In our opinion, this is a clear case where proof should not have been insisted upon as to the character of this document. If the necessary presumption could have been drawn under s. 114, there is no reason why on the failure on the part of the plaintiffs to tender formal evidence as to the nature of this document, the document should have been rejected. We do not accept Mr. Thakore's contention that the presumption arising under s. 114 does not arise with regard to documents. The presumption which s. 114 speaks of is the existence of any fact which the Court thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business, in their relation to the facts of the particular case. The section is wide enough to permit the Court to raise a presumption not only with regard to oral evidence, but also with regard to documentary evidence. Therefore, in our opinion, with great respect to the learned Judge, he was in error when he was persuaded by the respondents to insist upon formal proof being given of the character of this document by the appellant. We must, therefore, admit this document into evidence.

A question has been raised as to whether even so the petition which was presented by the appellants to the Supreme Court for a decree on the award can be considered to be a public document. The documents which the learned Judge rightly held would be public documents which would be admissible in evidence if the necessary formality of s. 78(6) had been complied with are:

1. An order dated February 14, 1956, calling upon the defendants to show cause on March 7, 1950, against the said petition.
2. An order dated March 8, 1950, granting on default the plaintiffs' motion to confirm the award of the arbitrator and for judgment in accordance therewith and directing that the order be settled.
3. An order dated March 21, 1950, passing judgment on the said awards in the sum of $ 18,748 together with interest and costs as mentioned in the order. The learned Judge has taken the view that the petition dated February 10, 1950, which as we have just stated was filed by the appellants for obtaining the award, was not a public document. The question is whether the learned Judge is right. We agree with Mr. Thakore that the authorities lay down, and in our opinion rightly lay down, that a petition is not the record of a judicial authority. It is neither the act nor the record of the act of a judicial authority. It is really the act of a private party. It is the party who moves the Court by his petition to obtain a certain order, and, therefore, the petition as such would not come within the definition of a public document under s. 74. On the same principle, the affidavits, except formal affidavits of service, would not come within the purview of a public document, and therefore the learned Judge was right in including only the two affidavits which are merely formal affidavits proving service. Now, if these documents are admitted into evidence, they establish that a foreign judgment was passed by the Supreme Court of the New York State on an award.

The question now is whether the award which is annexed to the petition can be admitted into evidence as a public document. In our opinion it cannot. Mr. Parpia's contention was that the Court has acted on this award, it has perused the award, it has considered its contents and has then passed judgment, and, therefore, if the judgment is evidence then the various documents which led up to that judgment and resulted in the judgment should equally constitute public documents. In our opinion, that contention cannot be accepted. All that can be said is that the particular award or copy of the award which is annexed to the petition was before the Court and it was on that award that the Court gave judgment. But there is nothing in the Evidence Act which gives any sanctity to the copy of the award annexed by the appellants to their petition. There is nothing to suggest by reason of the certificate given by the Consul General or by the Justice of the Supreme Court that the award on which the Supreme Court acted was the genuine award given by the arbitrators. It often happens that a Court may pass a decree on a forged or fabricated document; the document is before the Court, but there is nothing to testify to its genuineness. Therefore what Mr. Parpia wants us to do is to bring within the purview of the certificate given under s. 78 not only the official acts of the Supreme Court but also the documents annexed by the parties to their own petition or affidavits which they bring before the Court. In our opinion, that is not the purpose of s. 78(6). We must consider whether, apart from proof of the award in the manner suggested by Mr. Parpia, there is anything on the record which would justify us in holding that the document was admitted by the defendants. Turning to the plaint, in para. 5 it is expressly averred by the plaintiffs that—

"On the 12th July 1949 the said arbitrators and Umpire duly made, signed, acknowledged and published their awards whereby they unanimously held that the defendants had committed a breach of the said two contracts and awarded that the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs a sum of $ 9,538.64 in respect of the said contract dated 3rd March 1949 and a sum of $ 9,209.36 in respect of the said contract dated 7th March 1949 as and by way of damages."

And in para. 10 of their written statement all that the defendants say is—

"With reference to paragraph 5 of the plaint, the defendants say that they are not bound by or concerned with any of the statements contained in the said paragraph. The defendants say that the awards alleged to have been passed by the said arbitrators and Umpire are not binding on them."

Therefore, there is no denial of the award or its contents, and what is more, in para. 17 of the written statement the defendants, as is usual, averred that they will rely on documents a list whereof is hereto annexed, and one of the documents is a copy of the petition and order to show cause issued by the Supreme Court, New York County. Therefore, the defendants received the petition to which was annexed the award. The learned Judge has taken the view—a strictly correct view in law—that even if there is implied admission, the Court has a discretion to compel a party to prove a particular fact notwithstanding an implied admission on the part of the defendant. But, with respect, we do not think that this is a case where the Court should have availed itself of that discretion. There is an award passed, it is part of the record of the Supreme Court, it is sent by the Court to the defendants, the defendants are in possession of that document, and nowhere in the pleadings is it suggested that such an award was not passed or that the copy of the award is not a genuine document. Surely, this is hardly a case where the plaintiffs who are in New York should be compelled to prove the original award by means of a commission or by some other means which would constitute a very expensive procedure. Therefore, in our opinion, the copy of the award relied upon by the plaintiffs should have been admitted into evidence, and we will admit it into evidence.

A further difficulty still remains, and that is with regard to the agreement to refer matters in dispute to arbitration. Now, this agreement is to be found in the two letters to which reference has been made, the letters of September 7, 1948, and September 13, 1948. These two letters have been referred to in para. 2 of the plaint and their contents are set out, and all that the written statement has to say with regard to this paragraph is:

"With reference to paragraph 2 of the plaint the defendants deny that they at any time entered into any contract with the plaintiffs as alleged in the said paragraph or otherwise."

Therefore, there is no denial of this correspondence. Indeed, there could not be, because before the written statement was filed, inspection was given by the plaintiffs of this correspondence and again the conscientious draftsman of the written statement could not possibly have controverted the statement that these letters passed between the parties. Therefore, in our opinion, these two letters of September 7, 1948, and September 13, 1948, are admissible in evidence, and we will formally admit them in evidence.

The same is true of the letters and telegrams which constitute the two contracts which were entered into according to the plaintiffs pursuant to the terms of business contained in these two letters of September 7, 1948, and September 13, 1948. These letters and telegrams are also referred to in para. 2 of the plaint, inspection was given of this correspondence to the defendants before the written statement was filed, and the denial in para. 7 is that the defendants at any time entered into any contract with the plaintiffs as alleged in the said paragraph. Now, we read this denial to mean not a denial of the exchange of letters and telegrams, not a denial of the correctness of the copies of the documents of which the defendants have taken inspection, but a submission in law that no contract emerges from the exchange of these letters and telegrams. That is something very different from denying the correctness or genuineness of the copies relied upon by the plaintiffs. Therefore, in our opinion, these letters and telegrams which constitute in the record exhs. X to X-7 marked for identification, should have been admitted into evidence, and we will admit them into evidence.

Now, with the admission of this evidence we must consider whether it is necessary to remand this suit or to pass any other order, or we could ourselves dispose of the suit and pass the necessary decree in favour of the plaintiffs. Turning to the issues for this purpose, the first issue—Whether this Hon'ble Court has jurisdiction to entertain and try this suit—we have already answered. We will, therefore, reverse the finding of the learned Judge on this issue and answer that issue in the affirmative.

Issue No. 2 is—Whether the arbitrators and umpire had jurisdiction to make the said awards—, and issue No. 3 is—Whether the Supreme Court of New York had jurisdiction to pass the judgment and order. Issue No. 3 has been answered in the negative and issue No. 2 in the affirmative. With regard to issue No. 3 there is a presumption which arises under s. 14 of the Civil Procedure Code that the Court shall presume, upon the production of any document purporting to be a certified copy of a foreign judgment, that such judgment was pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction, unless the contrary appears on the record; but such presumption may be displaced by proving want of jurisdiction. There is nothing on the record to show that the defendants even attempted to displace the presumption raised by s. 14. With regard to the jurisdiction of the arbitrators and umpires, we agree with the learned Judge, that they had jurisdiction. On this point what is urged by Mr. Thakore is that inasmuch as the contracts on which the award was based are denied by the defendants, the arbitrators had no jurisdiction. Now, the principle of the matter is this that when a party denies the arbitration agreement, the very basis on which the arbitrator can act is challenged and therefore the Courts have taken the view that in such a case the arbitrator has no jurisdiction to decide whether he himself has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the dispute. The real principle is this, and not what is sometimes loosely stated, that if the factum of a contract is denied, the arbitrators have no jurisdiction to adjudicate in respect of that. If the arbitration agreement is part and parcel of the contract itself, by denying the factum of the contract the party is denying the submission clause and denying the jurisdiction of the arbitrators. But in this case the position is different. We have an independent agreement by which the parties agreed to refer the disputes to arbitration. Pursuant to this agreement, contracts were entered into and when the plaintiffs made a claim against the defendants, the defendants denied their liability. Therefore, what was denied was not the jurisdiction of the arbitrators, not the submission clause, but business done pursuant to the submission clause and to which the submission clause applied. We are unable to accede to Mr. Thakore's contention that there was no binding agreement with regard to arbitration till a contract actually was entered into, and according to Mr. Thakore it was only then that the terms of business contained in the two letters of September 7, 1948, and September 13, 1948, became incorporated in the contract. The true position here is that there is an antecedent independent arbitration agreement and this agreement would apply to every business done between the parties and every contract entered into between the parties. Therefore, in denying the contracts and in denying that any business was done, the defendants were not challenging the jurisdiction of the arbitrators, not denying the agreement to go to arbitration, but were merely denying the fact that pursuant to that agreement any business was done between the parties. In our opinion, therefore, the learned Judge was right in the view that he took that the arbitrators and umpire had jurisdiction to make the award.

Issue No. 4 is—Whether the said judgment and order of the said Supreme Court were given on the merits of the case—and the learned Judge has answered that issue in favour of the appellants.

The next issue was—Whether the said awards were given on the merits of the case—and that issue has not been answered. It was unnecessary to answer that issue because the learned Judge took the view that the suit was on the foreign judgment and he considered the rights of the plaintiffs from the point of view of the suit being based on the foreign judgment. Mr. Thakore says that not only the finding of the learned Judge on issue No. 4 is erroneous, but that we must permit him to argue issue No. 5 which becomes material in view of our decision that the suit is based on the award and not on the foreign judgment. Now, in the first place, it is difficult to accept Mr. Thakore's contention that the principles laid down in s. 13 apply to what he calls a foreign award. In s. 13 there are safeguards laid down to protect a defendant in our municipal Courts from being sued on a judgment given by a foreign Court, and undoubtedly those safeguards must be strictly complied with. But could the same principle apply where the judgment is given not by a Court of a foreign State but by a tribunal selected by the parties and when the tribunal is a domestic tribunal and not a tribunal set up by the laws of a foreign country? We are inclined to agree with the learned Judge that it is not open to a party, who is a party to the award, to contend that the award was not given on the merits of the case. We do agree that if the award was given against the rules of natural justice or it was fraudulently obtained, the party may not be prevented from putting forward those contentions. But it is difficult to accept the view that because on a foreign judgment it is open to a party to contend that it was not given on the merits of the case, it is equally open to a party who is resisting the suit on the award to contend that the award was not given on the merits of the case. But even if it were open, in our opinion in this case the award was given on the merits of the case. It is true that the award was ex parte and the defendants did not appear before the arbitrators, but in our opinion the true interpretation to give to the expression "given on the merits" is that the tribunal giving the award considered the merits of the matter and came to a decision. The expression does not mean that every decision given ex parte is necessarily a decision not on merits. This view is clearly borne out by the judgment of the Privy Council in *Keymer v. Visvanatham Reddy*³. That was a suit on a foreign judgment and the judgment was given as a penalty because the defendant refused to answer the interrogatories which had been submitted to him, and the Privy Council points out that the merits of the case were never investigated and his defence struck out. Therefore, it is only in those cases where the Court for some reason or other passes a judgment against a party without investigating into the merits of the matter that it could be said that the decision is not given on merits. The mere fact that the decision is ex parte, the mere fact that the defendant after being served does not choose to appear, does not make an ex parte decision a decision not on merits. Not only there is no evidence here that the award was not given on the merits in the sense we have indicated, but on the evidence it is clear that it was given on the merits. We must, therefore, answer issue No. 5—if necessary, in the affirmative.

Issue No. 6 was not pressed.

Issue No. 7 is—Whether defendants entered into any contract with the plaintiffs as alleged in para. 2 of the plaint—and the answer is in the negative. We have already pointed out that the correspondence dealing with the contracts has been admitted by the defendants and the only submission made by the defendants is a submission of law that this correspondence does not amount to a contract in law. One has only to look at these letters and telegrams to come to the conclusion that if these letters and telegrams were admitted in evidence they clearly resulted in a contract being arrived at between the parties as alleged by the plaintiffs in para. 2 of the plaint. In our opinion, the learned Judge answered this issue in the negative because the view he took was that the documents which we have admitted were not admissible in evidence. We will, therefore, answer this issue in the affirmative.

Issue No. 8 is—Whether the said awards are binding upon the defendants. In view of what we have stated in the judgment, it is clear that the awards are binding upon the defendants and we will give a finding on this issue as in the affirmative and set aside the finding of the learned Judge which was in the negative.

The result, therefore, is that on the record and on the evidence that we have now admitted, there is no answer to the claim made by the plaintiffs. The claim consists of the actual amount mentioned in the awards on which the Supreme Court has passed judgment. Therefore, the relief sought is in respect of an award which has been made enforceable by the law of the country in which it was passed. With regard to interest, the interest claimed is from March 21, 1950, that is, the date on which the Supreme Court passed its judgment. Mr. Parpia agrees that interest should be allowed only from the date of the filing of this suit, which is January 14, 1954.

The result, therefore, will be that there will be a decree, equivalent in rupees, for $ 18,748 and at the same rate of exchange as the amount is calculated in prayer (a) of the plaint, with interest thereon at 4 per cent. from January 14, 1954, till judgment, and costs of the suit and interest on judgment, except costs, at 4 per cent.

The appeal will, therefore, be allowed and the decree passed by the trial Court set aside. The appellants will be entitled to the costs of the appeal.

Undertaking given by Mr. Parpia vacated. Undertaking given by Mr. Thakore also vacated.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice Shelat.

ABU ISMAIL MERCHANT v. THE STATE.*

Constitution of India, Art. 20(3)—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 162—

Accused without compulsion furnishing evidence which could be used against him—

Whether using such evidence at trial of accused violates constitutional guarantee under art. 20(3)—Whether asking accused to give his handwriting for purpose of comparison with disputed document amounts to taking statement under s. 162 of Code.

The constitutional guarantee under art. 20(3) of the Constitution of India protects a person accused against being compelled to furnish evidence against himself. Where the evidence is collected by a police officer under a judicial mandate as in the case where pursuant to a search warrant, documents or things are seized and produced in Court, there is no circumvention of the constitutional guarantee; nor is every volitional act of a person accused which is evidence, or facilitates collection of evidence against him to be deemed compelled merely because the act is relied upon in the judicial proceeding against the person accused. Therefore, the Constitution does not prohibit a person accused of an offence from furnishing evidence which may be used against him; it only affords a protection against compulsion in furnishing evidence.

M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra, District Magistrate, Delhi, State v. Arabsha Ahmed Sayeed and In re Palani Goundan, referred to.

When a person accused of an offence accompanies a police officer in the course of investigation or complies with a request to give his handwriting or thumb impression for comparison, he does not give a statement, proof of which is prohibited by s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

MESSRS. HIREMANI AND JAGLUR & Co. a firm doing business in Hubli and the firm of K. Umakant doing business in Bombay had dealings between them and as a result of these dealings an amount of Rs. 16,000 became due by the Hubli firm to the Bombay firm. On May 21, 1956, in part payment of the above amount a demand draft for Rs. 8,000 drawn on the Bombay branch of the Canara Industrial and Banking Syndicate Ltd., Hubli, was sent by the Hubli firm to the Bombay firm and it was drawn in favour of K. Umakant. This demand draft was lost in transit and somehow or other it found its way into the hands of one Abu Ismail Merchant (accused). On May 25, 1956, the accused went to the Queens Road branch of the New Citizen Bank of India Ltd. and opened an account in the name of Kamalakant Umakant Joshi by crediting a sum of Rs. 600. Later on in the afternoon of the same day the accused again went to the Bank and presented the aforesaid draft of Rs. 8,000 and forged the endorsement on the back of the draft, in the name of K. Umakant. On May 28, 1956, the accused on getting information from the ledger keeper of the bank that the draft had been cleared, withdrew Rs. 7,900 from the bank by a cheque. On these facts the accused was tried before the Additional Sessions Judge, Bombay, with a common jury, for offences under ss. 411, 467, and 471 read with s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code. The jury brought in a majority verdict against the accused for the three offences charged against him and the Sessions Judge accepted the verdict of the jury and convicted the accused and sentenced him to suffer rigorous imprisonment for different periods for the three offences.

*Decided, September 18, 1958. Criminal Appeal No. 420 of 1958, from the orders of conviction and sentence passed by V. D. Tulzapurkar, Additional Sessions Judge, Greater Bombay, in Case No. 21 of V Sessions, 1957.

The accused appealed to the High Court.

B. R. Sompura, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

SHAH J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded:] It was then urged by Mr. Kotval that there had been a serious irregularity in the trial. Mr. Kotval contended that the accused was by threats compelled to give his handwriting to the police officer and that this writing was utilised by Phansalkar, the handwriting expert, and that by the use of that writing the provisions of s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and art. 20(3) of the Constitution of India were infringed. Mr. Kotval submitted that the prosecution had in using the writing given by the accused in substance compelled the accused to give evidence against himself. Mr. Kotval also submitted that the learned trial Judge had allowed evidence to go on the record without deciding the question as to the admissibility thereof and on that account also there was irregularity in the trial. It is true that when the panch witness Gopal Ramprasad was examined on behalf of the prosecution, an objection was raised by counsel for the accused that the sheets of paper alleged to be in the handwriting of the accused could not be used as evidence, and admitting the documents on the record as evidence amounted to infringement of the provisions of art. 20(3) of the Constitution. The learned Judge held that the question whether art. 20(3) of the Constitution had any application must depend upon proof of certain facts: viz., whether any compulsion was used on the accused when he gave his handwriting; and on that point a suggestion was made by Mr. Neemuchwala for the accused that threats were held out to the accused before specimen handwritings were obtained, which suggestion was denied by the police officer. He observed that as the decision on what was essentially a question of fact depended upon proof or disproof of certain facts, it must of necessity be given after all the evidence was recorded and that he would tell the jury to consider the question in the course of his summing up. In our view, in so doing the learned Judge was not in error. Evidently the question whether the writings had been obtained by the police officer from the accused by compulsion was a question of fact which had to be decided by the jury and the jury could not be called upon to give an interlocutory verdict on that question. The learned Judge was, therefore, justified in admitting the evidence of the panch as well as the police officer and of the handwriting expert and then in asking the jury to consider the question whether the writings had been procured by compulsion or threats as alleged by the accused. The jury having come to the conclusion that the accused is guilty of the offence charged must be deemed to have held that this evidence relating to the handwriting on the papers relied upon by the prosecution was reliable and that the accused was not compelled by threats or coercion to give his handwriting. The learned Judge has told the jury in the course of his charge that if they came to the conclusion that the writings had been procured by threats or compulsion as alleged by the accused, they were entitled to reject the evidence of the handwriting expert. The learned Judge having given proper directions to the jury in this behalf, we cannot say that there was any misdirection by the Judge or any error of procedure in the trial in allowing the documents to go on the record, the admissibility whereof was in doubt till certain questions of fact were decided.

By art. 20(3) of the Constitution it is enacted that no person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself. It is now well settled that the expression "to be a witness" means "to furnish evidence", and the constitutional guarantee is not restricted in its ambit to proceedings in the Court room: the protection afforded to an accused person in so far as it is related to the phrase "to be a witness" is not merely in respect of testimonial compulsion in the Court room, but may well extend to compelled testimony previously obtained from him. It is, therefore, available to a person against whom a formal accusation relating to the commission of an offence has been levelled which in the normal course may result in prosecution. (*M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra, District Magistrate, Delhi*¹). The guarantee, however, protects a person accused from being compelled to furnish evidence against himself. Where the evidence is collected by a police officer under a judicial mandate as in the case where pursuant to a search warrant documents or things are seized and produced in Court, there is no circumvention of the constitutional guarantee; nor is every volitional act of a person accused which is evidence, or facilitates collection of evidence against him, to be deemed compelled merely because the act is relied upon in the judicial proceeding against the person accused.

A division bench of this Court in State v. Arabsha Ahmed Sayeed,² held that by using the finger-prints of an accused person taken during the course of investigation by a police officer, as evidence at the trial, the constitutional guarantee under art. 20(3) was not violated.

The Madras High Court in *In re Palani Goundan*³, also has expressed the same view. In that case it was observed (p. 547):

"The principle of protection against self-incrimination is not confined to the oral evidence of a person standing his trial for an offence when called to the witness-stand, and it refers to all kinds of evidence which the accused might be compelled to produce as a positive volitional evidentiary act. It follows that any attempt to compel the accused to produce evidence of any kind which is likely to support a prosecution against him would be struck down by Art. 20(3) of the Constitution. Any incriminating or relevant object or document or other form of evidence can be seized under process of law from the custody or person of the accused; but he cannot be compelled to produce it... It is important to bear in mind that while it may be open to a police officer to seize such incriminating articles of evidence from the person of the accused, he cannot himself be compelled to produce them... The taking of thumb-impression or the signature of the accused does not stand on a different footing from the seizure of documents or articles or other facts of evidence from the person of the accused. Though he cannot be compelled to produce such evidence, it can be taken or seized from him. That is 'an act of another to which he is obliged to submit', and not 'the positive volitional evidentiary act' of the accused."

It is evident, therefore, that the Constitution does not prohibit a person accused of an offence from furnishing evidence which may be used against him; it only affords a protection against compulsion in furnishing evidence.

In the case before us it appears that the jury regarded the evidence that the disputed handwriting on the endorsements on the draft, the application form, pay-in-slip and cheques were of the accused was reliable. The jury also appear to have been of the view that the writings with which these documents were compared were not procured by compulsion. There being no compulsion in procuring the handwriting of the accused in the course of investigation, there was, in our judgment, no infringement of art. 20(3).

2 (1958) Confirmation Case No. 4 of 1958, decided by Vyas and Kotval JJ., on March 18,

3 [1957] A. I. R. Mad. 546.

The contention that asking a person accused to give his handwriting for the purpose of comparison with a disputed document amounts to taking a statement within the meaning of s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure has, in our judgment, no substance. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure the investigating officer is invested with wide powers. He is entitled to collect evidence and for that purpose to search for documents or things and seize incriminating articles or documents and compel the presence of persons believed by him to be conversant with matters relating to the case under investigation for examination, to make panchnamas, to hold identification parades and to send persons to a competent Magistrate for their statements to be recorded under s. 164. All these are steps in the investigation and are primarily acts done by the investigating officer; and because he is directly or indirectly concerned with them, the acts done by the person accused do not become his statements within the meaning of s. 162. APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Miabhoj.

BHAGWANT VINAYAK MAHAJAN v. RADHAKISAN GANGABISAN MARWADI.*

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XX, r. 12; s. 97—Preliminary decree stating that mesne profits to be awarded until delivery of possession—Whether decree could be construed as awarding mesne profits only upto three years from date of decree.

When a preliminary decree is passed under O. XX, r. 12, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, for payment of mesne profits until delivery of possession of property, mesne profits cannot be awarded for a period of more than three years from the date of the decree.

Narayan Govind v. Sono Sadashiva and Girish Chunder Lahiri v. Shoshi Shikhera applied.

The facts appear in the judgment.

T. N. Walawalkar, for the appellant.

B. V. Chavan, for M. V. Paranjpe, for respondent No. 4.

MIABHOJ J. This appeal raises a short question relating to the interpretation of a preliminary decree which was passed in Suit No. 36 of 1940. That suit was brought by some sons against their father and his alienees. The suit was for partition and separate possession of the shares of the sons in the joint family properties. A preliminary decree was passed on December 22, 1941. Inter alia, that decree directed that the sons shall obtain future mesne profits from the date of the suit till delivery of possession. The direction was given against the alienees of the father. The alienees were defendants Nos. 1 and 2. They are now represented by a Receiver appointed in another litigation. The decree was assigned by the sons to one Radhakisan who is respondent.

*Decided, September 22, 1958. First Appeal No. 242 of 1955, from the decision of R. M. Kulkarni, Joint Civil Judge, Senior Division, Poona, in Special Suit No. 86 of 1940.

ent No. 4. He filed darkhast No. 1185 of 1948 for partition of the properties in accordance with the directions given in the preliminary decree. It is not disputed that he got on September 10, 1951, actual possession of the properties allotted to the shares of the sons. Thereafter, respondent No. 4 filed an application on December 4, 1953, for ascertainment of the mesne profits in respect of the properties allotted to the shares of the sons from the date of the suit till the date of delivery of possession. Thus the period for which respondent No. 4 claimed mesne profits was from January 8, 1940, the date of the suit, to September 10, 1951, the date on which he obtained possession of the properties allotted to the shares of the sons. The period is 11 years and 8 months and 2 days. Mesne profits have been calculated at the rate of Rs. 75 per annum. The shares of the sons has been ascertained to be 3/4th. Accordingly, mesne profits have been awarded to respondent No. 4 at the rate of Rs. 56-4-0 per year. The contention of the Receiver, who represents the interest of the alienees of the father, is that, though the decree states that the mesne profits shall be awarded until delivery of possession without specifying that the period shall be restricted to a period of three years from the date of the decree, in law, the decree should be construed as awarding mesne profits to the sons only up to three years from the date of the decree and not until September 10, 1951. At first, I was not inclined to agree with the contention of Mr. Walawalkar. This disinclination was due to the provisions contained in s. 97 of the Civil Procedure Code, which states that where any party aggrieved by a preliminary decree passed after the commencement of this Code does not appeal from such decree, he shall be precluded from disputing its correctness in any appeal which may be preferred from the final decree. A plain reading of the decree itself would show that mesne profits were awarded to the sons up to the date of delivery, and it did not in specific terms lay down that the mesne profits were to be restricted up to a period of three years from the date of the decree. Hence if defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were aggrieved by the decree they should have preferred an appeal and got the direction for payment of mesne profits restricted to 3 years. However, Mr. Walawalkar relied upon two authorities, in support of his proposition. In view of those authorities, I cannot but come to the conclusion that the point raised by Mr. Walawalkar is right and must be held. The first ruling on which he relies is reported in *Narayan Govind v. Sono Sadashiva*¹. In that case, their Lordships had to deal with a decree which was passed in terms which were similar to the terms of the decree in the present appeal. That decree was passed under s. 211 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882. The decree stated that mesne profits were to be awarded till delivery of possession. But, their Lordships came to the conclusion that the decree must be construed subject to sub-s. (2) of s. 211 and, therefore, the plaintiff in that case was held not entitled to recover mesne profits for more than three years from the date of the decree. Mr. Chavan, who appears on behalf of respondent No. 4, wanted to draw a distinction between that case and the present case. The distinction was based upon the ground that, under the old Code of 1882, a preliminary decree was not passed but a final decree was passed straight off, whereas under the present Code, a preliminary decree has to be passed under O. XX, r. 12, and I have to deal with a preliminary decree. I do not think how this distinction can avail respondent No. 4. If, at all, the position is worse so far as respondent No. 4 is concerned. Under the old Code a decree giving mesne profits was a final decree, and for executing that decree, the parties were required to go to the executing Court. It is well known that an executing Court cannot go behind a decree and must execute the decree as it stands. In spite of this, the Division Bench came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to mesne profits for more than three years from the date of the decree, and this conclusion was arrived at by interpreting the decree in such a manner as to bring it in accordance with the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 211 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1882. Therefore, the ratio of this case viz., Narayan v. Sono is that, when a decree is passed for payment of mesne profits, until delivery of possession, there is always an implied term in the decree that mesne profits are not to be awarded for a period of more than three years in any case. The language of s. 211 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 is the same as the language which is used in O. XX, r. 12, and I do not see any distinction between the two provisions. The same view appears to have been taken by the Privy Council also in the case reported in Girish Chunder Lahiri v. Shoshi Shikhereswar.² In that case also, the decree was for mesne profits for the period of dispossession, and the decree for mesne profits was not restricted to a period of three years from the date of the decree. However, their Lordships, at page 126, observed as follows:

"...The Subordinate Judge gives the plaintiff mesne profits up to the date of possession. But that is more than three years from the date of the decree, and to the extent of the excess is unauthorised by s. 211 of the Code."

"...Declare that mesne profits for Nyadlar should not be allowed for any later time than three years from the date of the decree,..."

Mr. Chavan, however, referred me to the ruling reported in Gurudas Kundu Chowdhury v. Hemendra Kumar Roy.³ He contended that, in that case, a different view was taken. I do not think I can agree. In that case, there was no question of the construction of a decree passed for mesne profits until the date of delivery of possession. There, the decree was passed in the following terms: "That the claim of this suit be decreed with costs and mesne profits," and the contention was that the mesne profits which were awarded were mesne profits up to the date of the suit and not up to the date of delivery of possession. There was no question of mesne profits having been granted in that case for a period of three years from the date of the decree. The matter was finally decided by the Privy Council in 1917, and the mesne profits were being claimed until 1919 i.e. within two years from the date on which the Privy Council had passed the decree. Therefore, in my opinion, it is not correct to say that in Gurudas' case, the Privy Council has taken a different view.

In view of the aforesaid legal position, respondent No. 4 shall be entitled to mesne profits only for a period of three years from December 22, 1941, to December 22, 1944, and he will not be entitled to receive mesne profits for the subsequent period. Calculating the mesne profits at the rate of Rs. 56-4-0 per year, the amount would be Rs. 168-12-0. This figure will be substituted in the final decree of the trial Court for the figure of Rs. 618-12-0.

Therefore the appeal is allowed. I order that the figure "Rs. 168-12-0" shall be substituted for the figure "Rs. 618-12-0" wherever it occurs in the decree of the trial Court. Respondent No. 4 shall receive proportionate costs from the appellant in the trial Court. Each party shall bear its own costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

NAMDEV BHIKHA v. RAMNATH SHIVNARAYAN.*

Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, Secs. 11, 17, 13—Whether s. 11 of Act as amended in 1954 retrospective—Application for fixation of standard rent relating to period prior to amendment—Rent whether to be determined with reference to law existing before coming into operation of amendment.

Section 11 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, as amended by the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Amendment Act, 1954, is not retrospective but it is prospective.

If an application comes to be made under s. 17 of the Act, then that application will have to be decided on the basis as to whether the application relates to rent for the period prior to the date of the amendment or subsequent to the date of the amendment. If the application relates to a period which is prior to the date of the amendment, then, the rent must be determined with reference to the law existing before the amendment came into operation, and, if the application relates to a period subsequent to the date of the amendment, then, the rent will have to be decided with reference to the subsequent amendment.

Subraya Rama Bhatta v. Pyara Krishna Gouda, referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

K. B. Deshpande, for S. L. Newasekar, for the applicant.

S. M. Shah and R. G. Bhadekar, for the opponent.

MIABHOY J. This petition is filed under s. 91 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950. The petition is by one Namdeo. He was the protected tenant of Survey No. 1, measuring 4 acres 33 gunthas, assessed at Rs. 10-4-0, situated in the village Easgaon. This Namdeo made an application on November 4, 1952, to the Deputy Collector for fixation of standard rent in respect of this land. This application was made under s. 17 of the Act. The application was decided by the Deputy Collector on September 8, 1954. The Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, fixes the maximum rent in respect of agricultural lands. This is done by s. 11 of the Act. On the date on which the application was made by Namdeo, the section was as follows:—

"Notwithstanding any agreement or usage or any decree or order of a Court, or any law to the contrary, the maximum rent payable by a tenant for a lease of any land shall not, in the case of irrigated land except land under wells exceed 1/3rd, and in the case of unirrigated land or irrigated land under wells exceed 1/4th of the crop of such land or of the value of such crop as determined in the prescribed manner."

Therefore, on the date on which Namdeo made the application, the maximum rent, which was payable by a tenant to his landlord was 1/3rd or 1/4th according to the class of land in respect of which the tenancy existed. However, this s. 11 was changed during the pendency of the application of Namdeo, and a new s. 11 was introduced on February 4, 1954. That new section stands as follows:—

"Notwithstanding any agreement or usage or any decree or order of the Court, or any law to the contrary, the maximum rent payable by a tenant for a lease in respect of the following classes of land shall be the multiples of the land revenue for the time

*Decided, September 23, 1958. Civil Revision Application No. 263 of 1957, (with Civil Revision Application No. 245 of 1957), from the order passed by S. A. L. Razvi, Collector at Aurangabad, in File No. 284/57 of 1954, varying the orders passed by Mr. Kazim Hussain, Deputy Collector, Vizapur Division, in Case No. Ten/566 of 1952.

1 (1955) Civil Revision Application No. 1958 of 1953, decided by Gajendragadkar J., on September 22, 1955 (Unrep.).

being in force or if no land revenue is in force the land revenue which may be assessed thereon, as shown hereunder against them:—

(a) Dry land of Chalka soil		4 times the land revenue.
(b) Dry land of Black cotton		5 times the land revenue.
(c) Bakhat		5 times the land revenue.
(d) Wet land—
(i) Irrigated by wells		3 times the land revenue.
(ii) Irrigated by other sources		4 times the land revenue.
(e) Classes of land which do not fall within the clause (a), (b), (c) or (d)		Reasonable rent determined having regard to the classes of land and the rent fixed for the said categories."

The opponent Ramnath is the landlord of the aforesaid field. The agreed rent was Rs. 625. The Deputy Collector divided the periods for which reasonable rent was determined into two. The first period was from November 4, 1952, to February 3, 1954, and the second period was from February 4, 1954, onwards. In respect of the first period, the Deputy Collector decided that the reasonable rent was Rs. 300 per annum. This decision appears to have been arrived at by the Deputy Collector on a statement made by Namdeo that he was prepared to pay that much amount as reasonable rent to the landlord. In respect of the second period, the Deputy Collector fixed the rent at five times the land revenue, and he calculated it at Rs. 51-4-0. The parties are not agreed as to whether this figure is correct. However, it is not necessary for me to enter into this question, because, the principle on which the Deputy Collector has proceeded is quite clear that the reasonable rent is five times the assessment. If once the figure of assessment is ascertained, then the amount of rent, which would be payable by the tenant to the landlord, can easily be ascertained. Ramnath, then, preferred an appeal to the Collector. His contention was that reasonable rent was the agreed rent, and should have been fixed at Rs. 625. Namdeo also preferred a cross-appeal. His contention was that the amendment of s. 11 had retrospective effect, and, therefore, rent in respect of the first period from November 4, 1952, to February 3, 1954, should also have been fixed at five times the assessment. Both these appeals were decided by the Collector by his impugned order dated March 21, 1955. The Collector rejected the contention of Namdeo that the amended s. 11 had retrospective effect. He ordered Namdeo to pay rent at the agreed rate of Rs. 625 per annum for the years 1952-53 and 1953-54. He upheld the order of the Deputy Collector for standard rent from February 4, 1954, onwards. Namdeo has come in revision to this Court from this order. [His Lordship after considering points not material to this report, proceeded.]

The question for consideration is whether, on the facts of the present case, the newly amended s. 11 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act is applicable or the old unamended s. 11 of the Act is applicable. It cannot be disputed that s. 11 of the Act deals with vested rights and contractual obligations. It is well known that, when a statute deals with or affects vested rights or impairs contractual obligations, ordinarily, the presumption is that the Legislature did not intend to give it a retrospective effect. In such a case, the proper construction of the statute would be that it is prospective. Therefore, the question for consideration is whether there is anything in the amending Act or in the amended s. 11, which would show an intention which would rebut this presumption in favour of the Act being prospective. Mr. Deshpande firstly relied upon the language of s. 11 itself. He contended that this amended section was to come into operation in spite of any agreement or law or decree or order of the Court. It was contended that this was an indication that the Legislature intended that this section was to have retrospective effect. I do not agree. In my opinion, all that the new section means is that, if there was any law or any order, which was in operation on the date on which the amended section came into operation, then, in spite of such law or agreement or order of the Court the newly amended section will come into force. I do not think this can be regarded as an indication of the mind of the Legislature that s. 11 was to be applied in such a way as to affect rights which had become vested in the parties before the newly amended s. 11 came into operation. Another section to which Mr. Deshpande referred was sub-s. (2) of s. 13 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act. That sub-section is in the following terms:

"The rent due shall be payable by the tenant at the rate fixed in accordance with the provisions of sections 11 and 12 and the tenant will have the option to pay the rent in cash so fixed or in equivalent produce grown on the land estimated according to the market value thereof."

The submission is that this sub-section obviously deals with a situation which arises after the rent has become due, and this sub-section states in terms that, in such a case, the rent due is to be determined with reference to s. 11. However, in my opinion, this sub-section cannot, in any way, affect the question which has got to be answered in this case. All that the section means is that, if the rent becomes due, then, it is to be fixed in accordance with the provisions contained in s. 11, but it does not state as to whether the section which is to be applied is the unamended section or the amended section. In my opinion, sub-s. (1) of s. 13 is more apposite for deciding this question. That sub-section was amended at the same time when s. 11 was amended, and that sub-section states that a tenant shall not be liable to pay rent at any rate exceeding that specified in s. 11 with effect from the date of the commencement of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Amendment Act, 1954. Therefore, this sub-section is a clear indication of the mind of the Legislature that the amended s. 11 is to be applied with effect from the commencement of the Amending Act, 1954. Therefore, in my opinion, not only there is no indication in the amending Act or the amended s. 11 to show that the Legislature intended to give retrospective effect to the amended s. 11, but there is a clear indication of the intention of the Legislature that the amended s. 11 will not have any retrospective effect.

Another argument which was advanced was based upon s. 17 of the Act. That section provides for the making of an application in a prescribed form for determination of reasonable rent. It was contended that, under similar legislation, when this Court was dealing with a similar point, it had taken the decision that, when an application for determination of reasonable rent is made, rent is effective not only from the time it became due after the making of the application for reasonable rent, but is effective even in respect of arrears of rent. For this purpose, reliance was placed upon the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar in *Subraya Rama Bhatta v. Pyara Krishna Gouda*¹. With respect, this decision cannot affect the decision which I have arrived at on its own merits. The question which Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar was dealing with was entirely different from the question which I have got to decide in the present application. In that case, the question which arose was whether, when an application is made for determination of standard rent, the authority concerned can fix standard rent only with respect to rent which becomes due after the date when the application for standard rent is made or whether he can do so for an anterior period also. That is not the question which I have got to decide in the present case. In the present case, the question is whether the amended s. 11 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act applies or the old s. 11 of the Act applies, and, in my opinion, having regard to the reasons which I have already given, the only answer which can be given to this question is the one which I have given, namely, that the amended section is not retrospective, but it is prospective. If an application comes to be made under s. 17 of the Act, then, in that case, that application will have to be decided on the basis as to whether the application relates to rent for the period prior to the date of the amendment or subsequent to the date of the amendment. If the application relates to a period which is prior to the date of the amendment, then, the rent must be determined with reference to the law existing before the amendment came into operation, and, if the application relates to a period subsequent to the date of the amendment, then, the rent will have to be decided with reference to the subsequent amendment.

Therefore, in my opinion, the present revision application will have to be allowed, and it will have to be sent back to the Deputy Collector with a direction that the Deputy Collector shall fix rent for the years 1952-53 and 1953-54 in accordance with the provisions as laid down in the old s. 11 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950. I am not determining the question as to whether the maximum rent applicable to the facts of the present case is 1/4th or 1/3rd of the produce of the land. That is a question which the Deputy Collector will have to decide in accordance with his decision as to the class of land to which the land which is the subject-matter of the present tenancy dispute belongs...

Therefore, rule is made absolute. The matter is sent back to the Deputy Collector with a direction that the Deputy Collector shall fix rent for the years 1952-53 and 1954 in accordance with the provisions of the old s. 11 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950. Appropriate orders in accordance with law will be passed by the Deputy Collector regarding the amount already deposited by the tenant Namdeo with the Deputy Collector. Each party to bear its own costs.

In Civil Application No. 2100 of 1958, stay is vacated. No order as to costs therein.

Order accordingly.

INCOME-TAX REFERENCE.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. M. C. Chagla, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

MAULADIN AYUB v. THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY SOUTH, BOMBAY.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 23(4), 27, 30—Income-tax officer calling upon assessee by notice under s. 22(4) to produce suppressed books—Order passed under s. 23(4) on non-compliance of notice by assessee—Assessee not applying under s. 27 for cancellation of assessment under s. 23(4)—Assessee in appeal under s. 30 challenging validity of assessment under s. 23(4) and seeking to contend that books required to be produced not in existence—Whether open to assessee to challenge validity of assessment under s. 23(4) in appeal under s. 30.

The Income-tax Officer on certain evidence produced before him came to the conclusion that the assessee was maintaining a separate set of books which had not been produced before him and which recorded the transactions which had not been entered in the account books that the assessee had produced. On that the Income-tax Officer issued a notice under s. 22(4) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and on the failure of the assessee to comply with the notice, he proceeded to assess the assessee under s. 23(4) of the Act. The assessee appealed to the Assistant Appellate Commissioner under s. 30 and attempted to argue the question whether the Income-tax Officer was right in the view that he took that the assessee maintained two sets of books of account and also whether the Income-tax Officer was right in assessing the assessee under s. 23(4). The Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that it was not open to the assessee to argue that question as he had not made an application under s. 27 for cancellation of the assessment made under s. 23(4):—

Held, that in the circumstances of the case the assessee could have made an application under s. 27 and that as he had failed to do so, it was not open to him to challenge the validity of the assessment under s. 23(4) in an appeal under s. 30.

The question whether on a notice issued under s. 22(4) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, the assessee was justified in not producing books which were held by the Income-tax Officer to be suppressed and which the assessee contended did not exist, is a question which falls within the ambit of s. 27 of the Act, and therefore, the assessee cannot agitate this question in an appeal under s. 30 of the Act against the order passed by the Income-tax Officer under s. 23(4) of the Act on the failure of the assessee to comply with the notice under s. 22(4).

Naba Kumar Singh Dudhuria v. Commr. of Inc. Tax,² *Commr. of Inc.-Tax v. Shri Yodh Raj Bhalla*³ and Sir Padampat Singhania v. Commr. of Inc.-Tax,⁴ agreed with.

In the course of assessment proceedings of a partnership firm Messrs. Mauladin Ayub of Akola (assessee) for the assessment year 1951-52 (accounting year S.Y. 2006 ended on November 9, 1950), the Income-tax Officer received certain information that the account books produced before him by the assessee did not record all the business transactions of the assessee and the transactions omitted therefrom were recorded in another set of books. The Income-tax Officer after taking certain evidence on this matter came to the conclusion that the assessee was maintaining another set of account books in addition to the one produced before him, and as these were not produced in compliance with the notice issued under s. 22(4) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, he completed the assessment under s. 23(4) of the Act. In completing this assessment to the best of his judgment the Income-tax Officer added a sum of Rs. 4,000 as income from undisclosed sources. The assessee filed an appeal before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner against the total income determined by the Income-tax Officer, and in this appeal the assessee sought to challenge the validity of the Income-tax Officer's assessment made under s. 23(4) for default under s. 22(4). The Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that this contention could not be taken in the quantum appeal before him. On appeal the Appellate Tribunal held that the Appellate Assistant Commissioner in the quantum appeal was justified in not considering the question whether the assessment was properly made under s. 23(4) and dismissed the appeal, observing in its order as follows—

"...this assessment was made under s. 23(4) for default under s. 22(4). The assessee did not file any application under s. 27 and he sought to challenge the validity of the assessment made under s. 23(4) in the quantum appeal that he filed to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. Relying upon several High Court decisions, mentioned by him, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that the contention could not be properly taken in that appeal. It was argued before us that there was no point in making an application under s. 27 to the Income-tax Officer inasmuch as he would not have changed his conclusion that the assessee did maintain a duplicate set of books and did not produce it before him. It is not necessary to speculate as to how the Income-tax Officer would have reacted to an application under s. 27 if it was made to him. It was urged that in asking compliance with notice under s. 22(4) the Income-tax Officer was asking the assessee to do an impossible thing, viz. to produce the account books which were maintained. On the material that was before him, he came to a certain conclusion. That conclusion would have been tested by making an application under s. 27 and, if necessary, by taking an appeal from an adverse order under that section. In the quantum appeal the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was justified in not considering the question whether the assessment was properly made under s. 23(4)."

"Whether in an appeal under s. 80(1), the validity of an assessment made under s. 23(4) for assessee's failure to comply with all the terms of the notice issued under section 22(4), can be challenged when no application was made under section 27 of the Act to get the assessment made under section 23(4) cancelled?"

CHAGLA C. J. A rather important and interesting question arises on this reference, which has not been considered by any decision of this Court, although there is authority of the Calcutta High Court, Allahabad High Court and the Madhya Pradesh High Court, and the question arises under the following circumstances.

The assessee is a firm and the assessment year is 1951-52 the relevant accounting year being S.Y. 2006 ended on November 9, 1950. Now, on certain evidence which the Income-tax Officer took, he came to the conclusion that the assessee was maintaining a separate set of books which had not been produced before him and which recorded transactions which had not been entered in the account books that the assessee had produced. On that, he issued a notice under s. 22(4). The contention of the assessee was that he did not have two sets of books, that whatever books he had had been produced and, therefore, he could not comply with the notice. As the assessee failed to comply with the requisition made by the Income-tax Officer, the Income-tax Officer proceeded to assess the assessee under s. 23(4), the best judgment assessment. The assessee appealed against this to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner the assessee attempted to argue the question as to whether the Income-tax Officer was right in the view that he took that the assessee maintained two sets of books of account and also whether the Income-tax Officer was right in assessing the assessee under s. 23(4). The Appellate Assistant Commissioner took the view that it was not open to the assessee to argue that question he not having made an application under s. 27. The assessee went in appeal to the Tribunal and the Tribunal upheld the decision of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and the assessee has now come on this reference.

Now, turning to the relevant provisions of the Act, the right of appeal to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner is conferred under s. 30 and that section provides that any assessee objecting to the amount of income assessed under s. 23 or s. 27 or the amount of loss computed under s. 24 or the amount of tax returned under s. 23 or s. 27, we will only quote the relevant provisions of this section, may appeal to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner against the assessment. Now, this is an assessment under s. 23 and an appeal against that assessment lies under s. 80. What is contended by the Department is that when an appeal is limited to the question of the amount of income assessed or the amount of tax determined, it is not competent to the assessee in such an appeal to raise a question as to the validity of the assessment made by the Income-tax Officer under s. 23. What is pointed out is that the Legislature has provided a special machinery for challenging the validity of the assessment, and if the assessee does not avail himself of that machinery, then he cannot challenge the validity under s. 80. Now, the machinery provided is under s. 27 and that section provides that where an assessee within one month from the service of a notice of demand issued as hereinafter provided, satisfies the Income-tax Officer that he was prevented by sufficient cause from making the return required by s. 22 or that he did not receive the notice issued under sub-s. (4) of s. 22, or sub-s. (2) of s. 23, or that he had not a reasonable opportunity to comply, or was prevented by sufficient cause from complying, with the terms of the last mentioned notices, the Income-tax Officer shall cancel the assessment and proceed to make a fresh assessment in accordance with the provisions of s. 23.

Now, what is urged is that after the Income-tax Officer had made an assessment under s. 23(4), within the time limited by s. 27 it was open to the assessee to satisfy the Income-tax Officer that he was prevented by sufficient cause from complying with the terms of the notice issued under s. 23(4) and that on such an application being made by the assessee it was open to the Income-tax Officer to cancel the assessment and proceed to make a fresh assessment in accordance with the provisions of s. 27. If the Income-tax Officer had refused to cancel the assessment, a right of appeal against such refusal is expressly given under s. 30 and it was open to the assessee to have had the matter decided in appeal by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner with further appeal to the Tribunal and, if necessary, on a reference to this Court. Therefore, what is urged is that the question whether the assessee had sufficient cause which prevented him from complying with the terms of the notice issued by the Income-tax Officer could only be litigated under s. 27 on an application made by the assessee and it could only be litigated before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and the Tribunal and if necessary on a reference to the High Court in an appeal made against the order of the Income-tax Officer under s. 27 refusing to cancel the assessment. It is further urged that the assessee not having availed himself of the machinery provided by s. 27, he has accepted the validity of the assessment. He has not challenged the fact that he was contumacious in not complying with the requisition issued by the Income-tax Officer, and having accepted the validity of the assessment, all that he can challenge in appeal is the quantum of the assessable income and the quantum of the tax that he has to pay on that assessable income.

Now, Mr. Samarth's contention is that this is not a case which falls under s. 27 and he concedes both in view of the authorities, which we shall presently refer and also on principle that if the case fell under s. 27 then the only way to litigate that matter is in accordance with the machinery laid down under the Act. In other words he admits that if his client could have made an application under s. 27 then he should have appealed against the order made by the Income-tax Officer under s. 27 and he cannot now agitate this question not having made an application under s. 27.

Now, the first question that we have to consider is whether the assessee could have applied under s. 27 for cancellation of the assessment made by the Income-tax Officer under s. 23(4).¹ Now, what is urged by Mr. Samarth is that this is not a case where the assessee had books of account or materials which he refused to produce. This is a case where the assessee's contention is that he does not possess the books which the Income-tax Officer suspects he does and he is being called upon to do something which it is impossible for him to do, and according to Mr. Samarth, the Income tax Officer having taken the view that the assessee is maintaining double sets of books, it would be futile for him to apply under s. 27 to convince the Income-tax Officer that his view is wrong and he should cancel the assessment made by him under s. 23(4). Now, the scheme of the Act makes it clear that whenever an order is made under s. 23(4) which is a best judgment assessment and which may be compared to an ex-parte judgment or order passed in a civil Court, the Legislature has made a provision for challenging that order, if we may use the expression, "the ex-parte order" and that provision is to be found in s. 27. We would make the machinery unworkable, if we were to take the view that there are certain cases in which the Income-tax Officer may proceed ex-parte and make a best judgment assessment and yet to these cases s. 27 would have no application. We can only make a distinction between a case and a case if the distinction is based on some principle. It is difficult to understand the principle for which Mr. Samarth is contending. What is the difference in principle between a case where the assessee refuses to produce books which he admits he possesses and a case where the assessee refuses to produce books which the Income-tax Officer believes he possesses and which he contends he does not possess. In both the cases, the basis of the Income-tax Officer's order is that the conduct of the assessee is contumacious and being contumacious he proceeds to make a best judgment assessment. Therefore, in our opinion, s. 27 is wide enough to cover every kind of case where the Income-tax Officer proceeds to make a best judgment assessment by reason of the contumacious conduct of the assessee. In this very case, it is difficult to understand why it was not open to the assessee to show sufficient cause which prevented him from complying with the notice issued by the Income-tax Officer. The cause might have been the same which he had shown before the Income-tax Officer or he might have had a better cause or he might have had more materials to satisfy the Income-tax Officer. Even if the cause might be the same, it is difficult to take the view that it is inconceivable that the Income-tax Officer would have ever changed his mind or would admit that he had made a mistake. Therefore, there is no reason to assume that in the case which we are dealing with and which is a rather extreme case where the Income-tax Officer has taken the view that the assessee maintains a double set of books and calls upon him to produce the other set and the assessee contends that he does not maintain a double set of books, that s. 27 has no application and that in such a case it is not possible for the assessee to show sufficient cause why he did not comply with the notice issued by the Income-tax Officer. Therefore, if the case falls under s. 27—and we hold that it does—there is no question that a specific right of appeal has been given to the assessee under s. 30 against the order passed under s. 27 and if he has not availed himself of that right, he is now precluded from agitating the same question. To put it in a different language, the order made by the Income-tax Officer that under the circumstances he is entitled to make a best judgment assessment has become final and conclusive. To that extent when the assessee appeals against an assessment under s. 23(4) he cannot challenge that order. Apart from that, it is open to him to challenge the actual assessment made, and in challenging that it is open to him to satisfy the Appellate Assistant Commissioner that the assessment made by the Income-tax Officer was not a proper assessment.

The larger question as to whether it is open to an assessee to raise a question of the validity of the assessment even though he could have applied under s. 27 has been argued at some length; our attention has been drawn to various authorities, and we might now proceed to consider it. Now, in this connection we might look at what the legislative provision was with regard to appeal prior to the Act of 1939. Under the old Act, while s. 30 gave a right of appeal against the assessment under s. 23 or 27, the proviso limited the right of appeal by providing that no appeal shall lie in respect of assessment made under s. 23(4) or under that sub-section read with s. 27. Therefore, against a best judgment assessment, the assessee had no right of appeal at all. He could not appeal against the quantum of the assessable income determined by the Income-tax Officer. His only right was to appeal against an order made under s. 27, and if he did not do so, the assessment under s. 23(4) not only became conclusive with regard to the matters covered by s. 27 but it also became conclusive with regard to the quantum. Now in the Act of 1939 the proviso was deleted with the result that an important additional right was given to the assessee, namely, to challenge the best judgment assessment with regard to the quantum. But the provision with regard to challenging the assessment with regard to its validity continued to be the same. In other words, an appeal could only lie with regard to the validity of the assessment provided an application has been made under s. 27 and an application was refused by the Income-tax Officer.

Now, in this connection, a certain provision of the Act may be looked at which is with regard to the cancellation of a certificate of registration. Now, s. 23(4) while providing for the best judgment assessment also empowers the Income-tax Officer when the assessee is a firm to refuse to register it or to cancel its registration if it is already registered. Now, it is clear that this provision is penal in character. The result of the contumacy of the assessee is not only that he is liable to be assessed as it were ex-parte, but if the assessee happens to be a firm, the result of its contumacy may be that the registration of the firm may be cancelled. Now, when we turn to s. 27, no provision is made under s. 27 for applying to set aside cancellation of the registration, as there is a provision for setting aside the best judgment assessment. The only right with regard to the cancellation of registration is a substantive right of appeal given under s. 30; so that when a registration is cancelled under s. 23(4) the only right that the assessee has is to appeal against that order under s. 30. When he does so, undoubtedly it would be open to him to satisfy the appellate authority that the penalty was erroneously imposed upon him and in doing so it would be equally open to him to satisfy the appellate authority that he was not contumacious. Mr. Samarth says that it is rather illogical that if he can do so when he appeals against the cancellation of registration, he should be prevented from urging the same point when he is appealing against the best judgment assessment under s. 23(4). The answer is obvious. Whereas the Act has set up a machinery under s. 27 for challenging the decision of the Income-tax Officer to assess according to his best judgment assessment under s. 23(4), the Legislature has not set up any such machinery with regard to the challenging of the order cancelling the registration and, therefore, when the Legislature gives a right of appeal against that order, we must see to it that that right is an effective right and that right can only be effective provided the assessee is entitled to urge in that appeal every circumstance which will go to satisfy the appellate Authority that the order should not have been made by the Income-tax Officer and that he was not contumacious in failing to comply with the notice issued by the Income-tax Officer. Therefore, the whole scheme is a harmonious one and constitutes a coherent whole. When a case falls under s. 27, then any grievance that the assessee has against the Income-tax Officer for not making the requisite order must be litigated in an appeal against an order under s. 27. When s. 27 has no application, then any question that might arise in appeal which has a bearing with regard to an order made by the Income-tax Officer under s. 23(4) can be litigated in an appeal under s. 30. But as we have already pointed out, apart from cases of cancellation of registration, which, in terms, do not fall under s. 27 every other case of contumacious refusal of an assessee of complying with any notice issued by the Income tax Officer must necessarily fall under s. 27 and an order made by the Income-tax Officer that he would proceed to assess under s. 23(4) can only be challenged under s. 27.

In the light of this, let us turn to the authorities which were referred to at the bar. The decision, which is very strongly relied upon by Mr. Samarth is a recent judgment of the Madhya Pradesh High Court and that is reported in Saganchand Kanhaiyalal Bathi v. Commr. of Inc.-Tax.¹ Now, we agree that this is a case which on facts is almost identical with the case that we have before us. That was also a case where the assessee contended that no separate books were maintained at a particular branch where the business was carried on and the Income-tax Officer took the view that the books had been suppressed and the Income-tax Officer proceeded to assess the assessee under s. 23(4) as he failed to produce these books, which, according to the Income-tax Officer he had suppressed. The assessee appealed against the order of the Income-tax Officer under s. 30, and the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that in that appeal the question whether the Income-tax Officer was justified in holding that the books of account were suppressed was implicit and it was incumbent on the Appellate Assistant Commissioner to decide whether the contention of the assessee that the books of account did not exist was correct. Now, with great respect, we are unable to agree with the view of the Madhya Pradesh High Court that the question whether the assessee was justified in not producing the books which were held to be suppressed was a question which did not fall within the ambit of s. 27. The learned Chief Justice at p. 154 points out the cases to which s. 27 applies, and the last case which is there enumerated is "where he was prevented by sufficient cause from complying with the terms of the notice". The learned Chief Justice goes on (p. 154):

"The section does not contemplate a situation in which the assessee says that no books of account were maintained separately at a branch office and the Income-tax Officer holds on evidence before him or otherwise, that such books of account must have been maintained. Where such a finding is given by the Income-tax Officer, the words of s. 27 are inapposite, and no application can really be made for a de novo assessment."

With very great respect, it is difficult to understand why the expression "prevented by sufficient cause" was inapposite or was not wide enough to cover a case where the assessee wants to satisfy the Income-tax Officer that he could not produce the books because not that he had suppressed them but in fact they did not exist. This decision is confined to a case where, according to the Madhya Pradesh High Court, a case does not fall under s. 27, and as we have already pointed out earlier, there would be considerable force in the contention of Mr. Samarth if we were to accept his submission that the present case following the view of the Madhya Pradesh High Court does not fall under s. 27. We are always reluctant to differ from an Indian High Court when it considers an all India statute. But in this case, no authority was cited before the Madhya Pradesh High Court and the earlier decisions of the Calcutta and the Allahabad High Courts were not referred to at all. We are sure that if the attention of the learned Judges had been drawn to these decisions, they would have come to the same conclusion which we have come to.

The next case to which reference may be made is the judgment of the Calcutta High Court reported in *Naba Kumar Singh Dudhuria v. Commr. of Inc.-Tax*², and the Calcutta High Court took the view that the right of appeal under s. 30 should be limited as regards s. 23 and s. 27 to the quantum of assessment of tax. Section 30 does not entitle the assessee to challenge the assessment under s. 23(4) if he has not taken any steps under s. 27 to cancel the order. In our opinion, with respect, this correctly represents the law on the subject.

To the same effect are the two judgments of the Allahabad High Court: *Commr. of Inc.-Tax v. Shri Yodh Raj Bhalla*³ and *Sir Padampat Singhania v. Commr. of Inc.-Tax*⁴. Now, Mr. Samarth has made an attempt to distinguish these cases and what he contends is that in the case before the Calcutta High Court the facts were that a Hindu undivided family was served with a notice for submitting a return. The return was made by a particular person and that return was challenged as not being by an authorised person and the view taken by the Income-tax Officer was that there had been no proper return and therefore he proceeded to assess under s. 23(4). In Commr. of Inc.-Tax v. Shri Yodh Raj Bhalla, it is pointed out that it was a case of non-production of existing books. Similar is the case in Sir Padampat Singhania v. Commr. of Inc.-Tax, and what Mr. Samarth says is that in none of these three cases they had a case similar to the one before us where the ground of proceeding under s. 23(4) was not a non-production of existing books but of books having been suppressed. As we have already pointed, we see no distinction in principle between the facts in the three cases to which reference has been made and the facts in the case before us. All these are cases which fall under s. 27, and if they do fall under s. 27, then all the three authorities have laid down that an appeal against the assessment under s. 23(4) must be restricted to the quantum.

The result, therefore, is that we must uphold the view of the Tribunal, although, with respect, we feel that the controversy between the parties has not been properly brought out in the questions as framed by the Tribunal. We will, therefore, reframe the question and divide it into two parts. The first question will be:

(1) Whether in the circumstances of the case the assessee could have made an application under s. 27?

To that our answer will be in the affirmative.

(2) If the assessee could have made an application under s. 27, whether it was open to him to challenge the validity of the assessment under s. 23(4) in an appeal under s. 30?

And our answer to that question will be in the negative.

The assessee must pay the costs.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 10—Assessee in course of their business submitting tender to supply certain commodities—Assessee under terms of tender depositing certain amount as security for carrying out contract—Forfeiture of amount deposited on failure of assessee to carry out contract—Whether assessee can claim deduction of amount forfeited as trading loss.

The assessee firm, which carried on business in several commodities, in the course of their business submitted a tender to a railway company and undertook to supply certain commodities to the company. In accordance with the terms of the tender the assessee deposited a certain amount as a security for properly carrying out the contract. The assessee failed to carry out the contract with the result that the company forfeited the amount which was deposited with it in respect of the tender. On the question whether in computing the business profits of the assessee under s. 10 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, the assessee was entitled to claim deduction of the amount forfeited as a trading loss:—

Held, that as the making of the deposit was incidental to the business which the assessee was carrying on, the deposit could be looked upon as a business expenditure and as it was forfeited it was a business loss in respect of which the assessee could claim deduction.

Lord's Dairy Farm, Ltd. v. Com., I. T.¹, Tata Hydro-Electric Agencies, Ltd., Bombay v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay² and Commissioner of Income-tax, Lucknow v. Motiram Nandaram,³ referred to.

MESSES. NARANDAS MATHURADAS & Co. (assessee), which carried on business in several commodities, submitted tenders to the former B.B. & C.I. Railway and undertook to supply certain commodities. In accordance with the terms of the tenders, the assessee deposited certain amounts as security for properly carrying out the contracts. The assessee could not carry out the contract with the result that an amount of Rs. 4,419 deposited in respect of the contract was forfeited. The assessee claimed deduction of this amount in computing his business profits as a trading loss but the Income-tax Officer disallowed it on the ground that the loss was of a capital nature. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner and the Appellate Tribunal rejected the assessee's contention.

The following question of law was referred to the High Court:—

"Whether in computing the business profits under section 10, the assessee is entitled to claim deduction of Rs. 4,419, that being loss that occurred on account of forfeiture of the security deposit?"

The reference was heard.

CHAGLA C.J. The question raised on this reference is the difficult and highly debatable one of whether a particular expenditure constitutes a revenue or a capital expenditure. The facts are very few. The assessee firm carries on business in several commodities and in the course of their business they submitted tenders to the B.B. & C.I. Railway and undertook to supply certain commodities. In accordance with the term of the tender it had to deposit a certain amount as security for properly carrying out the contract. In the particular case with which we are concerned, the assessee could not carry out the contract, with the result that the amount of Rs. 4,419 deposited in respect of that particular tender was forfeited, and the assessee claimed this as a trading loss. The Tribunal has taken the view that this was a capital loss and, therefore, no deduction was permissible. We have not the advantage of any reason given by the Tribunal as to why it has come to this conclusion.

Now, it has often been said that the line to be drawn between a revenue and a capital expenditure is a very thin line and it is always difficult to decide on which side of the line a particular case falls. But we have laid down a principle in *Lord's Dairy Farm, Ltd. v. Commr., I.T.*¹ which we think may be safely applied to the facts of this case, and this is what we say: (p. 446):

"...As has been often pointed out, the object of s. 10 is to ascertain the true profits and gains of an assessee. The profits must be ascertained from a commercial point of view. Sub-section (2) of s. 10 deals with certain specific cases of permissible deductions. But even apart from these permissible deductions, if there is any loss which from the commercial point of view can be considered to be a trading loss, then that loss must be deducted before the true profits can be ascertained."

Therefore, we must approach this question not from any technical point of view, but from the broad commercial aspect of the matter, and what we have really to decide is whether in arriving at the profits and gains of a business carried on by the assessee it would be permissible to him to deduct this particular loss in order to arrive at the true profits of the business. It should be borne in mind that this expenditure is not claimed as any specific allowance falling under sub-s. (2) of s. 10. The contention of the assessee is that this is a trading loss and the true profits of his business which are subject to tax cannot be ascertained unless this deduction is permitted to him.

The argument of Mr. Joshi is that this deposit was made by the assessee not for the purpose of earning profits but for the purpose of obtaining a business which would make it possible to earn profits. In other words, his contention is that the payment of this deposit is antecedent to and de hors the business which the assessee carried on and which yielded profits to him. Apart from authorities to which we shall presently turn, the contention does not seem to be tenable. This is not a case where the assessee makes this deposit in order to acquire a business, nor is this a case where an amount is deposited as a sort of a temporary investment yielding interest, the deposit being necessary in order that the assessee should be permitted to carry on a particular business. The assessee already has his business. His business is to sell various commodities and in the course of this business, not de hors it, he submits a tender to the railway company. It is one of the terms of the tender that he must make the deposit. Therefore, the making of the deposit is incidental to the business which he is carrying on. This is not a case where it is suggested that the assessee committed a breach of the contract fraudulently or that he deliberately failed to discharge his obligations under the contract. The failure to deliver the goods to the railway company was incidental to the business. It is something which would happen in any business and which would happen to any businessman. Therefore, looking at the matter on principle and from a broad point of view that we have suggested, it seems to us that this is a trading loss and the assessee is entitled to deduct it from his profits in order that the assessable profits can be ascertained.

The two authorities on which Mr. Joshi relied are both decisions of the Privy Council, and as will be noticed, the facts in those two cases were entirely different. The first is *Tata Hydro-Electric Agencies, Ltd., Bombay v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay*². That is the well known case and it is in the context of the facts there that the Privy Council said (p. 781):

"Their Lordships recognise, and the decided cases show, how difficult it is to discriminate between expenditure which is, and expenditure which is not, incurred solely for the purpose of earning profits or gains."

Now, in the first place, the Privy Council was not considering the case of a trading loss. The Privy Council was considering a specific allowance claimed under the provisions of s. 10(2) of the Income-tax Act, and even in deciding that the Privy Council felt difficulty, and the Privy Council points out that the payments they were considering were not made in the process of earning profits. They did not arise out of any transactions in the conduct of their business. That the assessee had to make those payments no doubt affected the ultimate yield in money to them from their business but that is not the statutory criterion. The obligation to make these payments was undertaken by the assessee in consideration of their acquisition of the right and opportunity to earn profits, that is, of the right to conduct the business, and not for the purpose of producing profits in the conduct of the business. Now, this according to Mr. Joshi is the criterion and the ratio. Assuming that is the criterion and the ratio, surely it is not applicable to the facts before us. How can it possibly be said in this case that this deposit was made by the assessee in order to acquire the right to conduct the business and not for the purpose of producing profits in the conduct of the business? The business was already being carried on by the assessee. This was a transaction in that business. It is in order to put through that transaction that the deposit was necessary.

The second case referred to by Mr. Joshi is *Commissioner of Income-tax, Lucknow v. Motiram Nandram*³. In that case the assessee were carrying on business of cloth, yarn and money-lending and they wanted to start a new business and for that purpose they deposited with an oil company Rs. 50,000. In consideration of that the assessee were appointed organising agents of the oil company for five years for a particular area. They were to recommend the selling agents and the sales were to be conducted by these selling agents, but the assessee were to receive certain commission on all goods sold by the selling agents within the area and also on all sales effected in the area by the company. The deposit was to yield interest at 7 per cent. Part of the deposit was repaid and then the company went into liquidation, and the assessee claimed the part of the deposit which was lost to them and that claim was rejected by the Privy Council. Now, in the first place, the Privy Council took the view that the deposit was made by the assessee for the purpose of being permitted to be engaged in a business and that must be considered to be a purpose of securing an enduring benefit of a calculating nature. Therefore, on the facts of that case where the assessee were launching upon a new business and they could only start this business by making this deposit, the Privy Council observed that by making the deposit they were getting a capital asset of an enduring nature, the capital asset being the business. Mr. Joshi says that in this case also by making the deposit the assessee is obtaining a business. But that is not correct. It is true that under the Income-tax law even a single venture may be business, but this is not a case of a single venture. As we have pointed out before, it is in the course of the business which the assessee had been carrying on that it entered into this particular transaction. So this is neither a case of acquiring a new business, nor acquiring a joint venture which may be looked upon as a capital asset of an enduring nature. Further, at p. 138 Sir George Rankin, who delivered the judgment of the Privy Council, points out that the deposit of Rs. 50,000 may be looked upon as a temporary investment because it yielded interest while it remained with the oil company. That feature is also absent in the case before us. Nobody can suggest that the deposit was made by the assessee as a temporary investment with the railway company. It was expressly made as an earnest; as security for carrying out the particular contract. Their Lordships also say that a deposit must be considered in relation to the particular business, and when we look upon this deposit and the relation it has to the business of the assessee, it is clear that the deposit was made not for the purpose of acquiring any capital asset of an enduring nature or acquiring a new business, but it was made solely for the purpose of earning profits in the course of the business. The Privy Council also points out that the question that should be posed is—"What is the object of the expenditure?"—and they proceed to answer that question by saying—"It must be answered from the standpoint of the assessee at the time the deposit was made." From the point of view of the assessee in this case there cannot be the slightest doubt that the deposit was looked upon as a business expenditure and if the deposit was forfeited it was a business loss.

The result is that we must answer the question submitted to us in the affirmative. The Commissioner to pay the costs.

CHANDRABHAGA SADASHIV VERALKAR v. BHIKACHAND HANSAJI.*

Arbitration Act (X of 1940), Secs. 31, 32, 33—Dispute between plaintiff and defendants relating to breach of agreement by defendants and refund of earnest money paid by plaintiff referred to arbitration—Court refusing to pass decree on award made by arbitrators on ground that award compulsorily registrable not registered—Suit filed by plaintiff against defendants to recover earnest money—Whether suit barred by virtue of award.

A dispute between the plaintiff and the defendants relating to a breach of agreement by the defendants to sell certain property to the plaintiff and the refund of earnest money to the plaintiff was referred to arbitration by the parties. When the award made by the arbitrators was sought to be filed in Court under the Arbitration Act, 1940, the Court refused to pass a decree in terms of the award on the ground, alleged by the defendants, that the award which was compulsorily registrable was not registered. The plaintiff then filed a suit against the defendants to recover the earnest money paid by him to the defendants. On the question whether the suit was barred under ss. 31, 32 and 33 of the Arbitration Act, 1940, by virtue of the award:—

Held, that as the award had no legal existence, it did not bar the plaintiff's suit which was based on his original cause of action.

CERTAIN disputes between one Bhikachand (plaintiff) and Chandrabhaga and another (defendants), in respect of an agreement dated February 6, 1950, to purchase property, were referred to arbitrators appointed under the agreement executed by them. The arbitrators gave their award and applied to the Court for pronouncing judgment in terms of the award. The plaintiff agreed to have a decree in terms of the award but the defendants objected to the award on the ground that as the award which was compulsorily registrable was not registered, it was inadmissible in evidence. The Court upheld this objection and dismissed the application of the arbitrators.

The plaintiff filed the present suit against the defendants for return of earnest money paid by him to the defendants under the aforesaid agreement dated February 6, 1950. The trial Judge held that the suit was barred under ss. 31, 32 and 33 of the Arbitration Act, 1940. On appeal the District Judge confirmed the decree of the trial Court and dismissed the appeal. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court. The appeal was heard by Bavdekar J. who set aside the decree of the lower Court and remanded the suit to the trial Court for disposal according to law. His Lordship delivered the following judgment on January 18, 1956:—

BAVDEKAR J. This is an appeal arising from a suit filed by the appellant for recovery of money which he had paid to the defendant under an agreement of purchase dated February 6, 1950. It appears that inasmuch as it was the contention of the plaintiff that the defendant had no marketable title, he was entitled to avoid the transaction and to refund of the purchase money. The defence to the action was an award which was alleged to have been made on a reference made by the parties. It is common ground now that there was an award made; but when the award was sent to the Court in which it was to be filed, the defendant resisted, contending that the award was required to be registered and that it was not registered. The Court thereupon refused to file the award either with or without the charge owing to which it was said that the award required registration. The defendant made a separate application for setting aside the award; but the Court said that in view of its order in regard to the filing of the award, this application no longer survived. The plaintiff then filed the suit from which the present appeal arises. The defendant relied upon the award as a defence to the suit. This contention has prevailed so far, and the plaintiff has come to this Court in second appeal.

Now, an award is a defence to a suit. But it has got to be remembered that in the present case the plaintiff did seek to get a decree upon the award. He was resisted by the defendant who claimed that the plaintiff was not entitled to get a decree for money; he could not only not get a decree for money with a charge being incorporated in it, but that he was not entitled to get any decree at all. The argument which was made before the learned Judge, who was considering the question whether the award should be filed or not, was that the award not having been registered could not even be received in evidence and the order which the learned Judge thereupon made was that he would not file the award. He said, besides, that in view of this order of his, no order was necessary upon the application which was made by the defendant to set aside the award. Now, it is obvious that the result of this order is that it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to get any decree of any kind upon the award. He could not get a decree with the charge; he could not get a decree without the charge. I cannot hold that the learned Judge held that the plaintiff could, if he liked, get a decree without the charge. If he had so held, then it is obvious that he would have had to go into the application which was made by the defendant for setting aside the award, because in case the award was set aside upon the grounds which were urged by the defendant, the plaintiff could not get any decree in terms of the award, whether with the charge or without the charge. It is obvious, therefore, that the result of what the Judge has decided is that the plaintiff's award could not be filed at all.

In that case it must be held that the Court which had got exclusive jurisdiction to decide the question of the validity and effect of the award has pronounced that the award is ineffective for obtaining a decree thereon, though not invalid on the ground of partiality in the arbitrator or such other grounds and cannot be looked into for finding out its terms. The effect of the decision is that inasmuch as the award cannot even be looked into, no decree could be given upon it. The plaintiff could not consequently recover upon that award his amount even without having recourse to the properties which were charged.

It is said, however, that in this case the learned Judge seems to have made a wrong order, and if the plaintiff was aggrieved by that order, he should have gone in appeal. Now, I fail to understand that as a matter of fact a wrong order has been made. There was an application to file the award. The difficulty with regard to the filing of it was that the award could not be looked into for finding what its terms were. I fail to understand how the learned Judge could have given a decree to the plaintiff upon the award even without the charge.

In any case, it is obvious that whatever order was passed then is binding between the plaintiff and the defendant. The defendant cannot say now that this was an award which could have been filed and upon which the plaintiff could have obtained a decree. That being so, the plaintiff was entitled to file a suit upon his original cause of action. To that suit the defendant is entitled to raise a defence that the dispute between the parties was referred to arbitration and the arbitrators have made an award. It is, however, only a valid award which is a defence to a suit. Before the awards were made compulsorily registrable when the Act of 1940 was not in force if a defence had been raised that the dispute between the parties was referred to arbitration and the arbitrators had made an award, it would have been permissible for the plaintiff to raise a contention that the award was an invalid one, and the question would have been gone into in the suit. It is not permissible for the plaintiff now to raise for the first time in such a suit a contention that an award was invalid or ineffective because under s. 31(2) all questions relating to validity, effect and existence of the award shall be decided by the Court in which the award under the agreement has been or may be filed by an order of the Court. Even if the Court in which the question of validity of an award is raised is the same Court in which the suit is filed, the procedure for raising that question is by an application under s. 33. As a matter of fact the defendant himself seems to have raised a contention that the award in this case was an invalid one by an application under s. 33, but when the Court to which the award was sent for filing decided that it could not be filed for lack of registration, it held upon that application that it was not necessary to decide the defendant's application for setting aside the award. The plaintiff does not say, however, in this case that the award was invalid, e.g. for the misconduct of the arbitrators. As a matter of fact, even if he had made a contention in this suit that the award was invalid for the very reasons for which the defendant said that it was invalid, that question could not be determined by the Court in which the suit was filed, because it could only be decided by an application under s. 33. Such an application by the plaintiff was probably out of time at the time when the suit was filed. The plaintiff's objection, however, is that the award was not registered; that it could not be looked at even for the purpose of finding out what its terms were; and he contends that such an award is not available to the defendant as a defence to the suit. Now, while conceding that the only award which can be a defence to a suit upon the original cause of action was a valid award, the defendant says that an award which has not been registered still affords him a defence to the suit. But when it is said that only a valid award can be a defence to the suit what is meant thereby is that an award which has disposed of the dispute which had been referred to the arbitrators is a defence. The Court cannot, however, in this case say whether the award which has been made has disposed of the dispute between the parties because the award is not admissible in evidence and consequently it cannot be looked at for the purpose of finding out its terms, and when we cannot find out its terms it cannot be said whether the award disposed of the dispute between the parties. Similarly it cannot be said whether the award is open to the objections in s. 16(1).

It is necessary now to notice an objection which has been taken under ss. 31, 32 and 33. It is said in the first instance that to allow a plaintiff to file a suit upon the original cause of action when an award has been made even when that award has not been registered is allowing him to get over the provisions of ss. 31, 32 and 33. This objection is easy to understand when no attempt to file an award or have it set aside is made. It is conceded, that in case an award has been declared by the Court, in which it could be filed or it has been filed, to be invalid e.g. for misconduct and set aside, there is nothing which prevents the plaintiff from having his recourse to the original cause of action and filing a suit upon it. The plaintiff's case is that even when the award has not been registered and the Court has pronounced it to be inadmissible in evidence and ineffective for the purpose of getting a decree upon it, he is entitled to fall back upon the original cause of action and sue. That contention may be good or bad. But there is nothing in s. 31, 32 or 33 which prevents a suit upon the original cause of action. The suit which is barred by s. 32 is a suit which seeks to obtain a decision upon the existence, effect or validity of an award, and when the plaintiff sues upon his original cause of action he does not sue for obtaining a decision upon the existence, effect or validity of the award. In effect he is ignoring the award. To such a suit the defendant is entitled to put forward as his defence the award, and if for any reason it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that that award is an invalid one, the defendant can say that that is not a question which can be agitated in the plaintiff's suit, for the reason that such a question can only be decided upon an application under s. 33, and if without there having been any proceedings with regard to the award in the Court in which the award has been or may be filed, the plaintiff comes to the Court, the objection must necessarily prevail. But in this case the award apparently did go to the Court for the purpose of filing. Objection to the validity of the award was taken though it was taken by the defendant. The Court did not decide upon the validity of that objection, because it held that it was unnecessary to decide whether the award was valid or invalid for the reason that the award was not registered and it could not be even looked at for the purpose of finding out what its terms were and it could not be filed. It seems to me that when the Court in which the award was filed has as a matter of fact decided that the award required registration and cannot be looked at for the purpose of finding out its terms it has determined the effect of the award to this extent that the Court of law cannot find out its terms in the absence of registration. It is not in terms stated that the award is not effective even as a defence to any suit which the plaintiff might have filed on it but the question is whether it can be said that the plaintiff's suit does not lie because the plaintiff has not obtained a decision from the Court in which the award was filed and could be filed that the award is ineffective even as a defence to the plaintiff's suit. It appears to me that once the Court to which the award was sent for filing has held that the award not being registered it could not be looked at for the purpose of finding out its terms, it has in effect decided that the award cannot be used as a defence to a suit because no one can say that the award is a defence to a suit unless and until one looks at its terms and finds out that the dispute has been disposed of. The mere fact that the arbitrators purport to make an award is not sufficient to say that they have disposed of the dispute between the parties. It seems to me, therefore, as the Calcutta High Court observed in *Nani Bala v. Ram Gopal*¹ that the award does not exist. It has actual but not legal existence. It would be an unnecessary formality to ask the plaintiff to get an express decision by an application under s. 33 that the award cannot be used as a defence to a suit upon the original cause of action.

It is necessary to consider finally the argument that that would be putting a premium upon failure to get an award registered when it ought to have been registered. But it appears to me that that is not so. It may be that the plaintiff was in fault in this case because he was apparently anxious to have a decree upon it. It is also true that whoever wants to get the benefit of the award would be considered to be the person who ought to get it registered. But then just as in this case the plaintiff wanted to get a decree upon the award and therefore it can be said that he ought to have got it registered if the defendant wanted to use this award and a defence in any suit which the plaintiff might file, then it was he also who ought to have got it registered. Just as if the plaintiff who has failed to get the award registered cannot get a decree upon it, similarly the defendant who has failed to get the award registered owing to which the award cannot be looked at for the purpose of even finding out what its terms are can sue it as a defence to a suit upon the original cause of action.

The appeal must, therefore, be allowed and the suit remanded to the trial Court for further disposal in accordance with the law. The respondent will pay the appellant costs of the first appeal and second appeal.

The defendants appealed under the Letters Patent.

V. B. Raje, for the appellant.

R. B. Kotwal, for the respondent.

PATEL J. The plaintiff-appellant filed the suit for refund of earnest paid under an agreement to purchase to the defendant on February 6, 1950. According to him the defendant has committed the breach. Previous to this there was an arbitration between the parties, but the application made by the arbitrator for a decree in terms of the award was dismissed by the Court as the award was not registered. The defendants raised various contentions to the claim by their written statement one amongst them being a legal one, that the suit was not maintainable in view of ss. 31, 32 and 33 of the Arbitration Act, 1940, as there was a previous arbitration.

The trial Judge raised a preliminary issue and held that the suit was barred and dismissed the same with costs. Plaintiff's appeal to the District Court failed.

The plaintiff thereupon came to the High Court in Second Appeal which was heard by Mr. Justice Baydekar. He did not accept the views of the Courts below. He held agreeing with the Calcutta High Court that the award had a factual existence but no legal existence. He also held that it is only a valid award which is a defence to a suit. In the result he set aside the decisions of the Courts below and remanded the suit for disposal in accordance with law. He, however, gave leave under cl. 15 of the Letters Patent and hence this appeal.

The question, therefore, which falls to be decided is whether the award between the parties had the result of preventing the plaintiff's suit on his original cause of action.

The question must necessarily be decided by reference to the Arbitration Act of 1940. Section 9 of the Civil Procedure Code provides for the jurisdiction of the civil Courts to entertain all suits of a civil nature. A party, therefore, has the right of enforcing his civil rights and remedies by a suit unless it has been taken away by statute either expressly or by necessary implication as provided by s. 9. Mr. Raje for the appellant, insists that that remedy of the plaintiff is taken away by ss. 31, 32 and 33 of the Indian Arbitration Act, and it is equally insisted by Mr. Kotwal for the other side that these sections have not either by express language or by necessary implication taken away his right to file a suit on the original cause of action.

Section 14 of the Arbitration Act requires the arbitrators to make and sign the award and give notice of the fact in writing to the parties. Sub-section (2) provides that at the request of a party the arbitrator shall cause the award to be filed in Court and when this is done the Court shall give notice of its filing to the parties. Sections 15 and 16 empower the Court to modify the award or to remit it to the arbitrators for further consideration. Section 17 states that when the Court sees no cause to remit the award for reconsideration, it shall, after the time for making an application to set it aside has expired or when such an application has been made and refused, proceed to pronounce judgment according to the award, and upon the judgment so pronounced a decree shall follow. It is further provided that there should be no appeal from that decree except on limited grounds which are not relevant for the purpose. It appears that there does not appear any option in the Court to do anything but to pass a decree in terms of the award, if it sees no reason to remit the award as shown by the words, "shall pass" in s. 17. Section 33 provides that any party to an arbitration agreement or award desiring to challenge the existence or validity of the arbitration agreement or award or to have effect of either determined shall apply to the Court and the Court shall decide the question on affidavits, provided that where the Court deems it just and expedient, it may set down the application for hearing on evidence also and may pass such orders as it may do in a suit. It appears that one of the purposes of this section is to enable the parties to file their objections to the award on a notice under s. 14. It, however, appears from the provisions of s. 17 of the Arbitration Act, that it was intended that the Court must carry to its conclusion any proceedings commenced in Court and from the provisions of ss. 31, 32 and 33 that it is the final decree of the Court which can be executed. Section 31 provides an exclusive jurisdiction in the Court for the purpose of deciding any question with regard to the validity, effect or existence of an award or an arbitration agreement. Section 33 in consonance with the exclusive jurisdiction conferred under s. 31 requires that a party desiring to challenge either the existence or validity of an arbitration agreement or award or to have the effect of either determined shall apply to that Court and the Court shall decide that question. Section 32 is as follows:—

"Notwithstanding any law for the time being in force, no suit shall lie on any ground whatsoever for a decision upon the existence, effect or validity of an arbitration agreement or award, nor shall any arbitration agreement or award be set aside, amended, modified or in any way affected otherwise than as provided in this Act."

As natural corollary and in consonance with the intention of the Act, it provides that no suit should lie on any ground whatsoever for a decision upon the existence, effect or validity of an arbitration agreement or award or for the other purposes mentioned there. The Act of 1940, as the preamble shows, was enacted to consolidate and amend the law relating to arbitration in India; and the scheme of the Act appears to be to bring all arbitrations under the control of the Court and treat them as effective only if a decree were obtained on the award in accordance with the Act and to prevent the parties from agitating any question relating to existence, validity, or effect of an arbitration agreement or award in any manner other than that provided by the Act. These sections do not by express language or by implication provide that a suit on the original cause of action after an abortive or incomplete arbitration would not lie.

Mr. Rege contends that ss. 31, 32 and 33 exclude the right of the plaintiff to file the suit on the original cause of action. As stated before the sections themselves do not contain any prohibition nor do the words used necessarily imply such a prohibition. The award cannot be regarded as a judgment as that stage was not reached. After it becomes a judgment in accordance with the Act the provisions of s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, would apply and a suit on the original cause of action barred. It is, therefore, not possible to accept Mr. Rege's contention that the suit of the plaintiff is barred by anything to be found within the terms of ss. 31, 32 and 33.

Mr. Rege has relied on the case of *Laldas v. Bai Lala*¹ and *Bhaurao Jivaji v. Radhabai*². The decisions in these two cases are to the effect that an award is as much binding as a judgment and is indistinguishable from a judgment.

However, as explained in the case of *Bhajakari Saha Banikya v. Behary Lal Basak*³, it is only a valid award that could operate to extinguish the original cause of action. In this case this is what Mr. Justice Mookerjee has observed (p. 888):

"...To put the matter in another way, as an ordinary rule, a valid award operates to merge and extinguish all claims embraced in the submission, and after it has been made, the submission and award furnish the only basis by which the rights of the parties can be determined, and constitute a bar to any action on the original demand; see *Curley v. Dean*⁴;...It is a mistake, therefore, to contend that, if an award has been validly made, as it has been found to have been made in this case, it does not become operative until it has been enforced by suit or application; in reality, it possesses all the elements of vitality even though it has not been formally enforced, and it may be relied upon in a litigation between the parties relating to the same subject-matter. Obviously, if such reliance is placed upon the award, it is open to the party against whom it is sought to be used, to question its validity: but if it is established to be a valid award, it is binding upon the parties as embodying an adjudication of their rights".

It would also appear on a reference to the case of Muhammed Nawaz Khan v. Alam Khan,⁵ that if an award is a legally valid award then it would be binding between the parties. Unless therefore the award is one which can be operative, it will not merge in itself the original cause of action and since after the enactment of the Arbitration Act of 1940 an award is ineffective unless made a rule of the Court, even on general principles it is difficult to say that the original cause of action would merge in the award which has no vitality of its own. Indeed the Act of 1940 being an Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to arbitrations in India, it is doubtful if recourse to the previous law and general principles is permissible. Even assuming however it is open to consider the general principles, for the reasons mentioned before, even according to general principles, unless the award is legally effective, it would not merge in itself the original cause of action, the determination of which question in any suit is by express terms of s. 32 of the Act prohibited. This is the view taken in the case of *Babui S. K. Kuer v. B. N. Sinha*⁶ with which we respectfully agree.

Mr. Rege has relied upon the decision of the Nagpur High Court in *Nathulal v. Beharilal*⁷. In that case the dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant related to damages for breach of contract in respect of purchases of cotton seed for non-delivery. The matter between the parties was referred to the Nagpur Chamber of Commerce Ltd. The defendants challenged the jurisdiction of the arbitrators. The arbitrators overruled that contention and awarded compensation to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' application to have a decree in terms of the award was dismissed by the Court as it was filed after the period of limitation was over. The plaintiffs, thereafter, brought a suit for damages for the breach of the contract. In the plaint the plaintiffs recited the history of the infructuous arbitration. Their Lordships referred to the case of *Manick Lal v. Shiva Jute Baling*⁸ and the case of *Chaturbhuj Mohanlal v. Bhicam Ch.*⁹ which related to the opening words of s. 33, "any party to an arbitration agreement" and then they say that (p. 68):

"while it is not necessary to consider the full effect of the second ruling quoted above, it is obvious that the plaintiff (respondent) cannot escape being called 'a party to the arbitration agreement', whatever may be said of the defendant."

They further say:

"...some difference at least should be made between a plaintiff who, having pushed the arbitration proceedings to an award, seeks to get rid of the award by ignoring it, and a defendant who has not taken any part in the proceedings at all and has objected to the jurisdiction and legality thereof. It appears to us that a plaintiff, in the given circumstances is especially hit by the bar contained in ss. 31 to 33 of the Arbitration Act, 1940." (p. 87)

What is barred is a suit in relation to the arbitration agreement and/or the award. It has no reference whatsoever to what was the subject-matter of the award with regard to which there is no prohibition either express or implied and it would not make any difference whether or not the plaintiff mentioned in his plaint that there was an arbitration agreement and an award, which was ineffective. It does not take into account the express provisions of ss. 31 and 32 which prohibit the determination of the existence, validity or effect of an award otherwise than under the Act. If the award is unfavourable to the plaintiff or actor before the arbitrator, the defendant resistor then has equal right to have it made a rule of the Court. We, therefore, are with respect unable to agree with the conclusion.

The conclusion that a suit on the original cause of action is not barred by the provisions of ss. 31, 32 and 33 appears to be one justifiable on principle and is supported by authority. We hold, therefore, accordingly. The appeal must, therefore, fail and must be dismissed with costs.

GOKHALE J. The only point which falls for consideration in this appeal is whether the plaintiff's suit is barred under the provisions of the Arbitration Act by virtue of the award which the Court under the Arbitration Act refused to file on the ground that it was inadmissible in evidence being compulsorily registrable. Mr. Justice Bavdekar was of the view that the award had no legal existence and therefore could not come in the way of the plaintiff's suit.

Now, at one stage of his arguments, Mr. Rege seemed to contend that the view of the Court in the arbitration proceedings that the award being compulsorily registrable could not be looked into at all was wrong in view of s. 49 of the Registration Act. But he had to concede that the objection as to registration was taken by his own client and the finding of the Court would be binding on both the parties. He, however, contends that an award is not a mere agreement but operates as a judgment and is binding on the parties in matters which it professes to decide, and once an award is passed the rights of the parties become merged in that award, whether the award has merged into a decree or not. In this connection, he relied on two rulings of this Court in *Laldas v. Bai Lala*¹ and *Bhaurao Jivaji v. Radhabhai*². We are concerned in this case with an award passed after the Arbitration Act, 1940, came into force. Prior to the passing of this Act, the view was undoubtedly held that an award did not lose its effectiveness merely because it was not filed or it was not made the subject of any proceedings under the Arbitration Act. A valid award was then an operative award by itself and a suit filed to enforce such an award was competent. But it was only a valid award that could operate to merge and extinguish all claims which were involved in the submission to arbitration and then it could furnish the only basis by which the rights of the parties could be determined and it was a valid award that could constitute a bar to any action on the original demand. See Bhajahari Saha Banikya v. Bhary Lal Basak.³ After the coming into force of the Arbitration Act of 1940, however, it is well settled that a suit to enforce an award is not maintainable. See Bai Narbadabai v. Natvarlal Chunilal.⁴ It was held in this case that the expression "effect of the award" in s. 32 of the Indian Arbitration Act, 1940, was wide enough to cover a suit to enforce an award. But in the present case, the plaintiff is not asking the Court to give him relief on the basis of the award that was passed by the arbitrators. On the defendants' objection the Court refused to file the award on the ground that it was inadmissible in evidence for want of registration. In my opinion, therefore, plaintiff's suit cannot now be defeated by the defendants on the ground that it would be barred by virtue of the provisions of ss. 31, 32 and 33 of the Arbitration Act. In Nani Bala v. Ram Gopal,⁵ it was held by the Calcutta High Court that want of registration is a defect de hors the award and in case of such an award the proper order which the Court should pass on an application for filing it is one of dismissal as there would be no legal evidence to show what the award was. That was what precisely the Court did in connection with the present award when it was sought to be filed, and once it is held that the award does not legally exist it would be difficult to hold that such an award would be a bar to the maintainability of plaintiff's suit. In Venkatasubayya v. Bapadu,⁶ a single Judge of the Madras High Court held that where the defendant, who is himself relying upon the award, does not take steps to have it filed and dealt with under the appropriate provisions of the Arbitration Act, nor is the award fully performed by him, it is not competent to him to rely upon it in answer to an action. This case clearly goes against Mr. Rege's contention. But Mr. Rege drew our attention to another Division Bench ruling of the Madras High Court in Suryanarayana v. Venkata Reddy,⁷ where it was held that a party to an award was not precluded by the provisions of the Arbitration Act from putting forward an award which was fully performed by him, but which was not filed under s. 14 and according to which a judgment was not pronounced or a decree given under s. 17, in answer to the other party's claim which was the subject-matter of the reference and the award. But this case was rightly distinguished in the later case in Venkatasubayya v. Bapadu, referred to above, on the ground that in the earlier Madras case the defendant had actually performed that part of the award which had to be performed by him. In the present case, the defendant has not only failed to act up to the award but actually resisted the filing of it, by contending that it could not be looked into for want of registration. In *Babui S. K. Kuer v. B. N. Sinha*⁸ an award was made by an arbitrator appointed under a private reference relating to the partition of moveable and immoveable property held in common by the family of the plaintiffs and the family of the defendants. The award was duly registered, but no application was made by either party to file the award under s. 14, sub-s. (1), of the Arbitration Act, 1940. Subsequently, as the defendants refused to comply with the directions of the arbitrator, the plaintiffs filed a suit for partition on the original title and it was held that the suit was not barred by reason of the award made by the arbitrator. In my opinion, the principle of this case would be applicable to the case before us.

The result is that the view of Mr. Justice Baydekar that the award set up by the defendant as a bar to plaintiff's suit had no legal existence and, therefore, could not make the plaintiff's suit incompetent appears to me to be correct. I, therefore, agree that the present appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Per curiam: As the suit is one of 1952, we direct that the hearing of the suit be expedited as far as possible. Papers to be sent down immediately.

Order accordingly.

INCOME-TAX REFERENCE.

Before Mr. Justice S. T. Desai and Mr. Justice K. T. Desai.

THE EXECUTORS AND TRUSTEES OF SIR COWASJI JEHangIR, 1ST BART., BOMBAY

THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY CITY I, BOMBAY.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 23A, 17(6)(7), 12B—Order under s. 23A(1) made on company and undistributed portion of assessable income determined—Total income of company as determined including a sum directly taken to general reserve by company—Sum so taken taxed as capital gains in hands of company—Proportionate share in undistributed income of company included in total income of assesses-shareholders of company—Whether portion of s. 23A dividend attributable to capital gains of company should be taxed as capital gains of assesses under s. 17(6).

The Income-tax Officer made an order in the case of a company under s. 23A(1) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922 (as it stood before its amendment in 1955). In making the order of assessment on the company the Income-tax Officer determined the total income of the company and determined the undistributed portion of the assessable income of the company for the relevant year. The total income of the company as determined included a certain amount which the company had taken directly to the general reserve fund and not to the profit and loss account and no part of it was distributed as dividend. This sum was brought to tax in the hands of the company as "capital gains" under s. 12B of the Act. The Income-tax Officer in assessing the assessee, who was a shareholder of the company, for the relevant year, included in his total income his proportionate share in the amount of the undistributed portion of the income of the company. The assessee contended that the portion of s. 23A dividend attributable to capital gains in the hands of the company should be taxed in his hands also at the rate appropriate to "capital gains" as indicated in s. 17(6) of the Act:—

Held, that an equation could not be established between the capital gains of the company and the dividend which the assessee was deemed to have received by operation of s. 23A of the Act, and that by reason of the legal fiction contained in s. 23A, the proportionate undistributed income of the company had become the dividend income of the assessee and was liable to be taxed as such.

*East End Dwellings Co. Ltd. v. Finsbury Borough Council*¹ and *Venkatachalam v. Bombay Dyeing and Mfg. Co., Ltd.*², referred to.

AN order under s. 23A(1) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, was made by the Income-tax Officer in the case of Messrs. Cawasji Jehangir & Co. Ltd. in respect of its income, profits and gains of the "previous year" 1946. In making that order the Income-tax Officer determined the undistributed portion of the assessable income of the company of that previous year as computed for income-tax purposes and reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof.

account and no part thereof was distributed as dividend. This amount was brought to tax in the hands of the company under s. 12B of the Act as "capital gains."

In the assessments made on six shareholders of the company (assesseees), for the assessment year 1948-49, the Income-tax Officer included in the total income of each of the shareholders a proportional share of Rs. 8,25,133. After grossing up the proportionate share under s. 16(2), the Income-tax Officer computed the total income of each of the assesseees by including a sum of Rs. 6,31,527 as s. 23A dividend in the case of one of the assesseees and a sum of Rs. 1,26,805 in the case of each of the five remaining assesseees. The assesseees contended that the portion of s. 23A dividend attributable to capital gains in the hands of the company should be taxed in the hands of the assesseees at the rate appropriate to "capital gains" under s. 17(6). On appeal the Tribunal held that the s. 23A dividend included in the total income of the assesseees could not be dissected for the purpose of determining income-tax and super-tax payable thereon by the assesseees.

The following question of law was referred to the High Court:—

"Whether the section 23A dividend of Rs. 6,31,527 can be dissected into two parts in the ratio of Rs. 7,86,900: Rs. 20,63,016 for the purpose of determining the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the assessee-shareholder on his total income and if so, whether that smaller portion of Rs. 6,31,527 is liable to be taxed at the rates applicable to 'Capital gains' as laid down in Section 17(6) of the Income-tax Act, 1922?"

The reference was heard.

N. A. Palkhivala, with Sir Jamshedji Kanga and E. J. Kolah, for the assesseees.

G. N. Joshi, with E. J. Joshi, for the Commissioner of Income-tax.

S. T. DESAI J. These six references arise out of assessments made on the six assesseees who are shareholders of Messrs. Cawasji Jehangir & Co. Ltd. The assessment year is 1948-49. An order was made under s. 23A(1) in the matter of M/s. Cawasji Jehangir & Co. Ltd.—whom we shall refer to as 'the company'—by the Income-tax Officer in respect of the previous year, which was 1946. The total income of the company was determined at Rs. 20,63,016. What the company had done was that out of this amount it had taken a sum of Rs. 7,86,900 directly to the General Reserves and not to the profit and loss account and no part of the same was distributed as dividend. The dividend declared amounted to Rs. 4,34,768. This was less than 60 per cent. of the assessable income of the company for that previous year as reduced by the amounts of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect of the same. In making the order of assessment on the company the Income-tax Officer determined the undistributed portion of the assessable income of the company of that previous year as computed for income-tax purposes and reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof. This will appear from the following figures:—

Total income finally determined		Rs. 20,63,016
Less: Tax payable		Rs. 8,03,115
		Rs. 12,59,901
Less: Dividend declared by the company		Rs. 4,34,768
		Rs. 8,25,133

The sum of Rs. 7,86,900 was brought to tax in the hands of the company under s. 12B as "capital gains". Having determined the figure of Rs. 8,25,133 as pointed out by us above, the proportionate share thereof was included by the Income-tax Officer in the total income of each shareholder for the purpose of assessing his total income. Suitable grossing up was done as required by

s. 16(2). Having done that, the Income-tax Officer computed the total income of the six shareholders by including a sum of Rs. 6,31,527 (as s. 23A dividend) in the case of "the Executors and Trustees of late Sir Cawasji Jehangir, 1st Bart." and a sum of Rs. 1,26,305 in the case of each of the five other shareholders.

The contention of the assesses before the Income-tax Officer and the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was that the portion of s. 23A dividend attributable to capital gains in the hands of the company should be taxed in the hands of the shareholders also at the rate appropriate to "capital gains" as indicated in s. 17(6) of the Act. The Income-tax Officer as well as the Appellate Assistant Commissioner negatived that contention. The matter was carried in appeal by the assesses to the Tribunal and the Tribunal also dismissed that contention. The view taken by the Tribunal was that s. 23A dividend that is included in the total income of an assessee shareholder cannot be dissected as urged on behalf of the assesses for the purpose of determining the income-tax and super-tax payable by them on the "deemed dividend income". The assesses have now come before us on these References.

The question which we are called upon to determine is:

"Whether the s. 23A dividend of Rs. 6,31,527 can be dissected into two parts in the ratio of Rs. 7,86,900: Rs. 20,63,016 for the purpose of determining the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the assessee-shareholder on his total income and if so, whether that smaller portion of Rs. 6,31,527 is liable to be taxed at the rates applicable to "capital gains" as laid down in s. 17(6) of the Income-tax Act, 1922?"

We may state that the same question of law arises in the case of all the shareholders, the only difference being that in the case of one shareholder the amount is Rs. 6,31,527 and in the case of others Rs. 1,26,305 each.

Two contentions have been pressed before us by Mr. Palkhivala, learned counsel for the assesses. The first contention is that the actual distribution of dividend by the company out of the capital gains would be capital gains in the hands of the shareholders. We shall presently examine this argument. It will suffice here to observe that the argument in effect seeks to establish an equivalence between the capital gains of the company and the capital gains of the shareholders. The second contention urged before us by learned counsel for the assesses is that under s. 23A it is not the income of the company which is deemed to have been distributed among the shareholders but it is the income as computed in the hands of the company that is distributed.

Before examining the arguments, it will be convenient to refer to the relevant sections. Section 12B has now been recast. We are concerned with the old section, the relevant part of which ran as under:—

"12B. Capital Gains: (1) The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head "Capital Gains" in respect of any profits or gains arising from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset effected after the 31st day of March 1946 and before the 1st day of April 1948; and such profits and gains shall be deemed to be income of the previous year in which the sale, exchange or transfer took place..."

Section 17(7) as it stands today is different. The old sub-section with which we are concerned in these references was as follows:—

"17(7). Where the total income of a company includes any income chargeable under the head "Capital Gains", the super-tax payable by the company in any year shall be reduced by an amount computed on that part of its total income which consists of such inclusion at the rate of super-tax (excluding the rate of additional super-tax, if any) specified in the case of a company by the annual Central Act fixing the rate or rates of tax for that year."

It will be seen that in this section the Legislature is laying down a rule in respect of the total income of a company. Section 17(6) as it stands today is different. The relevant part of the old sub-section, with which we are concerned in these references, was as under:—

"17(6). Where the total income of an assessee, not being a company, includes any income chargeable under the head "Capital Gains", the tax, including super-tax, payable by him on his total income shall be—

(i) income-tax and super-tax payable on his total income as reduced by the amount of such inclusion, had such reduced income been his total income..."

Clause (ii) has been altered. It relates to rates. Section 23A as it stands to-day has also been recast. The material part of the section as it stood before its amendment by the Finance Act, 1955, was as under:—

"23A. Power to assess individual members of certain companies: (1) Where the Income-tax Officer is satisfied that in respect of any previous year the profits and gains distributed as dividends by any company up to the end of the sixth month after its accounts for that previous year are laid before the company in general meeting are less than sixty per cent. of the assessable income of the company of that previous year, as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof he shall, unless he is satisfied that having regard to losses incurred by the company in earlier years or to the smallness of the profits made, the payment of a dividend or a larger dividend than that declared would be unreasonable, make with the previous approval of the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner an order in writing that the undistributed portion of the assessable income of the company of that previous year as computed for income-tax purposes and reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof shall be deemed to have been distributed as dividends amongst the shareholders as at the date of the general meeting aforesaid, and thereupon the proportionate share thereof of each shareholder shall be included in the total income of such shareholder for the purpose of assessing his total income:..."

It is not very necessary to set out the provisos and the explanation to sub-s. (1) of s. 23A.

The material words of the section quoted above are:

"where the Income-tax Officer is satisfied that in respect of any previous year the profits and gains distributed as dividends by any company...are less than sixty per cent. of the assessable income of the company of that previous year, as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof he shall,... make...an order in writing that the undistributed portion of the assessable income of the company of that previous year as computed for income-tax purposes...shall be deemed to have been distributed as dividends amongst the shareholders...and thereupon the proportionate share thereof of each shareholder shall be included in the total income of such shareholder for the purpose of assessing his total income."

Therefore, it is laid down in terms express and explicit that for the purpose of assessing the total income of the assessee his proportionate share of the undistributed income of the company is to be deemed to have been paid to and received by him as dividend. The question is whether there is anything in the language of the section which suggests that what is chargeable to the company as part of its total income under the head of "capital gains" is also quoad a shareholder chargeable not merely as dividend under the head of "income from other sources" as stated in s. 6(v), but to be split up and partly chargeable as "capital gains" and partly chargeable as dividend income.

Now, it is argued that on a proper reading of the relevant sections, the actual distribution of dividends by a company out of the capital gains would be capital gains in the hands of the shareholders. Mr. Palkhivala has drawn our attention to a decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Bacha Guedar v. Comr. I. T. Bombay.¹ It is said that the Tribunal was in error in placing too much reliance on certain observations in that case. We shall presently quote them. The argument is that the ratio decidendi of that case was quite different because in that case the Supreme Court was dealing with "agricultural income" under s. 4(3) (viii). An attempt is made to show that there is nothing in the observations made by their Lordships in that case which goes counter to the submission urged before us and which submission, if analysed, requires an equivalence to be established between the capital gains of a company and the capital gains of the shareholders of that company. Now, we agree with Mr. Palkhivala that in that case the Supreme Court was not dealing with any question under s. 23A. There are, however, some general observations of their Lordships in that case, which, if we may respectfully say so, throw light and afford guidance on the question of the nature of the rights of a shareholder vis-a-vis the company in the context of income-tax law. At p. 619 of that report, it is observed as under:—

“...That a shareholder acquires a right to participate in the profits of the company may be readily conceded but it is not possible to accept the contention that the shareholder acquires any interest in the assets of the company. The use of the word “assets” in the passage quoted above cannot be exploited to warrant the inference that a shareholder, on investing money in the purchase of shares, becomes entitled to the assets of the company and has any share in the property of the company. A shareholder has got no interest in the property of the company though he has undoubtedly a right to participate in the profits if and when the company decides to divide them...It is true that the shareholders of the company have the sole determining voice in administering the affairs of the company and are entitled, as provided by the articles of association, to declare that dividends should be distributed out of the profits of the company to the shareholders but the interest of the shareholder either individually or collectively does not amount to more than a right to participate in the profits of the company. The company is a juristic person and is distinct from the shareholders. It is the company which owns the property and not the shareholders...”

The Tribunal has relied on this decision in support of its conclusion that the capital gains of the company under s. 12B are not the capital gains of the shareholders.

The argument of counsel ran that the observations quoted by us immediately above were made in a somewhat different context and that they are not applicable to the facts of this case. It was emphasised that the decision turned on the construction of the expression “agricultural income”. We shall accept for the purpose of these references the argument of learned counsel that the question of law before us is not covered by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Bacha Guzdar v. Comr. I. T. Bombay.

It is not necessary to examine this argument of Mr. Palkhivala in any details since, as we understand it, it is the second contention on which the assesses seem to rely much more in these references. There are a number of answers to this argument. One is to be found in the language of sub-ss. (6) and (7) of s. 17, the relevant parts of which we have already quoted. The “Capital gains” are considered and had to be considered separately in the case of the company and in the case of an assessee who is not a company in these two sub-sections. What is more important is the language of s. 12B. The tax payable by an assessee under the head of “capital gains” relates to the assessee and it relates to the capital gains of the assessee in respect of any profits or gains arising from the sale, exchange or transfer of capital assets of the assessee himself. If the assessee is a company, the capital gains are the gains of the assessee company; if the assessee is an individual shareholder, the capital gains are the capital gains of the individual shareholder. There is nothing in the language of sub-ss. (6) and (7) of s. 17 or in the language of s. 12B which lends slightest support or countenances the suggestion that an equation can possibly be established between the capital gains of a company and the dividends which the assessee is deemed to have received by the operation of s. 23A. They are apart.

The other argument of Mr. Palkhivala is founded on s. 23A. It is stated that under that section it is not the income of the company which is deemed to have been distributed amongst the shareholders, but it is the income as computed in the hands of the company that is distributed amongst the shareholders. So far, there is no difficulty. But the difficulty of the assessee arises when he practically chooses to ignore the most important part of s. 23A which brings into the assessment of the shareholders a notional income. It is by fiction juris that the undistributed income of the company as computed in accordance with the requirements of the section, is to be deemed to have been distributed as dividends amongst the shareholders as at the date of the general meeting referred to in the section and it is the proportionate share of the undistributed income of the assessable income of the company computed as aforesaid that is to be included in the total income of the shareholders for the purpose of assessing their total income. Learned counsel for the assesses has further submitted that the right principles governing the nature of dividends generally, and in any event having regard to the language of s. 23A, are that the impress of capital gains remains on the notional gains and it is only the notional gains which are distributed amongst the shareholders. It is the notional dividend which is to be deemed to have been received by the shareholders although they have in fact not received the dividend that is included in their total income and, therefore, says Mr. Palkhivala, the impress of capital gains must continue to attach to what is deemed to have been distributed as dividends amongst the shareholders. In this context also, learned counsel has stressed that the decision of the Supreme Court to which we have already made reference requires to be distinguished because in that case the Court had to consider the actual distribution and not a notional distribution. It is also stated that the notional distribution cannot change the character or nature of the income. The argument is that a shareholder is entitled to identify himself with the company and that his individual income must be understood as a species of the income made by the company. It is then stated that the crucial words in s. 23A are "as computed for income tax purposes". These words, it is urged, have a dual meaning: (1) the quantum as computed and (2) the nature and the head of computation. It is impossible for us to acquiesce in this line of reasoning. We have to construe s. 23A and to see if there is anything in the language or phrasing of any part of that section which permits an assessee-shareholder to take advantage of the provisions relating to assessment of capital gains on the income of a company in the manner and at the rate laid down in the relevant provisions.

It has so often been emphasized that as far as possible nothing can be read and nothing can be implied in a taxing statute. We have to look fairly at the language used. The indispensable starting point and the first step is to examine the words of the provision under consideration. When we examine the words of the provision itself, we find nothing in it which may even remotely be said to suggest that the assessee is entitled to say that when he is deemed to have received dividend by the fiction of law incorporated in s. 23A(1), he is entitled to identify himself with the company or to assert an equivalence between his income and the income of the company or the mode or method of assessing his income and the income of the company. True, we have to remember that we are dealing with a fiction juris.

Now, in the judgment of the Tribunal we find that Mr. Palkhivala, who appeared before the Tribunal, had also urged that full effect must be given to the legal fiction that is created by s. 23A. The Tribunal states in its judgment: "we are unable to accept this contention". We do not agree with the Tribunal that full effect should not be given to the legal fiction. We wholly agree with Mr. Palkhivala in the suggestion made by him before the Tribunal that full effect must be given to the legal fiction incorporated in s. 23A. However, it is the legal fiction which is the main difficulty of the assesses and it is the effect of that legal fiction which Mr. Palkhivala has very valiantly tried to struggle against. We must now examine the submission made before us. The submission now is that the legal fiction is not to be applied in this case with all its effect because there are words in the section itself which retard or prevent the legal fiction having full force. What we are concerned with, however, is not the argument that was urged before the Tribunal, but the argument which has been pressed before us.

The words that something will be deemed to have been done for the purpose of incorporating a legal fiction have been considered by Courts in some very recent decisions both in England and in India. There is a passage in the judgment of Lord Asquith of Bishopstone in *East End Dwellings Co. Ltd. v. Finsbury Borough Council*² which has taken a very short time to become locus classicus. His Lordship observed in that case (p. 132):

"If you are bidden to treat an imaginary state of affairs as real, you must surely, unless prohibited from doing so, also imagine as real the consequences and incidents which, if the putative state of affairs had in fact existed, must inevitably have flowed from or accompanied it...The statute says that you must imagine a certain state of affairs; it does not say that having done so, you must cause or permit your imagination to boggle when it comes to the inevitable corollaries of that state of affairs."

In a very recent judgment given by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Venkatachalam v. Bombay Dyeing and Mfg. Co. Ltd.,³ Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar in delivering the judgment of the Court cited these observations in support of the view taken on the construction of similar words. Now, it is clear from the language of s. 23A that we are dealing with an imaginary state of affairs as real. The dividend income which is not paid to nor received by the shareholders is to be deemed for the purpose of assessment to have been distributed as dividend to the shareholders along with other shareholders and it is to be included in their total income for the purpose of assessing their total income. We have not to permit our imagination to boggle and have to continue to imagine as real the consequences and incidents of that putative state of affairs, and the putative state of affairs is that dividend is deemed to have been declared and received by the shareholders. Therefore, we have to take it that dividend was in fact received by the shareholders, and if the dividend was in fact received by the shareholders the only consideration that remains is can a shareholder who has received dividend in respect of the profits of a company say that the dividend which he has received is to be split up into a number of heads for the purpose of assessment in arriving at his total income. Can he say that a part of that dividend income is income from "capital gains" and a part of that dividend income is dividend income assessable under the head "other sources"? The answer to this seems to us to be obvious. There is, as we have already mentioned, not the remotest suggestion in any relevant section which can lend support to the proposition canvassed before us. The shareholder and the company are separate entities. Section 17(6) with which we are more concerned clearly postulates an income of the assessee chargeable under the head "capital gains". It is extremely difficult for us to see how it can be said that in the present case the assessee shareholder himself became chargeable under the head of "capital gains". We have gone beyond the stage of the initial fiction and we are at this stage dealing with s. 17(6) because the income has for the present purposes to be treated as income already paid to and received by the assessee and it is that income which is to be charged to tax. "Capital gains", to go back once again to s. 12B, is a head which relates to tax payable by an assessee in respect of any profit or gain arising from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset effected by the assessee. Mr. Palkhivala has not been able to point out to us as to what property of the shareholders it was that was sold or exchanged or transferred to the general reserves of the company, and the argument of Mr. Palkhivala can only succeed if we hold that it was the income or to be more precise the property of the shareholders themselves which was transferred to the general reserves of the company. The argument has not been taken by learned counsel to that extreme position and rightly. Obviously, there were no profits or gains which could be said to have arisen to the assessee from the sale, exchange or transfer of a capital asset belonging to them to the general reserves of the company.

The attempt, therefore, has been to show that there are words in s. 23A which prohibit the Court from applying the legal fiction with its inevitable corollaries and what is stated is that the key words are "as computed for income tax purposes". These words, it is said, refer not merely to the quantum of the undistributed profits deemed to have been distributed amongst the shareholders, but to the nature and heads of computation mentioned in s. 6 which relates to the heads of income chargeable to income-tax. We have negatived this argument. There is nothing in the language of s. 23A which prohibits or retards the consequences and incidents of the notional income being treated as real for the purpose of taxing the shareholder. By the supposition of law in s. 23A a proportionate undistributed income of the company has for this purpose become the divided income of the assesses. The argument is not cogent when it asks us to impose a supposition about capital gains on that supposition of law. There is no warrant in the language of the relevant provisions to subjoin or tack a fiction upon a fiction.

In the result, both the arguments pressed before us on behalf of the assesses must fail. Our answer to the question will be in the negative.

v.

THE GARKWAR FOAM AND RUBBER COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 15C—Assessee company purchasing assets and goodwill of partnership firm doing business since July 1, 1948—Payment of consideration made by allotting to partners fully paid up shares of assessee company—Whether assessee company can claim benefit of exemption from tax under s. 15C—What is reconstruction of a business—Construction of statute—Provision for exemption in taxing statute whether to be liberally construed.

Under an agreement of sale the assessee company which was registered on July 21, 1949, took over all the assets (namely building, machinery, plant, furniture and tools) of the business of a partnership firm which had started doing business from July 1, 1948, including its goodwill for a consideration. Payment of consideration was made by the assessee company by allotting a certain number of fully paid up shares of the assessee company. Neither the credits and outstandings nor the debts and liabilities of the partnership firm were taken over by the assessee company. For the relevant assessment year the assessee company claimed the benefit of an exemption from tax under s. 15C of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, on the ground that it was a newly established industrial undertaking. The Department contended that this was a case of reconstruction of a business already in existence within s. 15C(2)(i) of the Act and, therefore, the assessee company could not claim exemption under s. 15C:—

Held, that this was not a case of a newly established industrial undertaking formed by reconstruction of a business already in existence and, therefore, the assessee company was entitled to relief from tax under s. 15C of the Act.

The underlying idea of a reconstruction must be of a "business in existence". There must be a continuation of the activities and business of the same industrial undertaking. The undertaking must continue to carry on the same business though in some altered or varied form. If the alterations and changes are substantial, there would be little scope for describing what emerges as a reconstruction of the business. Thus, if the ownership of a business or an undertaking changes hands not ostensibly but in reality and effectively, that would not be reconstruction or if the very nature of the business is changed, that again would not be reconstruction. On the other hand, reorganization of the business on sounder lines or alterations in the N. A. Palkhivala, for the assessee.

S. T. DESAI J. A short but interesting question of construction of s. 15C of the Income-tax Act arises for our determination on this reference, which comes before us at the instance of the Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, under s. 66(1). The facts may be briefly stated. A partnership firm consisting of three partners started doing business of manufacturing shoes from July 1, 1948, in the firm name of "Coral & Co.". There was another concern—The Gaekwar Foam & Rubber Co. which was a limited liability company registered on July 21, 1949. Owing to devaluation of currency, this latter company had difficulties in carrying on its business of foam rubber. It came to the notice of this company, which is the assessee company before us, that the firm of Coral & Co. wanted to sell its business. The assessee company took over all the assets of the business of Coral & Co. including its goodwill for the consideration of Rs. 1,50,000. The payment was not made in cash but was by allotting 1500 shares of the face value of Rs. 100 each to the three partners in the firm of Coral & Co. The nominal capital of the assessee company was Rs. 5,03,000 divided into 5000 ordinary shares of Rs. 100 each and 3000 'B' shares of Rs. 1 each. Neither the credits and outstandings nor the debts and liabilities of Coral & Co. were taken over by the assessee company. We shall refer to the agreement, which is one of sale, little later in our judgment. In respect of the assessment year 1952-53, the assessee company claimed the benefit of and exemption from tax under s. 15C on the ground that it was a newly established industrial undertaking. The Income-tax Officer rejected the assessee's contention. According to him, the assessee company was formed by reconstruction of a business already in existence and, therefore, the assessee company was not entitled to the benefit of s. 15C claimed by it. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner took the contrary view. His conclusion was that this was a case of transfer of building and machinery to a new business, and as the business of the transferor came into existence after April 1, 1948, the assessee was entitled to the exemption claimed by it. The matter was carried in appeal by the Department and the Tribunal took the view that the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was right in the conclusion reached by him. In its order, it stated:

"If we were to accept the contention of the Department, it will only mean that the whole object of the provision made has been frustrated. With a view to help the building up of new industries, it has been provided that industries started after 1-4-1948 will get some special benefits. The Income-tax Officer would have been right in not allowing the exemption if the business taken over by the assessee had been commenced prior to 1-4-1948. The exemption is attached to the business and not to the assessee. It matters little if the business changes hands six times over a period of one year. As long as the industrial undertaking commenced business after 1-4-1948, it will, in our opinion, be entitled to claim the benefit of Section 15C."

The question we are called upon to answer on this reference is:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the assessee company is entitled to relief from tax under Section 15C of the Income-tax Act?"

It has been argued before us by Mr. G. N. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, that the Tribunal was in error in interpreting cl. (i) of sub-s. (2) of s. 15C. The argument briefly stated is that this was a case of an industrial undertaking formed by reconstruction of a business already in existence, and if it was a newly established industrial undertaking, which was formed by reconstruction of a business already in existence, it could not claim the exemption granted by s. 15C. It will be convenient at this stage to set out that part of s. 15C which is material for the purpose of this Reference:

"(2) This section applies to any industrial undertaking which—

(i) is not formed by the splitting up, or the reconstruction of, business already in existence or by the transfer to a new business of building, machinery or plant used in a business which was being carried on before the 1st day of April 1948."

In sub-s. (2) there are two other clauses and there is a proviso to this sub-section. But it is not necessary to set out the same because they have little bearing on the part of s. 15C which we are called upon to interpret in this reference. Clauses (ii) and (iii) relate to certain periods and to the number of workmen employed by the industrial undertaking and the proviso empowers the Central Government by a notification to direct that the exemption cannot be availed of by any particular industrial undertaking.

The argument of Mr. Joshi is that an assessee who wants to avail of the benefit of the exemption must fulfill all the conditions and requirements of the section. That proposition is not disputed. Then, the argument has proceeded that in cl. (i) there are three requirements or conditions. We agree with Mr. Joshi that all the three requirements or conditions specified in cl. (i) of sub-s. (2) must be satisfied before an assessee can claim the benefit of the exemption granted by the section and the argument in effect has been that since this is a case of reconstruction of a business already in existence, the assessee cannot get any relief. It is suggested by Mr. Joshi that the words at the end of cl. (i): "before the 1st day of April, 1948" apply to the third condition or requirement of cl. (i) of sub-s. (2) and not to all the three conditions or requirements specified in that clause. On the other hand, it has been suggested by Mr. Palkhivala that those words apply to all the three requirements or conditions of that clause. It is not necessary for us to decide on this reference whether the words "before the 1st of April 1948" apply to all the three conditions or requirements of cl. (i) of sub-s. (2). We shall, therefore, confine our consideration only to the point, which is directly before us, namely, whether this is a case of reconstruction of a newly established industrial undertaking formed by reconstruction of a business already in existence. If it is not a newly established industrial undertaking formed by reconstruction of a business already in existence, the assessee must succeed because it is not the contention of Mr. Joshi that this is a case of an undertaking formed by splitting up of a business already in existence nor is it the contention of Mr. Joshi that this is a case of an undertaking formed by transfer to a new business of building, machinery or plant used in a business which was being carried on before April 1, 1948. Mr. Joshi has taken us through the various clauses of the agreement between the firm of Coral & Co. the vendors and the assessee. On the face of it, it is an agreement of sale of the assets of building, machinery and plant of an industrial undertaking and also of the stock-in-trade of that firm, as we shall presently point out. The sale includes the goodwill of the vendor firm. What is kept out, however, is the credits and outstandings of the vendor firm and its debts and liabilities. Clause (2) refers to the nominal capital of the transferee company, the assessee. Clause 3(1) speaks of the operation of the sale and purchase as from March 1, 1950. The agreement is dated February 28, 1950. Then, the goodwill of what is described as "the late company" is mentioned. Then, the right to use the premises occupied by the vendors is mentioned. Next is mentioned the plant, machinery, furniture and other tools of the vendors. Consideration is mentioned thereafter as being Rs. 1,50,000 to be paid and satisfied by the allotment to the vendors of 1500 fully paid up ordinary shares of the assessee company of the face value of Rs. 100 each. The price of the plant, machinery etc. is shown as agreed upon at Rs. 1,43,758 and the goodwill at Rs. 6,242. Then there is a reference to the credits and outstandings and the debts and liabilities of the vendor firm, to which we have already made reference. Then there is stipulation about the indemnity given to the purchaser by the vendors against any proceedings, claims and demands in respect of their debts, liabilities, contracts and previous engagements and in respect of tax. As to stock-in-trade, it is mentioned that it was a matter left to the transferee company whether it should take it up or not. Lastly there is a restrictive condition which restrains the vendors from carrying on a competing business within the area of 100 miles of Bombay. On these stipulations and conditions in the agreement of sale, it is argued by counsel for the Revenue that this is clearly a case of reconstruction of a business already in existence. Considerable emphasis has been laid by Mr. Joshi on the expression "business" and we propose to bear in mind the importance we are asked to attach to the business of the vendors. It is said that here the goodwill has been transferred. It is said that although the outstandings and liabilities were not taken up, that made no difference. It is then said that the fact that the stock-in-trade was not taken up at the time of the sale made little difference. The argument has been that what is of importance and consequence is that all the assets of the vendor firm were taken up as a going concern. Now, we do not think we would be justified in reading this agreement as one under which all the assets of the vendor firm were taken up by the assessee company as a going concern. But at the same time it is true that the premises where its business was being carried on and all the plants, machinery, furniture and other tools of the vendor firm were taken up by this agreement described as one of sale. Then it is said that it was the same persons who are carrying on the business of the assessee company. Here we are unable to accept Mr. Joshi's suggestion. We have carefully read the agreement and the statement of the case and there is nothing to suggest that it is the same persons, that is, the vendors who are carrying on the business of the assessee company. No such fact has been found by the Tribunal. The capital of the assessee company, as we have already mentioned, is Rs. 5,03,000 and the consideration was that the vendors were to get only 1500 ordinary shares of the face value of Rs. 100 each allotted to them in payment of consideration. Then it is said that the identity of the vendor firm was completely merged in the assessee company. It cannot be said that this was a case of amalgamation or identity of the vendor firm being merged in the assessee company if it was a transaction of sale. What appears to have happened is that the vendor firm sold its plant, machinery, furniture and tools and ceased to carry on its business. It is the case of a business of a firm ceasing after the sale of its machinery, plant, etc. when it could not possibly carry on business. The goodwill of that firm, as we have already said, was sold to the assessee company.

The argument of counsel for the Revenue is that in view of the stipulations and conditions mentioned in the agreement, this is a case simply of reconstruction of the business of the vendor's firm. Learned counsel stated that a business is reconstituted when it is carried on after the liabilities of the business which made it difficult to carry on are removed, that is, when the burden of debts is removed and it starts with a clean slate. Then it is said that the dictionary meaning of the expression "reconstruction" is "to rebuild or to reconstitute" and says Mr. Joshi, this is a business "which is reconstituted or rebuilt".

The question before us, therefore, is: Is this a case of reconstruction of a business already in existence? Now, it is clear that all the conditions and requirements of sub-cl. (i) of sub-s. (2) must be satisfied before the benefit of the exemption can be claimed by a newly established industrial undertaking. The section does not apply and the exemption cannot be claimed by an assessee if the industrial undertaking is formed by splitting up of its business or by reconstruction of its business or in case of transfer to a new business of building, machinery or plant used in a business which was being carried on before April 1, 1948.

The expression "reconstruction" represents a legal conception. It has been used in statutes relating to company law but even there, as we shall point out, little later in our judgment, no Judge has ever attempted to give a comprehensive definition of that expression. The Income-tax Act does not define the expression. This is just as well since it seems difficult to have a definition which may aptly meet with every particular instance and it seems permissible to enter a caveat against any judicial attempt at a definition exclusive or inclusive of a legal expression which, as has so often been said, has no precise meaning. The expression, though difficult to define, may be described without difficulty.

It is well established that the words which express a legal conception must have attributed to them their legal meaning. Technical words, where we find them, must have their technical sense ascribed to them and not their popular sense—uti loquitor vulgus. The principle is of cogency when the words in question represent legal conceptions. The reconstruction of a business or an industrial undertaking must necessarily involve the concept that the original business or undertaking is not to cease functioning, and its identity is not to be lost or abandoned. The concept essentially rests on changes but the changes must be constructive and not destructive. There must be something positive about the whole matter as opposed to negative. The underlying idea of a reconstruction evidently must be—and this is brought out by the section itself—of a "business already in existence". There must be a continuation of the activities and business of the same industrial undertaking. The undertaking must continue to carry on the same business though in some altered or varied form. If the alterations and changes are substantial, there would be little scope for describing what emerges as a reconstruction of the business. Thus, for instance, if the ownership of a business or an undertaking changes hands not ostensibly but in reality and effectively, that would not be reconstruction or if the very nature of the business is changed, that again would not be reconstruction. On the other hand, reorganization of the business on sounder lines or alterations in the mode or method or scope of the activities of the business or in its personnel or infusion of new blood in the management or control of the business which may even be by some changes in the constitution of persons interested in the undertaking would certainly be no more than reconstruction of the business if it is substantially the same business carried on by substantially the same persons.

Now, support is to be derived for the view we take of the interpretation of the material words of cl. (i) of sub-s. (2) of s. 15C from certain observations of Mr. Justice Buckley, as he then was, in South African Supply and Cold Storage Company, In re: Wild v. Same Company.¹ We may immediately observe that the word "reconstruction" was being considered by the Court in that case in the context of company law and in referring to these observations we are conscious of the fact that the observations are not made in the self-same context, but even so they are general observations which can be of guidance and assistance if taken as no more than stating a broad general principle, and coming from an authority like Lord Wrenbury we think they are entitled to be read with respect. At p. 286 of the report in that case the learned Judge was considering the question of reconstruction "of an undertaking". He observes:

"What does 'reconstruction' mean? To my mind it means this. An undertaking of some definite kind is being carried on, and the conclusion is arrived at that it is not desirable to kill that undertaking, but that it is desirable to preserve it in some form, and to do so, not by selling it to an outsider who shall carry it on—that would be a mere sale—but in some altered form to continue the undertaking in such a manner as that the persons now carrying it on will substantially continue to carry it on. It involves, I think, that substantially the same business shall be carried on and substantially the same persons shall carry it on. But it does not involve that all the assets shall pass to the new company or resuscitated company, or that all the shareholders of the old company shall be shareholders in the new company or resuscitated company. Substantially the business and the persons interested must be the same. Does it make any difference that the new company or resuscitated company does or does not take over the liabilities? I think not. I think it is none the less a reconstruction because from the assets taken over some part is excepted provided that substantially the business is taken, and it is immaterial whether the liabilities are taken over by the new or resuscitated company or are provided for by excepting..."

Later on, the learned Judge observes that "it is not vital that either the whole assets should be taken over or that the liabilities should be taken over. We have to see whether substantially the same persons carry on the same business; and if they do, that, I conceive, is a reconstruction". Now fully appreciating the distinction which counsel for the Revenue has sought to make between the case of a reconstruction of a company and the case of reconstruction of a business, these observations, as we read them, are equally illuminating in the context of reconstruction of a business already in existence in the case of a newly established industrial undertaking. In fact the learned Judge speaks of an undertaking of some definite kind being carried on. The emphasis, it will be noticed, is on two things—when substantially the same business was carried on and substantially the same persons were carrying it on. It is also to be noticed that the learned Judge draws a clear distinction between a reconstruction and a sale of an undertaking. In the case of a sale, there can be no question of reconstruction. Now, in these matters, we have to look at the substance of the transaction and not the form. If looking at the substance of the transaction, it is a sale, then the concept of reconstruction must be ruled out for in such a case there is no scope for speaking about any reconstruction of an existing business. It is not necessary to pursue the question of reconstruction in the context of the company law because in this case we are not concerned with any such question and it is not necessary, therefore, to refer to the observations on the point of the leading text book writers on the subject of company law in England.

Now, there are some other words in this clause to which also we are bound to attach some importance. The clause speaks of a newly established industrial undertaking formed by the reconstruction of its business already in existence. In the forming of this industrial undertaking, those, who owned the original business, must have a large say if they reconstruct it. Speaking broadly it is they who can be said to reconstruct the company in any such case and if it is floating of a new company it is they who can be said to have floated a new company for their business which was already in existence. It would be a misnomer to speak of a buyer of an undertaking reconstructing the vendor's business. He may reconstruct his own business thereafter. But that would be a totally different matter. Can it, therefore, be said on the facts of this case that it was the vendors who have formed a new company by reconstruction of a business which was already in existence? Here is a case of transfer of building, machinery, plant and other implements of a shoe factory. The agreement is both in substance and in form one of out and out sale. The only relation that remained between the vendors and the ~~assess~~ company which thereafter carried on its business in the name of Carona Shoe Co. is that the vendors became some of the shareholders in the assessee company they having been allotted 1500 ordinary shares of the face value of Rs. 100 each. There is little scope for doubt or difficulty in interpreting the relevant part of cl. (i) of sub-s. (2) and it is not necessary for us, therefore, to discuss in any detail the object underlying the clause or the scheme of exemption with which s. 15C deals. The object is to benefit newly established industrial undertakings. The marginal note to which we may turn to see the drift of the section also lends support to the view which we are taking.

There is some difference of judicial opinion about the canon of construction applicable to a provision for exemption in a taxing statute. In *Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Messrs. Chhaganlal & Co.*² my brother Tendolkar and I, although we took different paths, were agreed that a provision relating to exemption must as far as possible be liberally construed and in favour of the assessee, provided in doing so no violence was being done to the language used. But in this case, as we have already mentioned, we find no difficulty in interpreting the relevant provision of the Act. If we had found any difficulty, it would have been necessary for us to bear in mind that salutary canon of construction.

Our answer to the question is in the affirmative.

Explanation 2 to the same prior to the amendment of the section by the Finance Act, 1955, and the question arises in the context of a payment of rupees five lacs made as a gift by the employer, the Maharaja of Bhavnagar, to the assessee who had been his Chief Dewan "in consideration of...having rendered loyal and meritorious services." The section, relevant parts of which we shall presently set out, as is well-established, was couched and also after its amendment in 1955 remains couched, in the broadest possible terms. So stringent and embracing has been the rule that even a purely voluntary payment of the nature of a gift or prize or reward when given by a quondam employer to his employee has been regarded as falling within the very wide reach of the section if the object or consideration which moved the employer in making the payment was of remunerating or recompensating past services. Within its compass, have been all employees, high and low, regardless of nomenclature or designation.

In 1937 the Maharaja of Bhavnagar appointed the assessee Mr. Anantrai Prabhashankar Pattani as the Chief Dewan of his State. Mr. Pattani continued to hold that office till January 1948 when responsible Government was introduced in the State by the Maharaja. At that time Mr. Pattani was drawing a salary of Rs. 2,000 per month and enjoyed certain additional perquisites. On January 22, 1948, the Maharaja passed an order (ॐॐ). By that order the Maharaja fixed a monthly pension for the retiring Chief Dewan at Rs. 2,000. An extract of that order is as follows:—

"During our minority he (i.e. Chief Dewan) looked well after us and during the difficult times of the last World War and thereafter he has rendered valuable services sincerely and conscientiously to us and our State with the result that the prosperity and reputation of the State have been enhanced and the position of the State and its subjects has received increased estimation in India. In appreciation thereof, it is resolved to give him a monthly pension of Rs. 2000/- which is the monthly remuneration being paid to him."

It appears that for about two months thereafter Mr. Pattani continued to look after the management of the Bhavnagar State Bank without any remuneration. On May 31, 1950, the Maharaja directed Messrs. Premchand Roychand & Sons, Bombay, with whom he had an account, to pay to Mr. Pattani by cheque a sum of Rs. five lacs out of the amount lying to the credit of the Maharaja in that account. That payment was made to the assessee on June 12, 1950. Then it appears that towards the close of the year i.e. on December 27, 1950, the Maharaja passed an order (ॐॐ) which is very strongly relied upon by the Revenue in this case. It is as under:—

"In consideration of Shri Anantrai P. Pattani the Ex-Dewan of our Bhavnagar State having rendered loyal and meritorious services Rs. 5,00,000/- (Rs. five lacs) are given to him as gift. Therefore, it is ordered that the said amount should be debited to our Personal Expenses Account."

In course of time, question arose during the assessment proceedings of Mr. Pattani for the assessment year 1951-52 whether this sum of rupees five lacs was a taxable receipt. At the request of the assessee, the Maharaja wrote the following letter to the assessee on March 10, 1953:

"I confirm that in June 1950 I gave you a sum of rupees five lacs (Rs. 5,00,000/-) which was a gift as a token of my affection and regard for you and your family. This amount was paid to you by Premchand Roychand & Sons according to my letter of 31st May 1950 from moneys in my account with them."

The Income-tax Officer concluded that the amount of rupees five lacs received by the assessee was a taxable receipt within the provisions of s. 7(1) read with Explanation 2 as it stood before its amendment by the Finance Act, 1955.

It will be convenient to set out the relevant part of that section at this stage. Section 7(1) ran as follows:—

"7. (1) The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head "Salaries" in respect of any salary or wages, any annuity, pension or gratuity, and any fees, commissions, perquisites or profits in lieu of, or in addition to, any salary or wages, which are due to him from, whether paid or not, or are paid by or on behalf of...any private employer...

Explanation 2.—A payment due to or received by an assessee from an employer or former employer or from a provident or other fund, is to the extent to which it does not consist of contributions by the assessee or interest on such contributions a profit received in lieu of salary for the purpose of this sub-section, unless the payment is made solely as compensation for loss of employment and not by way of remuneration for past services;..."

The Appellate Assistant Commissioner confirmed the order passed by the Income-tax Officer. The matter was carried by the assessee in appeal to the Tribunal and the Tribunal dismissed the appeal. The Tribunal in its order laid stress on the order (३४३) of December 27, 1950. It was not impressed by, and found it difficult to rely on, the contents of the letter dated March 10, 1953, written by the Maharaja to the assessee. The assessee has now come before us on this reference.

The question we are called upon to determine is:

"Whether the sum of Rs. 5 lacs has been properly brought to tax in the hands of the assessee for the assessment year 1951-52."

It is argued by Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the assessee, that the Tribunal was in error when it discarded the contents of the Maharaja's letter dated March 10, 1953. It is not necessary for us to dwell on the matter of this letter at any length. This is what the Tribunal has said in its order about this letter:—

"In due course, the question arose in the course of assessment proceedings relating to the assessment year 1951-52 whether the said sum of Rs. 5 lacs was a taxable receipt. In response to a request made by the assessee to the Maharaja (we were told that it was orally made) he wrote the following letter to the assessee on 10-3-1953:—...."

Then are quoted the contents of that letter which we have already stated. The Tribunal proceeds to state in its order:—

"We have already indicated the circumstances in which that letter came to be written and would merely observe that we find it difficult to bring ourselves to believe in the contents of that letter and would leave the matter at that. We would attach more importance to the contemporaneous document viz. the order dated 27-12-1950. It clearly mentions why the sum of Rs. 5 lacs was being paid to the assessee by the Maharaja."

The Tribunal found it difficult to bring itself to believe in the contents of that letter. We feel bound to bear that in mind and deem it unsafe to attach weight to what the employer's impressions or recollections were after more than two years of the order dated December 27, 1950, which is a formal document and a writing made within a few months of the payment. The Tribunal has described the order as a contemporaneous document.

Then it is argued by Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the assessee, that Explanation 2 to s. 7(1) does not apply to the case of a person who has ceased to be an employee when the payment was made. It is stressed that a payment of the nature before us cannot be regarded as made in lieu of "salaries" within the meaning of these words in sub-s. (1) of s. 7. The argument ran that once full salary is paid, as in this case it has been paid, the Explanation has no application. The argument stands repelled by the language of the sub-section itself and of Explanation 2. The section read with the Explanation plainly covers any payment received by the employee in addition to his stipulated salary, in addition to what was due to him and what he was entitled to claim and any voluntary payment received by him, the object or purpose of which was to remunerate or recompensate him for past services. Compensation for loss of employment stands on a different footing, and we are not concerned here with that aspect of the rule for which the Explanation made an express provision by excluding from its purview any payment made solely as compensation for loss of employment. In our opinion, Explanation 2 even before its amendment did apply to the case of remuneration for past services received by an employee from his quondam employer.

Then the matter was put on a different ground. It was urged that on a proper reading of the writing of December 27, 1950, the dominant intention of the Maharaja was to make a gift pure and simple to the assessee, who had been fully remunerated for loss of service and also for past services by a full and generous pension equal to the amount of his salary which was Rs. 2,000 per month. The argument has been that this payment of rupees five lacs was a personal gift and was nothing different from a voluntary payment given by way of a present or testimonial.

Reference was made by Mr. Kolah to certain decisions to which we shall immediately turn. In the first case cited, Moorhouse (Inspector of Taxes) v. Dooland,¹ the assessee was a cricket professional who had been employed under a contract made in 1949 between himself and the East Lancashire Cricket Club upon the terms that he should be paid a salary and a certain sum for expenses and talent money. It was further provided that "collections shall be made for any meritorious performance by the professional with bat or ball in certain matches" in accordance with the rules for the time being of the Lancashire Cricket League. The assessee played in 25 matches in the cricket season of 1951 and on eleven occasions collections were made on his behalf under the Club's rules and the total sum of £ 48 15 s. was collected. He was assessed in that sum, the Crown claiming that it was subject to tax as being "fees, wages, perquisites or profits" arising from his employment. The Court of Appeal considered the matter at some length and inter alia enunciated a test of liability to tax on a voluntary payment made to an employee by the employer from the standpoint of the person who receives it. One of the considerations laid down by the Court of Appeal, and on which counsel for the assessee has relied upon before us, is:

"If a voluntary payment is made in circumstances which show that it is given by way of present or testimonial on grounds personal to the recipient, the proper conclusion is likely to be that the voluntary payment is not a profit accruing to the recipient by virtue of his office or employment but a gift to him as an individual, paid and received by reason of his personal needs or by reason of his personal qualities."

Applying the principle enunciated in that case, the Court of Appeal held that the proceeds of the collections were by the terms of his contract of employment received by the assessee as part of what he was to get by way of remuneration or reward and that the collections were liable to tax. We are in respectful agreement with the principle laid down in that case.

The next case to which Mr. Kolah has drawn our attention is David Mitchell v. Commr. of Inc. Tax.² In that case the assessee was an accountant by profession and a partner in a firm of chartered accountants. The promoters of a company engaged the services of that firm to assist them in the floatation of the company and the assessee, as a partner in the firm, attended to that work. After the company was floated and after charges for that work were fully paid to the firm for the services rendered by it, one of the promoters "as a token of appreciation for the assistance rendered to him by the assessee in connection with the floatation of the company made an unsolicited gift of 2,500 shares in the company" to the assessee. It was held by the High Court of Calcutta that as the contract of service was with the firm and not with the assessee and the assessee was not an employee of the promoters, the value of the shares could not be assessed under s. 7 as perquisites or profits received by the assessee in lieu of or in addition to salary or wages. It was, however, held on the facts of the case that the payment was not made in appreciation of the personality or character of the assessee, but in appreciation of the professional services rendered by the assessee and in order to give him an extra profit over and above the share of the profit he may get from the firm, and the value of the shares was, therefore, assessable as the assessee's income under s. 10 of the Income-tax Act. One of the contentions in that case was that the receipt was of the nature of a casual and non-recurring receipt. That contention also was dismissed by the Court.

1 (1955) 28 I. T. R. 26.

2 (1946) 30 I. T. R. 701.

Mr. Kolah has also drawn our attention to a decision of the House of Lords: Reed v. Seymour.³ That case also related to the assessment of a professional cricketer, who was granted a benefit match by the committee of a cricket club in the exercise of their absolute discretion. The proceeds of the match, together with certain public subscriptions, were invested in the names of the trustees of the club and the income therefrom was paid to the beneficiary in accordance with the rules of the Club. Subsequently the investments were realised and the proceeds paid over to the beneficiary were applied with the approval of the trustees in purchasing a farm. The assessee cricketer was assessed in respect of the proceeds of the benefit match other than the public subscriptions. The order was discharged by the General Commissioners on appeal and ultimately the matter was carried to the House of Lords. It was held that the award of the proceeds of the benefit match to the cricketer was not a profit accruing to him in respect of his office or employment, but was in the nature of a personal gift and not assessable to income-tax. Now, the case turned mainly on the meaning and effect of the rules of the cricket club. In the speeches of their Lordships are to be found references to the case of *Cooper v. Blakiston*⁴ which has been frequently referred to in tax cases of voluntary payments. The head-note of that case fairly states what was the pith of the decision. It is there set forth that voluntary Easter offerings given as free gifts to the incumbent of a benefice as such for his personal use are, if given for the purpose of increasing his stipend, assessable to income-tax as profit accruing to him by reason of his office. In that case Lord Loreburn observes (p. 355):

"...Had it been a gift of an exceptional kind, such as a testimonial, or a contribution for a specific purpose, as to provide for a holiday, or a subscription peculiarly due to the personal qualities of the particular clergyman, it might not have been a voluntary payment for services, but a mere present."

That principle was acceptable to the majority of the Judges in the House of Lords in the case of Reed v. Seymour relied on by Mr. Kolah.

One more decision to which our attention has been drawn by Mr. Kolah is Beynon v. Thorpe.⁵ That was a case of a pension to a retiring director of a company. It was the company's custom to give retiring employees voluntary pensions or allowances. In 1923 the directors passed a resolution awarding the respondent-assessee during his retirement a pension of £5,000 a year. That resolution was rescinded in 1925 and a final payment of £5,000 was voted to the respondent "not as or because he is a director but as a personal gift". An examination of the decision shows that these express words in the resolution weighed with the Court when it reached the conclusion that it was not a taxable receipt. Mr. Kolah has relied upon the following observations of Rowlatt J. in that case (p. 14):

"Now the question is whether this ceases to be a mere gift because what has led to it is a past employment, an employment which has ceased. It has been made abundantly clear by the Court in Scotland in Duncan's case that this sort of sums received by a person cannot possibly be put as receipts from his office or in respect of his office or employment, and they said in terms of that kind in a case like this that these emoluments cannot be taxed under Schedule E, and I am bound to say I think that goes a very long way to conclude this case. But it is said that nevertheless they are in respect of the employment. Well, it seems to me that is a complete fallacy. It is nothing but a gift moved by the remembrance of past services already efficiently remunerated as services in themselves; it is merely a gift moved by that sort of gratitude or that sort of moral obligation if you please: it is merely a gift of that kind. In this case it happens to be very large; in many cases it is very small, but in all the cases it seems to me, whether it is a large gift like this or whether it is a small gift to a humble servant, they are exactly on the same footing as gifts which are made to a child or gifts which are made to any other person whom the giver thinks he ought to supply with funds for one reason or another; and as the Lord President in Scotland points out it is only a matter of history that the feeling between the parties which has generated the gift arises out of an employment."

Now, these observations have to be read in the light of the facts of the case before the learned Judge. The resolution of the directors in terms stated that the sum was voted to the assessee "not as or because he was a director but as a personal gift". Of course, there had been the relationship of an employer and an employee between the company and the retiring director and the element of remembrance of past services was there, but it is difficult to see how it helps in the case before us where, as we shall presently discuss, there are express and explicit words recording the purpose or object of the voluntary payment which go to negative the contention.

The question of voluntary gifts in tax cases is a well-worn subject. The crux of the matter and the differentia to be applied is: is it a personal gift given on personal grounds other than for services rendered or is it a remuneration? The matter is not to be viewed in segments or by segregating some facets of the transaction from the whole of it. We have to examine the whole order (३२११) of December 27, 1950, of course, in the light of its background. It is a single question to be answered after all the relevant facts have been taken into account and particularly the express intention of the employer when such intention is manifest. The transaction cannot be considered as if it were a series of separate compartments. Now, this is precisely what Mr. Kolah in effect is asking us to do. Counsel lays all the stress possible on the word "gift" and none on the words "in consideration of... having rendered loyal and meritorious services". The matter, after all is said, lies in a narrow compass. The principle is well-defined and the difficulty, when it arises, is not in ascertaining the law, but its application to facts which are at times complex and sometimes vague and inadequate. At times the statement of the case itself is bald and meagre. Such, however, is not the position in the case before us in which the matter of the order (३२११) dated December 27, 1950, does not leave the object of the voluntary payment described as a "gift" to be gathered from implications of language used, or surrounding circumstances or mere inferences. We find no difficulty in applying the law to the facts of this case. We have the explicit and express words of the employer which leave no doubt about the dominant intention of the Maharaja as to the object and purpose of the payment. One case on the subject goes to this length that even where the employer for the purpose of assisting his employee, whom he does in fact remunerate for his services, attempts to relieve his employee from his obligation to pay income-tax by saying "I do not intend it to be a remuneration" the receipt becomes a taxable receipt if on all the facts of the case the voluntary payment was connected with and related to the factum of service or employment.

Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, has naturally relied very strongly on the initial words of the order of December 27, 1950. Counsel stated that there are artificial conceptions evolved by the section and the Explanation. It is also said by Mr. Joshi that this payment to the assessee cannot be regarded as a testimonial even when the matter is examined in the light of all the circumstances attending it. The argument has proceeded that here is a contemporaneous writing to which full effect should be given by the Court. Mr. Kolah in the course of his argument had referred to this order of December 27, 1950, as no more than a mere direction given by the Maharaja to his accountant. The writing does not contain mere directions but is a formal document incorporated in what is described as an Order (३२११). It is also urged that the letter of March 10, 1953, had no significance. We accept Mr. Joshi's submission that that letter must be disregarded.

It is not possible for us to regard this receipt by the assessee as a "windfall" nor is it possible to accept the contention of the assessee that it was a personal gift of the nature of a testimonial. We are unable to equate the case of the assessee in principle with that of the beneficiare cricketer. Here the gift was not made in appreciation of the personality or character of the assessee nor was it symbolical of appreciation of the personal qualities of the assessee. Here a sum of money was given to recompensate or remunerate past services, which were obviously very highly appreciated. It is not as if this voluntary payment was in any manner differentiated by any personal qualities of the assessee. The consideration for the gift was in terms stated to be past services. The appreciation was of loyal and meritorious services. Therefore, even though we would be slow in treating a mere gift by an employer to an employee as if it were remuneration for past services when we do not know what motivated it, on the facts of the case before us, we must reach the conclusion that the case falls within the ambit of the section. We do so not without some reluctance.

There remains for consideration the contention of the assessee that this was a casual and non-recurring receipt and, therefore, not liable to tax. Mr. Kolah rightly stated that if we take the view that the case is hit by s. 7(1) read with Explanation 2, then there is little scope for this contention, and that even a single voluntary payment, if it falls within the ambit of that section, the receipt would be liable to tax and cannot be exempted from tax on the ground that it was merely a casual or non-recurring receipt. Once connection with the employment is established, there is no question of considering the recurring or the casual nature of the receipt. This contention of the assessee must also fail.

Before we part with the matter, we may observe that the case before us has been argued by Mr. Kolah on the footing that the relationship of an employer and employee subsisted between the Maharaja and the assessee. Before the Tribunal the first contention urged by Mr. Tricumdas, who appeared for the assessee, was that the amount of rupees 5 lacs was not received from the former employer inasmuch as the assessee was an employee of the Bhavnagar State and not in the personal private employment of the Maharaja who made the payment of rupees five lacs. The other contention urged by Mr. Tricumdas before the Tribunal was that it was a completely voluntary payment made by the Maharaja out of his private and personal property and was in the nature of a personal gift in token of affection and regard for the assessee and his family. The second contention obviously rested substantially on the letter of March 10, 1953, addressed by the Maharaja to the assessee. In view of the facts including the Order (३११) dated January 22, 1948, in which the Maharaja while granting pension to the assessee stated that the assessee had rendered valuable services sincerely to the Maharaja and to the State it was difficult for Mr. Kolah to argue before us that the assessee could not be regarded as in the employment of the Maharaja. But that is not all. The order dated December 27, 1950, in terms proceeds on the footing that the Maharaja was the employer and the assessee was his employee. We do not think we would be in error in accepting for the purpose of this case the equation or equivalence which the Maharaja established between himself and his State. It is not necessary to draw on one's general knowledge in this case because the writings dated January 22, 1948, and December 27, 1950, do show that the Maharaja regarded himself as the State. Therefore, Mr. Kolah in our judgment very rightly did not seek to rely on that contention. In fairness to Mr. Kolah, we must add that the point has not been conceded by him.

Our answer to the question will be in the affirmative.

BOMBAY CITY.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 10(2)(xv)—Allowances permissible on ground that expenditure laid out for purpose of assessee's business—Principle governing such allowances—Expenditure of nature of compensation for termination of employee's services whether a permissible deduction—Applicability of test of commercial expediency where such deduction claimed—Whether income-tax Department can frame its own standard of commercial prudence where amount of compensation claimed as permissible deduction.

For claiming a deduction under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, what is required is that the expenditure must be germane to the business of the assessee and not something which is de hors the business of the assessee. If it is an expenditure of the nature of compensation for termination of the services of an employee, the closer test would be that of commercial expediency. If the payment is made under the honest belief that the claim by the employee for compensation or damages is justified and the assessee has acted in the matter of the settlement of the claim as an ordinary prudent businessman would act, it would not be for the income-tax department to say that the claim would not have succeeded in its entirety or even partly in a Court of law. In such a case the Department cannot insist on framing its own standard of reasonableness or prudence. It cannot claim the right or discretion to look at the matter subjectively but must examine it objectively. If the Department reaches the conclusion that the payment does not reflect a genuine transaction, it can object to it, or if the payment appears to have been made for a collateral purpose, it may not accept the claim for allowance. So also if the payment is made with an indirect or improper motive or for some consideration attunde the business or out of sheer generosity. The test, in fine, must be of commercial expediency.

S. T. DESAI J. A short but interesting question arises for our determination on this reference under s. 66(2). The assessee Messrs. F. E. Dinshaw Ltd. and three others formed the Cement Agencies Ltd. a company which was appointed the Managing Agents of the Associated Cement Companies Ltd. The Associated Cement Companies Ltd. is a public company and was incorporated in 1936 and in the same year the Cement Agencies Ltd. were appointed its Managing Agents. There were three other principal shareholders along with F. E. Dinshaw Ltd. in the Cement Agencies Ltd. In order to look after the day to day management of the parent company, the four principal shareholders appointed four persons to act as managing directors of Cement Agencies Ltd. These persons were to devote all their time and attention to the business and management of Associated Cement Companies Ltd. The remuneration of these managing directors was, however, not to be paid by Cement Agencies Ltd. but by the four principal shareholders. The assessee company appointed Mr. H. S. Captain as one of the managing directors on its behalf and the remuneration payable to Mr. Captain was recorded in a letter addressed by Mr. F. E. Dinshaw to him on October 29, 1935. The remuneration was payable to him on a percentage basis relative to dividends declared by Cement Agencies Ltd.; but the minimum remuneration was to be Rs. 60,000 per year. That arrangement continued till September 30, 1951. On September 30, 1951, the assessee company terminated the services of Mr. Captain. The arrangement between the four principal shareholders and the Cement Agencies Ltd. operative from October 1, 1951, was that the salary of the four managing directors was to be paid thereafter not by the four principal shareholders but by Cement Agencies Ltd. itself. The salary in case of Mr. Captain was to be Rs. 3,600 per month with certain allowances. Under the agreement recorded in the letter of October 29, 1935, Mr. Captain had in the meantime been getting remuneration varying between Rs. 86,000 and Rs. 1,25,000 every year. Mr. Captain continued to work for the Cement Agencies Ltd. in accordance with the variations in the arrangement already referred to and was remunerated at Rs. 36,000 per year. There was a resolution by the board of directors of Cement Agencies Ltd. recording the fact that the services of Mr. Captain had been taken up by the Cement Agencies Ltd.

The Cement Agencies Ltd. had not declared any dividend before October 1, 1951, in respect of the then current accounting year of the company. That dividend was declared about six months later and a sum of Rs. 1,34,400 was paid to Mr. Captain on account of his salary for the period ending September 30, 1951, till which date he had been in the employment of F. E. Dinshaw Ltd. Over and above that a sum of Rs. 1 lakh was paid by F. E. Dinshaw Ltd. to Mr. Captain. A few days after the resolution passed by Cement Agencies Ltd. of which we have made mention, Mr. Captain wrote to the assessee recording certain facts and claiming a sum of Rs. 3 lacs as compensation for termination of his services. In that letter he stated that he had made a claim for compensation in view of the termination of his employment. In the penultimate para of that letter he stated:

"I further pointed out that my remuneration at present amounted to nearly Rs. 11,000/- a month and it would probably go on increasing every year in the circumstances of the case. I therefore claimed compensation of not less than Rs. 3 lakhs, even allowing for the fact of your having secured me a job with Cement Agencies Ltd.

After discussion at several meetings it has been agreed between you and me that you should pay me the sum of Rs. 1 lakh as compensation for termination of my employment." The assessee acknowledged receipt of that letter on December 28, 1951, and confirmed the agreement relating to payment of Rs. 1 lakh to Mr. Captain as compensation for termination of his employment. Along with that letter was sent to him a cheque for Rs. 1 lakh. This amount of Rs. 1 lakh was claimed by the assessee company as a revenue deduction. In this reference we are not concerned with the payment of Rs. 1,34,400 made by the assessee company to Mr. Captain. The Income-tax Officer disallowed the assessee's claim for this deduction. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner, however, allowed the assessee company a deduction of Rs. 33,600. The view he took of the matter was that in the absence of any specific period of service agreed to between the parties concerned, Mr. Captain was entitled to only a reasonable notice and the damages or compensation payable to him should be the salary that he would have earned during that period of notice. He took the view that three months' notice would be reasonable in the circumstances of the case and fixed the permissible deduction at Rs. 33,600. In appeal both the President and the Accountant Member gave different reasons for the conclusion reached by the Tribunal. The President was of the opinion that Mr. Captain was entitled to a reasonable notice and held that the amount allowed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was reasonable compensation for terminating Mr. Captain's services. The Accountant Member on the other hand took a different view of the matter, and in his opinion the claim for deduction relating to Rs. 1 lakh stood on the same footing as the claim relating to payment of Rs. 1,34,400 as remuneration to Mr. Captain. In his order, he referred to the letter of December 27, 1951, addressed by Mr. Captain to the assessee company and observed:

"Dealing with the second item of Rs. 1 lac the nature of the payment appears to be the same as the first item. The letter dated the 27th December 1951 written by Mr. Captain to the assessee is all a made up affair."

He did not base his decision on that inference of his. He agreed with the President that the amount of Rs. 33,600 allowed as deduction was reasonable. The question we are asked to determine on this reference is:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case the assessee company was entitled to claim as an allowable deduction the whole sum of Rs. 1,00,000/- (Rupees One lac) paid as compensation to H. S. Captain?"

The deduction was claimed by the assessee under s. 10(2)(xv) and the question which the Tribunal had to consider was whether the amount of Rs. 1 lac represented an expenditure laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the business of the assessee. We have very carefully looked into what has been said both by the President and the Accountant Member but we do not find anything there on this point. Both the President and the Accountant Member have approached the matter from the point of view of reasonable period of notice in case of an agreement of wrongful termination of services. There is reference to s. 10(2)(xv) in the order of the Accountant Member, but nothing is said there as to whether in his opinion this was or was not an expenditure laid out wholly or exclusively for the purpose of the assessee's business.

Mr. Joshi has, however, argued before us that that must be taken to be implicit in the order. We shall take it that it is implicit in the order that such was the conclusion of the President and the Accountant Member.

It has been argued before us by Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the assessee, that all the facts show that this amount was paid in the circumstances recorded in the two letters. It is said that the genuineness of the two letters and the transaction recorded there has never been questioned by the Department. It is also said that, although the Accountant Member threw a doubt on the letter of December 27, 1951, in his judgment, there is no finding by the Tribunal that the letter was a made up affair. There is nothing in the statement of the case either which may suggest that the Tribunal looked upon the two letters with any doubt or suspicion. The reasoning of the President proceeds on the footing that the letters recorded the true state of affairs. The only question decided is that the sum of a lac of rupees was excessive compensation paid by the assessee and that compensation commensurate with three months' salary would have been adequate in the circumstances of the case. It is further argued that there is not a single factor in this case which may be said as suggesting or showing that the payment was not laid out wholly or exclusively for the purpose of the business of the assessee company. The argument ran that the assessee was bound to make a compensation for termination of Mr. Captain's services without giving a proper legal notice, and if it made compensation to the discharged employee bona fide and solely as a matter of business expediency, there was no reason why the Department should not have accepted that payment as permissible revenue deduction.

Now, the general principle underlying the subject of allowances of deductions permissible on the ground that the expenditure is laid out wholly or exclusively for the purpose of an assessee's business is firmly established. The prime consideration in case of a claim for any such deduction must be that the expenditure was incurred wholly and exclusively for the purpose of such business. An expenditure can be for the purpose of the business even though it may not be incurred with a view to making profits. In Eastern Investments Ltd. v. The Commr. of Inc.-tax,¹ the Supreme Court laid down that in the absence of fraud, the questions whether the transaction had the effect of diminishing the assessee's taxable income and whether it was necessary for the assessee to enter into that transaction are irrelevant in determining whether expenditure relating to that transaction should be allowed under s. 12(2). The principle on which that decision rested is the same and raises the same considerations as are applicable under the present s. 10(2)(xv). The matter has to be viewed in the light of principles of commercial trading and commercial expediency. What is required is that the expenditure must be germane to the business of the assessee and not something which is de hors the business of the assessee. If it is an expenditure of the nature of compensation for termination of the services of an employee, the closer test would seem to us to be that of commercial expediency. This test was approved of by the Supreme Court in the decision referred to above. If the payment is made under the honest belief that the claim by the employee for compensation or damages is justified and the assessee has acted in the matter of the settlement of the claim as an ordinary prudent businessman would act, it would not be for the Department to say that the claim would not have succeeded in its entirety or even partly in a Court of law. In such a case the Department cannot insist on framing its own standard of reasonableness or prudence. It cannot claim the right or discretion to look at the matter subjectively but must examine it objectively. Of course, if the payment is not made wholly or exclusively for the purpose of the business, very little would remain to be said or done. If the Department reaches the conclusion that the payment does not reflect a genuine transaction, it can certainly object to it, or if the payment appears to have been made for a collateral purpose, it may not accept the claim for allowance. So also if the payment is made with an indirect or improper motive or for some consideration aliunde the business or out of sheer generosity. The test, in fine, must be of commercial expediency. The indisputable starting point in matters of this kind should be an objective approach and there should be no setting up of any subjective standards. The foremost consideration, as we have mentioned, is the one laid down by the Legislature itself and it is that the expenditure must have been wholly and exclusively laid out for the purpose of the business.

Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the assessee, has relied on a decision of the Madras High Court in Newtone Studios Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax.² That case related to payment of remuneration to a member of the staff of the assessee but the principle is the same. Mr. Kolah has particularly relied on the following observations of the Court (p. 385):

"Under our taxing system, it is for the assessee to conduct his business, and in his wisdom or otherwise to fix the remuneration to his staff. The Income-tax Act does not clothe the taxing authority with any power or jurisdiction to determine the reasonableness of the amount so fixed and paid by the assessee. The only test for the deductibility of such remuneration is whether the expenditure has been incurred solely and exclusively for the purpose of the business. If the reality of the payment is challenged or is in dispute different considerations arise; so also in cases where the tax authorities are able to point to some consideration other than the purpose of the business as accounting for any portion of the payment made. In such cases, of course, such portion of the amount claimed, which is either not held to have been paid or is held to have been paid for reasons other than business expediency, could and should be disallowed; but the reason for the disallowance is because either the portion disallowed is not paid, or because the expenditure is not solely and exclusively for the business, and not on the ground that in the opinion of the Income-tax Officer or other taxing authority the remuneration is "unreasonably" high—either because the employee does not, in the authority's opinion, deserve so much, or because the assessee could have secured other employees on more favourable terms."

We are in respectful agreement with the view expressed by the learned Judge, but would prefer to follow a decision of this High Court where also the same principle came up for consideration and in which case there are observations of the learned Chief Justice, which throw light on some further aspects of the matter. They may be said, with respect, to be of the nature of a corollary to the broad general principle enunciated in the judgment of the Madras High Court. Mr. G. N. Joshi, learned counsel for the Department, has relied on those observations in *Jethabhai Hirji & Co. v. Com. I.T.*³ It was there observed (p. 712):

"...Although the payment might have been made and although there might be an agreement in existence, it would be open to the Income-tax Officer to take into consideration various factors which would go to show whether the amount was paid as required by the section. For instance, the Income-tax Officer may take into consideration whether the moneys were paid to a near relation of the employer. He may take into consideration the extent of the business and the particular services rendered by the employee which called for a special remuneration at the hands of his employer. He may take into consideration the quantum of the payment made with a view to decide whether the payment was or was not grossly out of proportion to the work done by the employee. If after taking these factors into consideration he comes to the conclusion that the payment was not made wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the business of the assessee, it would be open to him to either disallow the whole sum or a part of the sum paid. The question whether a particular sum was expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of such business must essentially be a question of fact to be determined by the Income-tax Officer. But it would be open to the assessee to contend, as it has been contended in this case, that the decision arrived at by the Income-tax Officer was based on no evidence at all. If the assessee satisfies the Court that apart from the actual payment and existence of the agreement there were no other factors which were taken into consideration by the Income-tax Officer, then perhaps the Court would say that the Income-tax Officer was not justified in coming to the conclusion that he did."

It was urged by Mr. Joshi that these observations do not wholly accord with what was laid down in the Madras decision. For our part we read these observations as affirming the identical principle and stating matters which would be of the nature of a corollary to the same principle. We read nothing in these observations which can in any manner be said to qualify or modify the broad general principle and as we have already pointed out the broad general principle is as laid down by the Supreme Court in the decision to which we have already made reference. We may also add that there is nothing in these observations to suggest that it is open to the Department in any such case to look at the matter subjectively and not objectively. The reason of the rule is not far to seek. It is not difficult to conceive of cases where the legal liability of the employer may be a debatable question. When faced with a claim for compensation or damages by a servant whose services have been wrongfully terminated, is the employer to view the matter as one of commercial expediency or strictly as a matter of legal rights as may be ultimately decided by the Court? It would surely be open to the employer in such a case to use his own judgment and act as a prudent businessman would act. If he finds that the claim is justified and does not allow any collateral consideration to colour his judgment, it would certainly be open to him to settle the claim for a reasonable amount and it is difficult for us to see how in such a case it should be competent to the Department to set up its own views of the matter and say that the claim of the employee was not legally very sound.

To turn to the arguments of Mr. Joshi. It is said that in a case of this kind, even assuming that there was justification in the claim for compensation by the employee, the quantum of compensation could not reasonably have been fixed at anything higher than three months' remuneration. Mr. Joshi has based his argument on the premise that the employee would in such a case be only entitled to a reasonable notice, and if no notice is given, he would be entitled to claim such damages as would be awarded by a Court of law. We have already discussed the principle of the matter and need not rehearse the same. But we shall proceed to examine Mr. Joshi's argument on the footing that in such a case the consideration would be what was the period of reasonable notice that should have been given by the employer to the employee before terminating his services. Now, this question of reasonable notice has never been one easy for the Court to decide. There is no yardstick applicable to claims of this type which from their very nature and from the nature of different employments must necessarily vary. It would not be proper in a case of this nature to expect the employer to settle the claim in a manner which would meet with the approval of the Department since from the very nature of things it would be impossible for the employer to deal with the claim with plumb-line precision. Difficulty sometimes arises even when the Court has to determine the period of reasonable notice. An instance in point which immediately strikes one is the wellknown case of the Insurance Agent who had built up a business of an insurance company for many years. The decisions of the trial Court and in appeal and the Privy Council illustrate the difficulties that face the Court in some cases where the employment is not of an ordinary nature but involves complex facts. In case of an employee who does clerical work or of a stenographer, the position would not present any difficulty. But there are employments in which various considerations are bound to arise and do arise for the determination of the Court and the present one certainly is one of those cases in which it would not be easy for the Court to determine the precise period of reasonable notice. Managing directorships in large concerns are not very common. Remuneration in different concerns would depend on various factors, which it is not simple to state. This question of reasonable notice was canvassed before us by Mr. Joshi in the reference decided by us immediately before the present reference. That arose out of a claim made by Mr. Captain, the employee. In the course of his argument, Mr. Joshi had there stressed a further aspect of the matter which arose for our determination and submitted that we should take into consideration whether the amount of Rs. 1 lac could be said to be a reasonable amount of damages in the facts and circumstances of the case. In that matter our opinion was in favour of the claim made by the employee who was the assessee. We pointed out in that case that the letter of employment showed that the emolument was payable annually to Mr. Captain and we said in our judgment that if we had to consider the question of reasonable notice it would certainly have been a period of more than six months. We also said in our judgment that we were not prepared to consider the amount of Rs. 1 lac as in any sense an inordinate payment. Therefore, even if we have to view the matter solely from the point of view of the period of reasonable notice, we would reach the conclusion that in case of an employee whose services were of the nature of the managing directorship in this case and whose emoluments varied between Rs. 72,000 and Rs. 1,25,000 per year compensation of Rs. 1 lac would be reasonable. We may mention that a statement showing the emoluments paid to the employee is part of the record and marked as Annexure "B". That statement also shows that the amount of dividend which the Cement Agencies Ltd. received for the year ending December 31, 1952, was Rs. 6,04,800 and had Mr. Captain continued in the employment of F. E. Dinshaw Ltd. his remuneration would have been Rs. 1,68,960.

For the reasons already indicated, our answer to the question will be in the affirmative.

AMARCHAND N. SHROFF.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 24B—Death of partner in firm of attorneys and his son joining partnership—Arrangement between son of deceased partner and continuing partners that realisation of work done prior to death of partner to be divided between previous partners—Sums of moneys realised after death of partner and certain amount paid to estate of deceased partner—Whether such amounts liable to tax under s. 24B in hands of the deceased by his legal heirs and representatives.

One Amarchand N. Shroff, who was a partner in a firm of attorneys, died and his son joined the firm as a partner. An arrangement was arrived at between him and the continuing partners that in respect of the work done prior to the death of his father, the realisation was to be divided between the three previous partners. Certain sums of moneys were realised during the subsequent five years after the death of the aforesaid partner and five amounts were paid to his estate. The Income-tax Department initiated proceedings under s. 34 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, in respect of these realisations as income in the hands of an entity styled as "Shri Amarchand N. Shroff by his legal heirs and representatives" and the status of that entity was given to be that of an individual. On the question whether these realisations were assessable to income-tax in the hands of the assessee "Amarchand N. Shroff by his legal heirs and representatives", the Department contended that the case fell within the ambit of s. 24B of the Act:—

Held, that the receipt of the realisations could not be equated with income but could be regarded as a capital receipt and, therefore, s. 24B was not applicable to the present case.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, for the Commissioner of Income Tax.

S. T. DESAI J. Mr. Amarchand Shroff, who was an attorney of this Court and a partner in the firm of attorneys Messrs. Amarchand and Mangaldas, died on July 7, 1949. There were three partners in the firm, Mr. Amarchand, Mr. Mangaldas and Mr. Hiralal. Mr. Ramesh, son of Mr. Amarchand, joined the firm as a partner on December 1, 1949, and an arrangement was arrived at between him and the continuing partners after the death of Mr. Amarchand. In respect of work done prior to July 7, 1949, the realisation was to be divided between all the three previous partners; in respect of work done between July 8, 1949 and November 30, 1949, it was to be divided between Mr. Mangaldas and Mr. Hiralal and realisation made in respect of work done after December 1, 1949, was to be divided between the two old partners and the new partner Mr. Ramesh. Mr. Amarchand was being taxed on cash basis. Large sums of moneys were realised during the subsequent five years after Mr. Amarchand's death and the amounts paid to his estate were Rs. 37,847, Rs. 43,162, Rs. 34,899, Rs. 13,402 and Rs. 32,523. The Department sought to tax these realisations as income in respect of the work done by Mr. Amarchand prior to his death. These amounts were assessed in the hands of an entity styled as "the heirs and legal representatives of late Mr. Amarchand N. Shroff" and the status of that entity was described to be that of a Hindu undivided family.

The matter was carried to the Tribunal and the two members of the Tribunal took divergent views on certain aspects of the same, but they were agreed that the income in question could not be assessed as income of the assessee i.e. "the heirs and legal representatives of late Mr. Amarchand Shroff". The Judicial Member took the view that it could not by any stretch of imagination be said that the receipts were the income of the heirs assessable as their income and he held that the amounts could not be assessed as income of the assessee-heirs and he concluded in favour of the assessee. The Accountant Member stated in his order that what the Department should have done was that they should have assessed the Hindu undivided family consisting of the two sons of Mr. Amarchand and his widow. He further held that the realisations which went to the share apportionable to Mr. Amarchand in respect of work done during his life-time could not be treated as the income of the Hindu undivided family. His view was that these outstandings would form part of the estate of the deceased as at the time of his death as they were outstandings due to the estate of the deceased. He also expressed the view that the realisations received by the Hindu undivided family were in their hands realisations of capital and not of income. The matter at that time rested with the decision of the Tribunal.

Sometime later the Income-tax Department initiated proceedings under s. 34 in respect of the same income in the hands of an entity styled as "Shri Amarchand N. Shroff by his legal heirs and representatives." The status of that entity was given to be that of an individual and not of an Hindu undivided family. The attitude taken up by the Department, somewhat curious, was that the assessment was being made on the deceased himself, although that was contrary to the recognised principle that there can be no assessment on a dead man, he having gone beyond the jurisdiction of the Department.

The Appellate Assistant Commissioner set aside the assessment which was made by the Income-tax Officer after adopting proceedings under s. 34. He decided the matter on the ground that the notices under s. 34 were invalid. The matter this time also was carried to the Tribunal. Some of the contentions of the assessee were negatived by the Tribunal, but we are not concerned with them. In deciding the matter in favour of the assessee the Tribunal observed that they were unable to understand how any assessment could be made on a dead person. Reliance was placed before the Tribunal on s. 24B. We shall presently set out the relevant part of that section. For the present purpose, it will suffice to observe that s. 24B deals with tax on income of a deceased person payable by his representatives. It has always been taken as firmly established that s. 24B only deals with income which had accrued to or had been received by a person who died, but who had not been assessed and tax had not been recovered in respect of that income. The Tribunal took the view that s. 24B had no application to the matter. As to the proper and correct entity to be taxed, the Tribunal accepted the contention of the assessee, and according to the Tribunal that entity was the Hindu undivided family consisting of the two brothers and their mother. It was observed by the Tribunal that it was the Hindu undivided family who had received the outstandings from the partnership firm of solicitors. The Tribunal also reiterated what had been stated in the earlier appeal that in the hands of the Hindu undivided family the income could not be brought to tax, being of a capital nature.

The matter comes before us on this reference at the instance of the Commissioner and the question that we are called upon to determine is:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the sums of Rs. 37,478/-, Rs. 43,162/-, Rs. 34,899/- Rs. 13,402/- and Rs. 32,523/- were assessable to income tax in the hands of the assessee "Amarchand N. Shroff by his legal heirs and representatives" in the five respective years under reference?"

The matter has been argued before us by Mr. Joshi with his usual fairness. Although Mr. Joshi has not conceded any point, he has very fairly stated that the task of the Revenue would be difficult if the case cannot be brought within the language and ambit of s. 24B. In our judgment, the only contention that can possibly be raised by the Revenue in a case of this nature would be that the case falls within the ambit of s. 24B. Therefore, it will be convenient if we first dispose of the other submission of Mr. Joshi. It is stated that even if the case does not fall under s. 24B the receipts were of the nature of income and that in the hands of the assessee, who are the heirs of the deceased, the character of the receipts would not change. It would be income in their hands. Now, this contention is obviously untenable. If it was not the income of the deceased, it must be the income of the heirs if it is to be liable to be taxed. It is difficult to see how these realisations can be described as the income of the heirs. The nature of these realisations in the hands of the assessee would evidently be part of the estate of the deceased and would be capital receipts.

To turn to the principal contention urged before us by Mr. Joshi. It will be convenient before examining the argument of learned counsel to set out the relevant parts of s. 24B. Sub-sections (1) and (2) of s. 24B run as follows:—

"24B. (1) When a person dies, his executor, administrator or other legal representative shall be liable to pay out of the estate of the deceased person to the extent to which the estate is capable of meeting the charge the tax assessed as payable by such person, or any tax which would have been payable by him under this Act if he had not died.

(2) Where a person dies before the publication of the notice referred to in sub-section (1) of section 22 or before he is served with a notice under sub-section (2) of section 22 or section 34, as the case may be, his executor, administrator or other legal representative shall, on the serving of the notice under sub-section (2) of section 22 or under section 34, as the case may be, comply therewith, and the Income Tax Officer may proceed to assess the total income of the deceased person as if such executor, administrator or other legal representative were the assessee."

It is stated that although sub-s. (1) speaks of the tax assessed as payable and the marginal note speaks of tax of deceased person payable by representative, it is implicit in the word "tax" that it is a tax on the income of the deceased person. So far, we are in agreement with Mr. Joshi. The tax, of course, is income-tax and it can only be on the income of the deceased person. But the difficulty of Mr. Joshi starts immediately one begins to proceed henceforth. The plain meaning of the expression used in sub-s. (1) viz. "tax of deceased person" which we must read as "tax on the income of a deceased person" postulates that the income was the income of the deceased person. Therefore, what cannot be said to be the income of a deceased person is outside the purview of this section, which is the only provision in the Income-tax Act which deals with the income of a person who dies without paying income-tax in respect of the same.

Faced with this difficulty, learned counsel sought to derive support from the words at the end of the section viz. "or any tax which would have been payable by him under this Act if he had not died". Now, these words have to be read in their own context and the context clearly is of the income of a deceased person earned before his death. Therefore, here again the argument has to be thrown back from where it started. But the language of sub-s. (1) is not the only difficulty in the way of Mr. Joshi. Sub-section (2) which deals with the same subject has to be examined in order that the entire section is read in harmony and as one enactment. The words towards the end of that sub-section "the Income-tax Officer may proceed to assess the total income of the deceased person" are clearly and only referable to the income of the deceased person during his life-time. It is that income in the context of which reference is made in sub-s. (2) to the notices under s. 22 and s. 34. There is another aspect also of the language of sub-s. (2) and that is in the words "as if such executor, administrator or other legal representative were the assessee". These words do no more than emphasize the basic concept that the assessee must be a person in existence. The concept of the assessee as a juristic person in income-tax law is of a person in existence though a person may become an assessee by fiction of law. The assessee, where the income of the deceased person is to be taxed, is not his estate, but his executor, administrator or other legal representative of the deceased person as if he himself was the assessee. The income, therefore, which can be assessed is either the income of the deceased assessee before his death or the income of the executor, administrator or other legal representative received by him in that capacity and the latter is to be regarded for all purposes of income-tax law as the assessee. It is suggested by learned counsel that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to allow income of the type before us to escape assessment. But we are not concerned with the supposed intention of the Legislature, which is at times extremely difficult to ascertain and particularly in case of some provisions of the Income-tax Act. We are concerned with what the Legislature has said it meant. Ordinarily, what would have been the income of a deceased person, when received by an executor, administrator or other legal representative would be 'income' in his hands also, for instance, income of dividends, interest on securities, rents and similar categories of income. But there can be and there are categories, for instance realisations of the nature before us, where it would be impossible to equate the receipt with 'income' when clearly it would have to be regarded as a capital receipt. Therefore, on a plain reading of s. 24B, we see nothing in its language which permits of that section being invoked in favour of the Revenue.

We shall now turn to the authorities on the subject which have been cited before us by Mr. Joshi and see if there is anything in these decisions which supports a contrary view. In *Allen and Murray v. Trehearne (Insp. of Taxes)*¹ a sum of money was payable under a service agreement on the final termination of service of the employee and in lieu of a pension a sum was payable. A sum of £10,000 was paid to the executors of the will of the deceased employee who died while holding his office. It was held that the amount was properly chargeable to the executors to the same extent as it would have been chargeable to the deceased if he had been alive. Now, there is one observation in the judgment of Lawrence J. in that case on which counsel has tried to rely and that observation is (p. 175):

"...They might suppose anything and the sub-section only refers to the one supposition—namely, that the deceased had not died—and gives no other guidance."

That concept is present in our s. 24B in express terms. But there is no warrant for reading that observation as suggesting that what could not be the income of the deceased was to be treated as income of the deceased. Moreover, the case turned on the language of the relevant sections of the Finance Act, 1927.

The next decision to which Mr. Joshi has drawn our attention is *In re Sreemati Usharani Roy Choudhurani*². In that case the managing agent of a limited company died on May 12, 1938. At the time of his death a sum of Rs. 18,184 stood to his credit with the company and that was in respect of commission earned by him prior to the date of his death. That sum was paid to his widow and legal representative after his death, and the question arose whether it could be assessed to income-tax under the provisions of s. 24B. It was held that under s. 7 of the Act commission was assessable in the hands of the managing agent at the time of his death as salary due to him and as his widow had received the commission without any deduction of income-tax she was rightly assessed under s. 24B. It will be noticed that that was a case of an amount which had already been due to the deceased. It was not the case of any receipt which was not the income accrued to or received by the deceased person.

Learned counsel has also drawn our attention to the case of *Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay City v. James Anderson*³. In that case there are some observations which relate to s. 24B. The observations relied upon are these (p. 72):

"...It is said that an administrator or an executor is only liable to pay tax which the testator would have been liable to pay, and as these capital assets were not sold by the testator it is suggested that there is no liability upon the executor or the administrator. Now, that contention is obviously untenable. Section 24B casts a liability upon the executor or the administrator to pay tax which the testator would have been liable to pay if he had not done so. But s. 24B does not limit the liability of the administrator or the executor only to the cases referred to in s. 24B. An administrator or an executor is as much an assessee under the Act as any other individual, and if he carries on business or makes profit or receives dividends or makes capital gains, he is as much liable to pay tax as any other individual."

These observations do not carry the case of Mr. Joshi any further.

One more decision cited by Mr. Joshi is In re Kamdar.⁴ In that case nothing turned on s. 24B. Mr. Joshi has relied on certain general observations made in the judgment in that case and which relate to the nature of income. Now, we are in respectful agreement with the observations of Kania J. and Chagla J. as they then were, but the observations have little bearing on the issue before us and it is not necessary for us to discuss in this judgment the general nature and incidents of income in the context of tax law. Another aspect of this matter presented by learned counsel for the Revenue is founded on the concept that receipts after death did not change the character of the income. We have already made reference to this point and it is not necessary for us to discuss the same. We only mention it to note the argument sought to be founded on this concept. In the view we take of the matter, it is not necessary to discuss the question about the Hindu undivided family which was argued before the Tribunal. The whole argument turns principally on the application of s. 24B and the view we take of the matter is in favour of the assessee.

Our answer to the question will be in the negative.

Section 154(3) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, is not mandatory regarding the framing of a by-law by a municipality; it is mandatory only in respect of a presumption to be drawn regarding publication of a notice in case a by-law has been framed. *Decided, June 20, 1958. Civil Revision Application No. 1400 of 1956 (with Civil Revision Applications Nos. 108 and 109 of 1957), against the decision of M. N. Kulkarni, Joint one of the applications, namely, Civil Revision Application No. 1400 of 1956. This application arises out of a judgment and decree passed by the learned Joint Civil Judge, J. D., at Erandol, in Civil Suit No. 42 of 1956. The plaintiff who is the opponent in this application filed this suit for recovering the amount of Rs. 100 from the defendant Municipality of Dharangaon, the present applicant, upon the contention that the municipality had recovered the said amount from him illegally by way of octroi on yarn brought by him within the municipal limits during the period March 25, 1953, to July 21, 1955. The plaintiff contended that the municipality did not conform to the procedure required by law to be followed before the imposition of a tax. His case was that there was no sufficient publication of the rules and notice in the matter of the levy of this tax, and this had resulted in the loss of an opportunity to him to make a representation against the levy of the tax. The municipality resisted the suit and contended that the levy of the tax was according to law, that the necessary procedure was followed before the imposition of the tax and further that the plaintiff's suit was barred by limitation. The learned Judge framed an issue whether the tax levied upon the plaintiff and the recovery thereof made from the plaintiff were legal and valid. The learned Judge framed another issue also, viz., whether the suit was barred by limitation. On the first issue the learned Judge held that the tax was not legally levied and upon the second issue, he came to the conclusion that so far as the amount of Rs. 97-12-3 out of the amount of Rs. 100 was concerned, the suit was not barred by limitation, but that it was barred only in respect of a small amount of Rs. 2 and odd. Consistently with the view which the learned Judge took on the point of the legality of the levy of the tax, he passed a decree directing that the defendant Municipality of Dharangaon do pay to the plaintiff an amount of Rs. 97-12-3 together with future interest thereon at 4 per cent. per annum from the date of the suit till the date of realisation. It is from this decree that the Civil Revision Application No. 1400 of 1956 is filed by the Dharangaon Municipality.

It would be convenient at this stage to set out the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, relating to the levy of a tax. It may be noted that the tax in this case was levied under the provisions of s. 59, sub-s. (1), cl. (b), sub-cl. (iv). Sub-clause (iv) provides that subject to any general or special orders which the State Government may make in this particular behalf, any municipality may impose an octroi on animals or goods, or both, brought within its octroi limits for consumption, use or sale therein. Then there is s. 60. Clause (a) of s. 60 provides that a municipality before imposing a tax shall by a resolution passed at a general meeting select for the purpose one or other of the taxes specified in s. 59 and shall prepare rules for the purposes of cl. (i) of s. 46 prescribing the tax selected. Then, there is cl. (b) of s. 60 which provides that when a resolution as required by cl. (a) has been passed and rules prepared, the municipality shall publish the form of rules with a notice in the form of Schedule A. Then there is cl. (c) of s. 60 which provides for objections to the tax by the inhabitants of the municipal district concerned. It would be convenient to set out the text of cl. (c) which says:

"Any inhabitant of the municipal district objecting to the imposition of the said tax, or to the amount or rate proposed, or to the class or persons or property to be made liable thereto, or to any exemptions proposed, may within one month from the publication of the said notice send his objections in writing to the municipality, and the municipality shall take all such objections into consideration, or shall authorise a committee to consider the same and report thereon, and, unless they decide to abandon the proposed tax in accordance with such objections, shall submit the same with their opinion thereon, and any modifications proposed in accordance therewith, together with the notice and rules aforesaid, in the case of a City Municipality to the State Government and in the case of any other municipality to the Commissioner."

Section 61 says that the State Government or the Commissioner as the case may be may either refuse to sanction the rules submitted or may return them to the municipality for further consideration. This section says that the Government or the Commissioner may sanction the rules either without modification or subject to such modifications as are considered necessary. Section 62 refers to the publication of the rules after the sanction thereof and also to the publication of the notice. Now, on the point of publication, the relevant section is s. 154, sub-s. (3). Sub-section (3) provides:

“Every notice which this Act requires or empowers a municipality to give or to serve either as a public notice, or generally, or by provisions which do not expressly require notice to be given to individuals therein specified, shall be deemed to have been sufficiently given or served if a copy thereof is put up in such conspicuous part of the municipal office during such period and in such other public buildings and places, or is published in such local papers or in such other manner, as the municipality in by-laws in this behalf prescribes.”

While dealing with the point of publication, the learned Judge has observed in the course of his judgment that it is the duty of a municipality to frame a by-law describing the particulars about the publication of notices and that the notices which are published according to a by-law so framed are the only valid publications. He has then pointed out that in this case admittedly the municipality has not framed a by-law as required by sub-s. (3) of s. 154 of the Bombay District Municipal Act. As the defendant municipality has not framed such a by-law, the learned Judge has held that the publication of rules and notices by it has not been in accordance with law. The learned Judge has summed up the position thus:

“If the municipality has not made a valid and effective publication of the rules and the notice according to law, then it has failed to observe a condition precedent to the levying of a tax and hence any tax imposed by the municipality without observing the condition precedent is illegal and invalid and ultra vires its powers.”

It is this view of the learned Judge which is challenged by Mr. Kotval, the learned advocate of the applicant municipality in this revisional application.

It would appear that a similar point arose in The Dharangaon Municipality v. The Purva Khandesh Zilla Audyogik Sahakari Mandal Ltd.,¹ wherein Mr. Justice Dixit took the view that s. 154, sub-s. (3), required a municipality to frame a by-law and that it was not open to the municipality to publish notices in any other way. With great respect, we are unable to agree with the view expressed by Mr. Justice Dixit. If we turn to the language of sub-s. (3) of s. 154, it would appear that the Legislature has not made it incumbent upon a municipality to frame a by-law. All that the Legislature has laid down by enacting the sub-section is that if a presumption regarding publication has to be drawn, certain conditions must be fulfilled, viz., that a by-law must be framed prescribing a certain procedure in the matter of publication. In other words, the framing of a by-law is a condition precedent to the drawing of a presumption. If in a given case no by-law is framed by the municipality in this behalf, no presumption such as is referred to in sub-s. (3) of s. 154 would be permissible; or if a by-law is framed by a municipality but the provisions thereof are not complied with, even then no presumption such as the one which is referred to in sub-s. (3) of s. 154 would be permissible. Sub-section (3) does not say that even if there is other evidence regarding publication, such evidence would not be sufficient, in the absence of a by-law, to justify the conclusion that there was sufficient publication. The language of sub-s. (3) of s. 154 is not mandatory regarding the framing of a by-law. It is mandatory only in respect of a presumption to be drawn in case a by-law has been framed. Upon a careful consideration of the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 154, we are satisfied that the Legislature has not intended to lay down that there can be no publication apart from or irrespective of a by-law which is referred to in the sub-section. The sub-section speaks only of a presumption as I have just said, and it is unnecessary to point out that presumption is not the only kind of proof.

The sub-section does not debar other kinds of proof on the point of publication. In this connection, the important words in the sub-section are: "shall be deemed to have been sufficiently given or served". These words would clearly show that the Legislature did not intend to lay down that the framing of a by-law and compliance with the provisions of the said by-law were the only ways in which sufficient publication could be given to the notice and the rules. It is clear that the Legislature intended that even if no by-law was framed by the municipality, it was still open to the municipality to prove sufficient publication in other ways. When something is deemed to have been done, it means that in fact it may not have been done or is not done. In this connection, we can do no better than refer to a decision of the Privy Council in the case of Income-tax Commissioner, Bombay Presidency v. Bombay Trust Corporation.² Their Lordships observed in that case (p. 55):

"...Now when a person is 'deemed to be' something, the only meaning possible is that whereas he is not in reality that something the Act of Parliament requires him to be treated as if he were. It follows that although the High Court was perfectly right in holding that if s. 42 stood alone 'agent' in that section would mean an agent in actual receipt of the profits or gains which were to be assessed, they failed to appreciate that s. 43 puts the person who comes within its term artificially into the position of the agent and of assessee under s. 42."

It is clear, therefore, that the words "every notice which this Act requires or empowers a Municipality to give or to serve...shall be deemed to have been sufficiently given or served" mean that although in reality there might not have been sufficient publication of the notice, sufficient publication would nevertheless be presumed in case the municipality had framed a by-law and the provisions of the said by-law had been complied with. Now, in this case, there is no dispute that no by-law was framed by the municipality. No question, therefore, arises of compliance with the provisions of the by-law. But Mr. Kotval contends, and for the reasons stated above we are of the view that the contention is right, that merely because no by-law was framed by the municipality, it would not preclude the municipality from proving sufficient publication of the rules and notices in other ways. Now, if we turn to the plaint, we find a clear recital made therein by the plaintiff that no sufficient publication was given to the rules and notices. It is no doubt true that this averment made by the plaintiff in his plaint was denied by the defendant municipality in the written statement. It is to be noted, however, that it is often times difficult to prove a negative. The plaintiff's case being that there was no sufficient publication made by the municipality in respect of the rules and notices in the matter of levy of taxes, all that the plaintiff could do in his plaint was to deny the fact of sufficient publication. The manner in which the alleged publication was made by the municipality was within the special knowledge of the municipality. Therefore, it would not be sufficient in this case for the municipality merely to deny the averment made by the plaintiff regarding absence of sufficient publication. It would be necessary for the municipality to show how the publication was made. The plaintiff, by denying the alleged sufficient publication in the plaint, put the defendant to the proof of publication and it is impossible to accept Mr. Kotval's contention that simply because the municipality denied the plaintiff's averment in its written statement, we should take it that there was sufficient publication. When we are dealing with a fiscal statute which requires a subject to pay certain taxes, it is necessary that the provisions of the law should be strictly construed. It is perfectly clear from the provisions of ss. 60, 61 and 62 that there should be sufficient publication of the notices, so that the persons concerned might have an adequate opportunity to make representations either to the State Government or to the Commissioner protesting against the levy of the taxes. These are important provisions of law and it is necessary that they must be strictly complied with. In those circumstances, we have felt it necessary to remand the case to the Court below with the issue:

"Whether it is proved by the defendant Municipality that there was sufficient publication of the rules and the notices?"

The learned Judge should give opportunity to both the parties to lead such evidence as they may wish to, and upon a consideration of that evidence the learned Judge should give his finding whether there was sufficient publication of the rules, notices, etc. by the defendant municipality. Consistently with the finding which he might record on this point, he should decide whether the levy of the tax from the plaintiff was a lawful levy or not.

The learned advocate Mr. Vaidya appearing for the plaintiff-opponent has invited our attention to cl. (b) of s. 60 which says:

"When such resolution has been passed, the municipality shall publish the form of rules so prepared with a notice in the form of Schedule A prefixed thereto."

If we turn to Sch. A, it speaks of a notice to all inhabitants. From this Mr. Vaidya argues that a notice to all the inhabitants cannot be given unless there is a by-law framed by the municipality and unless the provisions of that by-law are complied with. We have considered this submission of Mr. Vaidya, but we have felt ourselves unable to accept it. If we turn to sub-s. (2) of s. 48, this is what it lays down:

"Every municipality shall, before making any by-law under this section, publish in such manner as shall in their opinion be sufficient, for the information of the persons likely to be affected thereby, a draft of the proposed by-law, together with a notice specifying a date etc., etc."

It is clear that under sub-s. (2) of s. 48 also, information is to be conveyed to all the persons likely to be affected by the by-law concerned and yet the Legislature has left it to the discretion of the municipality to adopt such mode as may appear best and sufficient in their opinion to give information of the by-law to the persons likely to be affected thereby. It is clear, therefore, that for the purpose of sub-s. (3) of s. 154, the framing of a by-law and observing the provisions of the said by-law could not have been intended by the Legislature to be the only way in which all the inhabitants could be given sufficient notice. It is important to bear in mind that sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 154 prescribe the mode of service of the notice. That is not the case with sub-s. (3) of s. 154. Sub-section (3), as I have said above, refers only to a presumption, and presumption is a rule of evidence. The scope, therefore, of sub-s. (3) of s. 154 is entirely different from the scope of sub-ss. (1) and (2). For these reasons, we are unable to accept Mr. Vaidya's contention that unless there is a by-law and unless there is compliance with the provisions of the said by-law, there could be no sufficient publication of the notice.

The second point, which is the point of limitation in this case, in other words the point whether the plaintiff's suit is barred by the provisions of s. 167 of the Act would depend upon whether the levy of the tax was a lawful levy or not. If, upon the evidence led before the learned Judge by the parties, the learned Judge comes to the conclusion that there was no sufficient publication of the rules, notices etc. by the defendant municipality with the result that the plaintiff did not have sufficient opportunity to make a representation against the proposed tax to the State Government or the Commissioner, the municipality could hardly be deemed to have purported to act in pursuance of the provisions of the law. If the municipality did not purport to act in accordance with the provisions of the law, it is obvious that the provisions of s. 167 would not be attracted. The learned Judge, to whom we are remanding the case, would no doubt examine this position and would decide the question of limitation also.

The result is that we set aside the judgment and decree passed by the learned Civil Judge in this case, remand the case to the learned Judge for decision of the issue suggested by us and for disposal according to law. Costs costs in the case.

The Civil Revision Applications Nos. 108 and 109 of 1957 would be governed by this judgment.

Order accordingly.

Bombay Tenancy Act (XXIX of 1939), Secs. 28, 24(2)(3)(4)(5), 2(13)—Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V of 1879), Secs. 212, 211—Order made by Mamlatdar under s. 24(2) or by Collector under s. 24(3)—Whether Government had jurisdiction to revise such orders—Jurisdiction conferred upon Government under s. 28 whether jurisdiction of a revisional character.

Under s. 28 of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939, the Provincial Government had power to revise an order made by the Mamlatdar under s. 24(2) or by the Collector in appeal under s. 24(3) of the Act.

The jurisdiction conferred upon the Government under s. 28 of the Act was jurisdiction of a revisional character and not a mere administrative or executive jurisdiction.

VIAS J. This is an application made under art. 227 of the Constitution of India by three petitioners wherein the petitioners have prayed for the setting aside of an order made by the Government of Bombay on February 5, 1958. By the said order, the Government reversed the order of the Prant Officer dated April 24, 1953. By his order dated April 24, 1953, the Prant Officer held that the application made by the present opponent No. 1 on November 4, 1947, for the restoration to him of the lands from which he was ejected was barred by limitation and he ordered that the said application do stand dismissed. By an order dated February 5, 1958, made by the Government of Bombay, the Government allowed the aforesaid application of opponent No. 1 and directed that the possession of the lands which are the subject-matter of the present application be restored to him. It is from this order of Government dated February 5, 1958, that the present application under art. 227 of the Constitution has been made by the petitioners.

This application raises a point under s. 28 of the Bombay Tenancy Act of 1939 and the point is whether under s. 28 Government had power to revise an order made by the Mamlatdar under s. 24(2), or by the Collector in appeal under s. 24(3), of the Act. This point arises upon the following facts and circumstances:

It would appear that opponent No. 1 Bhavsar Vrajlal Jechand was evicted from the lands comprising 22 survey numbers of village Vataman by opponent No. 3 Thakorsaheb of Sanand on May 20, 1944. The Bombay Tenancy Act of 1939 was applied to this area on April 11, 1946. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 4 of the said Act, opponent No. 1 gave two notices to opponent No. 3, contending that he (opponent No. 1) was wrongfully evicted from the above-mentioned lands and that, therefore, possession of these lands should be restored to him. After giving these notices, opponent No. 1, on November 4, 1947, made an application under s. 24 of the Tenancy Act of 1939 to the Mamlatdar for restoration of possession of the 22 survey numbers to him. By an order made on September 22, 1952, the Mamlatdar held that opponent No. 1 had been wrongfully evicted from 10 out of the 22 survey numbers. It may be noted that amongst those 10 survey numbers, the survey numbers with which we are concerned in this application were not included. In other words, opponent No. 1's application for restoration of possession of the lands with which we are concerned in this application was rejected by the Mamlatdar by his order dated September 22, 1952. It may be necessary to note what are the survey numbers with which we are concerned in this application. Petitioner No. 1's grievance is in respect of S. No. 333 of village Vataman. Petitioner No. 2's grievance is in respect of S. No. 217/1 of the same village and petitioner No. 3's complaint is in the matter of S. No. 335 of the same village. It is the petitioners' case that these lands were held by them under the various mortgages which were effected in their favour by opponent No. 1. To resume the narrative, opponent No. 1 feeling aggrieved by the order made by the Mamlatdar on September 22, 1952, went in appeal against it to the Prant Officer. Opponent No. 3, Thakorsaheb of Sanand, also appealed from the said order of the Mamlatdar, since the Mamlatdar had decided against him in respect of 10 survey numbers out of the 22 survey numbers. By an order made by him on April 24, 1953, the Prant Officer held that opponent No. 1's application dated November 4, 1947, for restoration to him of the lands from which he was ejected by opponent No. 3 was time-barred, and accordingly he dismissed the appeal of opponent No. 1. While dismissing the appeal of opponent No. 1, the Prant Officer allowed the appeal of opponent No. 3. The effect of the Prant Officer's order, therefore, was that the order of restoration of 10 survey numbers, which was made in favour of opponent No. 1 by the Mamlatdar, was reversed. From the aforesaid order of the Prant Officer, opponent No. 1 made an application to the Government of the State of Bombay and the Government, acting under s. 28 of the Tenancy Act of 1939, passed an order on February 5, 1958, allowing the application of opponent No. 1, reversing the order of the Prant Officer and directing that the possession of the three lands, with which we are concerned in this application, be restored to opponent No. 1. It is from this order, as I have mentioned in the earlier part of this judgment, that the petitioners have come to this Court under art. 227 of the Constitution.

Now, the learned advocate Mr. Limaye, appearing for the petitioners, has raised only one point in this application, and the point is an important point. Mr. Limaye contends that Government had no jurisdiction under s. 28 of the Bombay Tenancy Act of 1939 to revise an order made by the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (2), or by the Collector in appeal under sub-s. (3), of s. 24 of the Act. Mr. Limaye says that upon a proper construction of s. 28 of the Tenancy Act of 1939, it would appear that the jurisdiction which the Legislature conferred upon the Government under that section was of an entirely administrative or executive character. Now s. 28 of the Tenancy Act of 1939 provides:—

"Except in cases provided in section 12, in all matters connected with this Act, the Provincial Government shall have and exercise the same authority and control over the Collectors and Mamlatdars as they have and exercise over them in the general and revenue administration."

Mr. Limaye contends that this language of s. 28, which is plain and admits of no ambiguity, clearly shows that the control, which the Legislature intended the Government to exercise over the Collectors and Mamlatdars, was of the same character as the control, which the Government exercises over these officers in matters of general and revenue administration. Mr. Limaye says that the distinction between the judicial administration on the one hand and the general and revenue administration on the other hand is patently clear and, therefore, when s. 28 expressly referred to the exercise by the Provincial Government of the same control and authority over the Collectors and Mamlatdars, which the Government exercises in general and revenue administration, the Legislature intended to lay down that in matters affecting judicial administration the Government shall not interfere with the orders made by the Collectors and Mamlatdars. In support of this contention, Mr. Limaye has referred us to a decision of a division bench of this Court in Batanchand Onkardas Meher v. Hari Jayaram Khadke.¹ In that application also an order made by the Government of Bombay, which was purported to have been made under s. 28 of the Tenancy Act of 1939, was challenged. In that case, the landlord made an application on December 9, 1948, to eject his tenant. While that application, which was made under the Act of 1939, was pending, the Act of 1948 came into force. The Mamlatdar directed the tenant to restore possession of the land to the landlord. From that order of the Mamlatdar the tenant went in appeal to the Collector. The Collector confirmed the order of the Mamlatdar. Thereupon the tenant went in revision before the Revenue Tribunal and the Revenue Tribunal held that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the application and expressed an opinion that the Government of the State was empowered under s. 28 of the Tenancy Act of 1939 to revise the orders of the Courts below. It may be noted that in the present case also the Bombay Revenue Tribunal, by an order passed by them on July 15, 1955, held that they had no jurisdiction under the Act of 1939 to interfere with the order made by the Prant Officer in appeal under sub-s. (3) of s. 24 of the said Act. To revert to the case which was considered in Batanchand Onkardas Meher v. Hari Jayaram Khadke, the tenant feeling aggrieved by the order of the Revenue Tribunal made an application to the Government, requesting the Government to set aside the order of the Mamlatdar, which was confirmed in appeal by the Collector. In that case, the learned Chief Justice delivering the judgment of the Bench observed:—

"...No judicial order can be interfered with administratively or by an executive fiat. The decision of the Collector in appeal was a judicial order and that order can only be corrected judicially. We do not read s. 28 to confer upon the Government a power to correct a decision of the Collector judicially. That section only empowers the Government administratively and the present order of the Government is not in the exercise of their power to control the Collector or the Mamlatdar administratively but is in the exercise of their power to correct the Mamlatdar and the Collector judicially and no such power exists under the old Tenancy Act."

Relying upon these observations, Mr. Limaye for the petitioners contends that in the present case also the Government of the State of Bombay had no power of judicial revision to correct the orders of the Mamlatdar and the Collector, which orders had the character of judicial orders. It may be noted that while deciding Batanchand Onkardas v. Hari Jayaram, the High Court had referred to its earlier decision in Purshottam Nathu Mali v. The State of Bombay.² In that case also the Tribunal had held that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the revisional application and thereafter the Government had passed an order setting aside the appellate order of the Collector. In that case also it was held by the High Court that Government could not by an executive fiat interfere with the judicial decision arrived at by the Tribunal. Mr. Limaye relies upon that decision also, namely, the decision of this Court in Purshottam Nathu Mali v. The State of Bombay.

We have given an anxious thought to the above contention of Mr. Limaye, but we have felt constrained to reject the contention. The important section which falls to be considered and construed, while considering s. 28 of the Act of 1939, is s. 24(4) of the said Act. Now, if we turn to s. 24(4) this is what the sub-section provides:—

² (1951) Special Civil Application No. 274 of 1951, decided by Chagla C. J. and Gajendragadkar J., on December 6, 1951. (Unrep.).

“Subject to the provisions of section 28, every order passed by the Mamlatdar under sub-section (2), unless modified or revised by the Collector on appeal under sub-section (3), and every order passed by the Collector under sub-section (3), shall be final.”

The language of this sub-section is perfectly clear. There is no ambiguity about it. By enacting sub-s. (4) of s. 24 the Legislature expressly made every order of the Mamlatdar made under sub-s. (2) of s. 24 and every appellate order of the Collector made under sub-s. (3) of the same section subject to the power of revision by Government under s. 28 of the Act. It is clear, in our view, that the power which the Legislature conferred upon Government under s. 28 was a power to modify, annul and reverse any order made by the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (2) of s. 24 or any order made by the Collector under sub-s. (3) of s. 24. Unless power of judicial revision was conferred upon the State Government by s. 28 there could possibly arise no question of an order of Government made under s. 28 affecting the finality of the orders of the Mamlatdars and the Collectors passed under sub-ss. (2) and (3) respectively of s. 24. Sub-section (4) of s. 24 expressly speaks of the finality of the orders of the Mamlatdars and the Collectors subject to the provisions of s. 28. The important words in sub-s. (4) are “subject to the provisions of s. 28, every order passed by the Mamlatdar...and every order passed by the Collector... shall be final.” Now, the word ‘final’ is not defined in the Tenancy Act of 1939. Therefore, in order to ascertain what the Legislature meant when they used the word ‘final’ in sub-s. (4) of s. 24, we must turn to the provisions of s. 2(13) of the Tenancy Act of 1939. Section 2(13) provides:—

“Words and expressions used in this Act but not defined shall have the meaning assigned to them in the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879.”

It is clear, therefore, that in order to understand what the Legislature meant when they used the word ‘final’ in s. 24(4), the finality being subject to the provisions of s. 28, we must turn to the provisions of ss. 212 and 211 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. Section 212 provides:—

“Whenever in this Act it is declared that a decision or order shall be final, such expression shall be deemed to mean that no appeal lies from such decision or order.

The State Government alone shall be competent to modify, annul or reverse any such decision or order under the provisions of the last preceding section.”

It is clear, therefore, upon the reading of s. 212 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code and s. 24(4) of the Tenancy Act of 1939 that the orders passed by the Mamlatdars and Collectors under sub-ss. (2) and (3) respectively of s. 24 shall be final subject to the power of Government to modify them, annul them or reverse them. Now, under what circumstances the Government will exercise its power to modify, annul or reverse the orders of the Mamlatdars and Collectors is made clear by s. 211 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. Section 211 provides:—

“The State Government and any revenue officer, not inferior in rank to an Assistant or Deputy Collector or a Superintendent of Survey, in their respective departments, may call for and examine the record of any inquiry or the proceedings of any subordinate revenue officer, for the purpose of satisfying itself or himself, as the case may be, as to the legality or propriety of any decision or order passed, and as to the regularity of the proceedings of such officer.”

There is, therefore, no doubt upon the reading together of ss. 211 and 212 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code that the Legislature has conferred power upon the Government to examine the legality or the propriety or the regularity of the proceedings of any revenue officer not inferior in rank to an Assistant or Deputy Collector. In this particular case, the Government examined the propriety and regularity of the order of the Prant Officer, an officer not below the rank of an Assistant or Deputy Collector. In our view, reading ss. 211 and 212 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code with s. 24(4) and s. 28 of the Tenancy Act, it was competent to Government to do so.

It is true that in Ratanchand Onkardas Meher v. Hari Jayaram Khadke and in Purshottam Nathu Mali v. The State of Bombay the view taken by this Court was that the decision of the Collector in appeal under sub-s. (3) of s. 24 of the Act of 1939 was a judicial order and it could not be interfered with administratively or by an executive fiat by Government under s. 28 of the Act. With very great respect, it may be stated that the provisions of s. 24(4) of the Tenancy Act of 1939 do not appear to have been brought to the notice of the Court in those Special Civil Applications. It is sub-s. (4) of s. 24 which makes the Mamlatdar's orders and the Collector's orders, passed under sub-ss. (2) and (3) respectively of that section, subject to the provisions of s. 28. Sub-section (4) of s. 24 does not confer absolute finality upon those orders. The finality of these orders depends upon what Government might do in the exercise of the power conferred upon them under s. 28. This aspect of the case, with great respect, does not appear to have been brought to the notice of the Court in Ratanchand Onkardas Meher v. Hari Jayaram Khadke and Purshottam Nathu Mali v. The State of Bombay.

At this stage it might be pointed out that in the case of *Parvatibai Utamlal v. Rupa Keshav*³ also it was observed by a Division Bench of this Court (p. 664):—

"...Taking now the provisions of the Bombay Tenancy Act relevant to the question referred to us, the provision in section 28 that 'in all matters connected with the Act, the Provincial Government shall have and exercise the same authority and control over the Collectors and Mamlatdars as they have and exercise over them in the general and revenue administration' clearly indicates, in my opinion, that an order made by the Collector under s. 24 of the said Act is subject to the revisional jurisdiction not of this Court, but of the Provincial Government."

These observations also do not appear to have been brought to the notice of this Court in Ratanchand Onkardas Meher v. Hari Jayaram Khadke and Purshottam Nathu Mali v. The State of Bombay.

Again with great respect, the scheme of the Tenancy Act of 1939 does not appear to have been brought to the notice of the Court in those Special Civil Applications. There are several sections in the Act of 1939 which lead us to the conclusion that the jurisdiction, which was conferred by the Legislature upon the Government under s. 28, was jurisdiction of a revisional character and not a mere administrative or executive jurisdiction. Section 2A(2) provides that where an application under sub-s. (1) of that section has been made and the Mamlatdar refuses to make a declaration which is prayed for and where the Mamlatdar's decision is not set aside by the Collector in appeal under sub-s. (3) of s. 13 or by the Provincial Government under s. 28, the person concerned shall be deemed to be a tenant for the purposes of the Act. When the Legislature enacted s. 2A, it clearly intended that the Mamlatdar's decision under sub-s. (1) of that section could be judicially revised either by the Collector in appeal under s. 13(3) or by the Provincial Government under s. 28. Then again, s. 3A(2) provides that where an application under sub-s. (1) of that section has been made by the person concerned and where the Mamlatdar refuses to make a declaration sought by him and where the Mamlatdar's decision is not set aside by the Collector in appeal under sub-s. (3) of s. 13 or by the Provincial Government under s. 28, the said person shall be deemed to be a protected tenant for the purposes of the Act and his rights as such protected tenant shall be recorded in the Record of Rights. Here again, the language used by the Legislature in sub-s. (2) of s. 3A would show that the decision of a Mamlatdar under sub-s. (1) of that section, which decision has undoubtedly a judicial character about it, could be revised either by the Collector in appeal under s. 13(3) or by the Provincial Government under s. 28. Sub-section (2) of s. 3A deals with an important question of the rights of a protected tenant and it is clear that the Legislature intended by this sub-section that in pursuance of the power conferred by the Legislature upon Government under s. 28 the Government could interfere with the decision of the Mamlatdar even upon such an important point as the point affecting the tenancy rights: Then again, there is sub-s. (4) of s. 13 which provides that the order of the Mamlatdar made under sub-s. (2) of that section shall, subject to an appeal to the Collector under sub-s. (3) of the same section and the provisions of s. 28, be final. The order of the Collector also shall, subject to the provisions of s. 28, be final. It is not disputed, and indeed it cannot be disputed, that the order made by the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (2) of s. 13 and the order made by the Collector under sub-s. (3) of s. 13 possess judicial character and, therefore, when the Legislature provided by sub-s. (4) of s. 13 that these orders could be interfered with by the Government under s. 28, it is clear that the Legislature intended to confer upon the Government powers of judicial revision of the orders of the Mamlatdar and the Collector. It is no doubt true that in Ratanchand Onkardas Meher v. Hari Jayaram Khadke a reference to s. 13(4) of the Act of 1939 was made. But the attention of the Court does not appear to have been invited to the effect of s. 28 upon the subject of the finality of the orders of the Mamlatdar and Collector. The relevant observation which was made by this Court in that case was this:—

"When we turn to the old Tenancy Act, 1939, an appeal was provided by sub-s. (3) of s. 13 to the Collector from a decision of the Mamlatdar and that decision became final under sub-s. (4)."

It is true that sub-s. (4) conferred finality upon the Collector's decision, but the Court's attention does not seem to have been invited to the fact that the said finality was subject to the provisions of s. 28.

Then, again, if we turn to sub-s. (3) of s. 18, the sub-section provides that if within the specified period of three months the tenant gives a written intimation to his landlord that he is willing to purchase the site, the landlord shall apply to the Mamlatdar for the determination of the value of the site. Upon receipt of the said application from the landlord, the Mamlatdar shall give a notice to the tenant and shall hold a formal enquiry for the purpose of determining the value of the site. The sub-section provides that the determination so made by the Mamlatdar of the amount of the value of the site shall be final, subject to the provisions of s. 28. Then, there is sub-s. (4) of s. 18 and this sub-section provides that if the tenant fails to intimate his willingness to purchase the site within the specified time to his landlord or if he fails to deposit the amount of the value of the site as determined by the Mamlatdar, the tenant shall be deemed to have relinquished his right of first option to purchase the site and the landlord shall, in that event, be entitled to evict the tenant on payment of such compensation for the value of the structure of such dwelling house as may be determined by the Mamlatdar after holding an enquiry in the manner provided in sub-s. (3). Once, again, the Legislature provided by enacting sub-s. (4) of s. 18, that the decision of the Mamlatdar as regards the amount of compensation payable by the landlord under sub-s. (3) shall be final, subject to the provisions of s. 28. It is, therefore, clear that the Legislature, while enacting sub-ss. (3) and (4) of s. 18, conferred upon the Government a power of judicial revision under s. 28 over the orders made by the Mamlatdar under sub-ss. (3) and (4) of s. 18. Then there is sub-s. (3) of s. 19, which provides that the order made by the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (1) of s. 19 shall be final subject to an appeal to the Collector under sub-s. (2) of that section and also subject to the provisions of s. 28. Now, sub-s. (1) of s. 19 provides that if a protected tenant or any other tenant has planted trees on the land, he shall be entitled to the produce and the wood of those trees during the continuance of his tenancy and shall on the termination of such tenancy be entitled to such compensation for those trees as may be determined by the Mamlatdar after holding an enquiry. Sub-section (3) of s. 19 says that the order made by the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (1) shall, subject to an appeal to the Collector under sub-s. (2) and the provisions of s. 28, be final. Then there is sub-s. (4) of s. 19, which provides that the order of the Collector made under sub-s. (2) of s. 19, namely, the appellate order, shall, subject to the provisions of s. 28, be also final. All these provisions which are enacted by the Legislature in the Act of 1939 furnish clear evidence that the intention of the Legislature was to confer powers of judicial revision upon the Government under s. 28, pursuant to which the Government could modify, annul or reverse an order made by the Mamlatdar initially or by the Collector in appeal.

Even upon the assumption that the powers conferred upon the Government under s. 28 are merely administrative or executive powers and not powers of judicial revision of the orders of the Mamlatdars and the Collectors, even so the Legislature in terms has made the Mamlatdars' orders and the Collectors' orders subject to the power of revision conferred upon the Government to modify those orders, annul them or reverse them. The word 'final' which occurs in sub-s. (4) of s. 24 has the same meaning as is assigned to the word 'final' in the Land Revenue Code, as this word is not defined in the Tenancy Act itself. There is no doubt that under the provisions of the Land Revenue Code the State Government has power to examine the legality or the propriety or the regularity of the proceedings held by an officer subordinate to the Government and in the exercise of that power the Government has jurisdiction to modify, annul or reverse the orders made by its subordinate officers. Therefore, there is no doubt that by enacting s. 28 of the Tenancy Act of 1939, the Legislature conferred powers upon Government, pursuant to which powers the Government could revise the orders made by the Mamlatdars and the Collectors under sub-ss. (2) and (3) respectively of s. 24.

The learned advocate, Mr. Limaye, appearing for the petitioners has invited our attention to the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 24. This sub-section says:—

"Every order passed by the Mamlatdar under sub-section (2) and every order passed by the Collector under sub-section (3) shall be deemed to be a decree of a civil Court and shall be executable as such."

Mr. Limaye says that the order passed by the Prant Officer under sub-s. (3) of s. 24 having the effect of a decree, it would not be competent to Government under s. 28 to modify or set aside that order. We are unable to accept this contention of Mr. Limaye. All that sub-s. (5) of s. 24 does is to create a legal fiction for the purpose of execution of an order made by the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (2) of s. 24 or by the Collector under sub-s. (3) of s. 24. The legal fiction created is that for the purpose of execution, and for no other purpose, the order made by the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (2) and the order made by the Collector under sub-s. (3) of s. 24 shall be treated as though such orders were decrees of a civil Court. In any view of the matter, the language of sub-s. (4) of s. 24, which is absolutely clear, leaves no doubt that the Mamlatdar's order under sub-s. (2), and the Collector's order in appeal under sub-s. (3), of s. 24 are given finality, subject to the power of Government to revise them under s. 28. That being so, we see no substance in the contention of Mr. Limaye that because the Mamlatdar's order and the Prant Officer's order are to be treated as decrees for the purpose of execution, Government would have no power to set them aside or modify them under s. 28.

It may be noted that in this case no challenge on merits is made by the petitioners to the order made by the Prant Officer. So far as the point of law is concerned, for the reasons stated above, we are unable to accept Mr. Limaye's contention.

The result, therefore, is that the application fails and is rejected. We make no order as to costs.

Application rejected.

Before Mr. Justice Vyas and Mr. Justice Tamba.

HASANBHAI ADAMBHAI MALVAT v. ADAMBHAI MALKA TALAT.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 31A(b), 31B(1), 34(1) and (5)—Land cultivated by landlord less than ceiling area prescribed under Act—Whether landlord to make up his ceiling area, can recover possession of more than half area of land leased to his tenant—Applicability of s. 31B(1) where landlord bases his claim under s. 34(1).

Section 31B(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, is an independent provision which stands by itself and controls s. 31A(b) of the Act; it is not subject to the provisions of s. 31A(b). Therefore, if the land cultivated by the landlord personally is less than the ceiling area prescribed for that land under the Act, the landlord cannot, in order to make up his ceiling area, recover possession of more than half the area of the land leased out to his tenant.

Section 31 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, has nothing to do with a case where a landlord claims to recover possession of his land from the tenant upon the ground that the tenant has got in his possession lands in excess of the ceiling area. Therefore, where a landlord bases his claim upon the ground stated in s. 34(1) of the Act, the provisions of s. 31B(1) will not apply.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. M. Limaye, for the petitioner.

M. Omar and B. G. Pradhan, for opponent No. 1.

VYAS J. This is an application under art. 227 of the Constitution of India and it raises a question of construction of s. 31A(b), s. 31B(1) and s. 34(1) and (5) of the Tenancy Act. The petitioner Hasanbhai Adambhai Malvat has prayed for the setting aside of an order made by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal on March 25, 1958, by which order the Tribunal confirmed an order made by the Assistant Collector on December 9, 1957. By the aforesaid order dated December 9, 1957, the Assistant Collector dismissed the appeal of the present petitioner from an order made by the Tenancy Mahalkari on August 5, 1957. The circumstances which have given rise to this application may now be briefly stated.

The petitioner is the landlord. He is the owner of S. No. 2038 of Dhanduka, District Ahmedabad. The land comprising S. No. 2038 admeasures 40 acres. Out of this land, the petitioner himself is personally cultivating 20 acres and the remaining 20 acres of land has been leased out by the petitioner to opponent No. 1. The petitioner contends that he is not holding any other land except the above land. Now, under the provisions of s. 5(1)(a) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, the ceiling area of Jirayat land is 48 acres. The petitioner says that as he is personally cultivating only 20 acres of land, he is in possession of land which is less than the ceiling area. The petitioner also says that opponent No. 1 is in possession of not only 20 acres of land leased out to him by the petitioner, but he is also in possession of other lands which have been leased out to him by other landlords. It is the petitioner's case that opponent No. 1 is cultivating 64 acres and 27 gunthas of land and, therefore, he is in possession of land in excess of the ceiling area. I have already mentioned above that the ceiling area of Jirayat land is 48 acres. The petitioner-landlord, in the above-mentioned circumstances, filed Tenancy Suit No. 3 of 1957 in the Court of the Tenancy Mahalkari, Dhanduka, to recover possession of 20 acres of his land from opponent No. 1 upon the ground that he required it bona fide for personal cultivation and also upon the ground that the tenant was in possession of 64 acres and 27 gunthas of land which was in excess of the ceiling area. So far as the petitioner's case that he required 20 acres of his land from opponent No. 1 bona fide for personal cultivation is concerned, his contention is that his income from the 20 acres of land of which he is in possession and which he is personally cultivating is about Rs. 1,400 to Rs. 1,600 per year. His case is that the probable income of the other 20 acres of his land which is in possession of opponent No. 1 is about Rs. 2,000 to Rs. 2,500 per year. So far as the petitioner's requirement of the 20 acres of his land which is in possession of opponent No. 1 upon the ground of bona fide need for personal cultivation is concerned, he contends that he is entitled to recover possession of all the 20 acres of his land which is being cultivated by opponent No. 1. He next says that the income of the said 20 acres of land, which is being cultivated by opponent No. 1, being the principal source of income for his maintenance, he is entitled to recover possession of all the 20 acres of land from opponent No. 1.

In the Tenancy Case No. 3 of 1957 filed by the petitioner the Mahalkari held by an order made by him on August 5, 1957, that so far as the petitioner's case of bona fide requirement of the land for personal cultivation was concerned, he was entitled to recover possession, not of all the 20 acres of his land which was being cultivated by opponent No. 1, but only half of the said 20 acres, namely, only 10 acres of that land. The Mahalkari next held that the income from the said 10 acres of land, to the possession of which the petitioner-landlord would be entitled, was only about Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 1,200 per year. That being so, said the Mahalkari, that income was not the principal source of the petitioner's income for his maintenance. Consistently with this view of the matter which the Mahalkari took, he rejected the petitioner's application No. 3 of 1957 for recovering possession of the lands leased out by him to opponent No. 1. It may be noted that although the petitioner's application for recovering possession of the land from opponent No. 1 was based upon two grounds: (1) that he bona fide required possession of this land for personal cultivation, and (2) that the total land in possession of the tenant was in excess of the ceiling area, the Mahalkari decided the application, having regard to the first ground only and did not deal with the second ground at all. In other words, the Mahalkari did not go into the question whether the petitioner was entitled to recover possession of the 20 acres of land from his tenant upon the ground that the tenant had got in his possession 64 acres and 27 gunthas, which was more than the ceiling area.

From the aforesaid order of the Mahalkari made by him on August 5, 1957, the petitioner-landlord went in appeal to the Assistant Collector, Dholka Prant. By an order dated December 9, 1957, the Assistant Collector dismissed the appeal. He accepted the finding of the Mahalkari that so far as the petitioner's case of bona fide requirement of this land for personal cultivation was concerned, he was entitled only to recover possession of 10 out of the 20 acres, provided the income from the said 10 acres was the landlord's principal source of income for his maintenance. The Assistant Collector further accepted the finding of the Mahalkari that the income from the 10 out of the 20 acres of land which was in possession of the tenant would not be the landlord's principal source of income for his maintenance. So far as the landlord's case under s. 34 of the Act was concerned, namely, the case that he was entitled to recover possession of 20 acres of his land from the tenant upon the ground that the tenant had got in his possession in all 64 acres and 27 gunthas, i.e., more than the ceiling area, the Assistant Collector took the view that it was irrelevant to go into that aspect of the case. According to the Assistant Collector, it did not matter whether the tenant was in possession of land less than the ceiling area or more than the ceiling area. The Assistant Collector took the view that even if the tenant had got in his possession land much more than the ceiling area, even so the landlord would be entitled to recover possession of only half the lands leased out by him to the tenant. In other words, the view which the Assistant Collector took was that s. 31B(1) governed s. 31A(b) and s. 34(1) of the Act. Consistently with this view of the matter which the Assistant Collector took, he dismissed the landlord's appeal and confirmed the Mahalkari's order. Upon the landlord going in revision before the Revenue Tribunal, the Tribunal, on March 25, 1958, rejected the revisional application. The Tribunal accepted the view of the Assistant Collector that s. 31B(1) controlled s. 31A(b). In other words, the Tribunal also took the view that even if the land cultivated by the landlord personally was less than the ceiling area, the landlord would, in no case, where he claimed to recover possession of the land from the tenant upon the ground of bona fide requirement of the land for personal cultivation, be entitled to recover possession of more than half the area of the land leased out to the tenant. Although the Tribunal concurred with the view of the Assistant Collector that s. 31B(1) controlled s. 31A(b), it disagreed with the view of the Assistant Collector that s. 31B(1) also controlled s. 34, sub-ss. (1) and (5). The view which the Tribunal took was that the right to recover possession of the land leased out to the tenant which the landlord has under s. 34 of the Act is quite independent of the right which he has in a case in which the claim to recover possession is made upon the ground of bona fide requirement of the land for personal cultivation. As the matter had not been investigated by the Mahalkari in the light of the remedy available to the landlord under s. 34, sub-ss. (1) and (5), the Tribunal ordered the case to be remanded back to the Mahalkari. The pertinent observations of the Tribunal in this context are:

"We have, therefore, to say that unless the first question of fact is settled (the Tribunal was referring to the question whether in point of fact the tenant was in possession of land in excess of the ceiling area) it would not be proper to settle the question which arises about the interpretation and effect of sub-s. (5) of s. 34. We are, therefore, constrained to remand the case back to the Tenancy Court to consider the question whether the applicant proved that the tenant held lands in excess of the ceiling area and then to consider the question whether the applicant landlord got an absolute right by virtue of s. 34."

In other words, the case was remanded to the Tenancy Court for deciding the question of fact whether the tenant was in possession of lands in excess of the ceiling area and then to dispose of the case in accordance with law. It is from this order of the Tribunal dated March 25, 1958, that the landlord has come to this Court under art. 227 of the Constitution.

Now, the point which Mr. Limaye for the petitioner-landlord has raised before us is whether s. 31B(1) of the Tenancy Act controls or is subject to s. 31A(b) of the Act. Mr. Limaye says that when a landlord claims to recover possession of his land leased out to the tenant upon the ground that he bona fide requires the land for personal cultivation, if he proves that the land cultivated by him personally is less than the ceiling area, he shall be entitled to recover possession of so much of his land leased to the tenant as will be sufficient to enlarge the area in his possession to the extent of a ceiling area. In other words, Mr. Limaye's contention is that the provisions of s. 31A(b) control the provisions of s. 31B(1). We have considered Mr. Limaye's contention, but are unable to accept it. In our view, the position which Mr. Limaye is contending for is opposed to the language of s. 31B(1) which is clear and admits of no equivocation. Section 31B(1) deals with the right, which a landlord has under the Act, to recover possession of his land leased out to the tenant in a case where he bases the claim to recover possession upon the ground of his bona fide requirement of the said land for personal cultivation. If we turn to s. 29(2), the sub-section provides:

"No landlord shall obtain possession of any land or dwelling house held by a tenant except under an order of the Mamlatdar. For obtaining such order he shall make an application in the prescribed form and within a period of two years from the date on which the right to obtain possession of the land or dwelling house, as the case may be, is deemed to have accrued to him."

Then there is sub-s. (3) of s. 29, which provides:

"On receipt of application under sub-section (1) or (2) the Mamlatdar shall, after holding an inquiry, pass such order thereon as he deems fit."

At the foot of sub-s. (3) there is a proviso and the proviso says:

"Provided that where an application under sub-section (2) is made by a landlord in pursuance of the right conferred on him under section 31, the Mamlatdar shall first decide, as preliminary issues, whether the conditions specified in clauses (c) and (d) of section 31A and sub-sections (2) and (3) of section 31B are satisfied. If the Mamlatdar finds that any of the said conditions is not satisfied, he shall reject the application forthwith."

It is, therefore, clear that where a landlord claims to recover possession of the land leased by him to the tenant upon the ground of bona fide requirement of the said land for cultivating it personally, the statute has conferred a right upon him under sub-s. (2) of s. 29 to make an application to the Mamlatdar to recover possession of the land, and if he does make such an application, then a question arises under cls. (c) and (d) of s. 31A for consideration whether the income by the cultivation of the land, of which the landlord is entitled to take possession, would be the principal source of income for his maintenance and whether the land leased out stands in the Record of Rights or any public record or similar revenue record on January 1, 1952, and thereafter during the period between the said date and the appointed day in the name of the landlord himself, or in the name of his ancestors, or if the landlord is a member of a joint family, in the name of a member of such family. Section 31B(1) clearly provides that in no case where a tenancy is terminated upon the ground that a landlord claiming to recover possession of his land requires the possession of his land back from his tenant for bona fide personal cultivation, shall the landlord be entitled to recover more than half the area of the land leased out to the tenant. In our view, s. 31B(1) is an independent provision which stands by itself and controls s. 31A(b). It is not subject to the provisions of s. 31A(b). The Courts below were, therefore, right in holding that the petitioner-landlord, in so far as he claimed to recover possession of the land leased out by him to the tenant on the ground of bona fide requirement of the land for personal cultivation, was not entitled to obtain possession of anything more than 10 acres out of the 20 acres of land leased out by him to his tenant, opponent No. 1. Under cl. (c) of s. 31A, the right of a landlord to terminate the tenancy on the ground of cultivating the land personally under s. 31 is subject to a condition that the income by the cultivation of the land, of which the landlord is entitled to take possession, is the principal source of income for his maintenance. Therefore, in this case it became necessary to determine whether the income from 10 out of the 20 acres of land leased out by the petitioner to opponent No. 1, of which the petitioner would be entitled to take possession under sub-s. (1) of s. 31B, was the principal source of the landlord's income for his maintenance. On this point the finding of the Courts below is that the income from the 10 acres of land, which the landlord is entitled to recover back from his tenant, is not the principal source of his income for his maintenance. The finding is that the income from the aforesaid 10 acres of land is below Rs. 1,400 per year, whereas the income from the 20 acres of land which are now in the possession of the landlord is Rs. 1,400 to Rs. 1,600 per year. In view of this finding of fact the Courts below were right in coming to the conclusion that the landlord would not be entitled to recover possession of 10 out of 20 acres of land leased out by him to his tenant upon the ground that he bona fide required that land for personal cultivation.

The next point which arises in this case is whether the provisions of s. 34, sub-ss. (1) and (5), of the Act are subject to the provisions of s. 31B(1). In this connection, the Tribunal was right in holding that the remedy which a landlord has to recover possession of his land under sub-ss. (1) and (5) of s. 34 is a remedy independent of the remedy which he has if he wishes to terminate the tenancy of his tenant upon the ground that he requires the possession of the land for bona fide personal cultivation. The opening words of s. 31B, namely, the words "In no case" are to be read with the words "a tenancy shall be terminated under s. 31" and there is no doubt that the question of termination of tenancy under s. 31 would only arise where a landlord requires possession of his land for bona fide personal cultivation or for any non-agricultural purpose. Section 31 has nothing to do with a case where a landlord claims to recover possession of his land from the tenant upon the ground that the tenant has got in his possession lands in excess of the ceiling area. Therefore, where a landlord bases his claim upon the ground stated in sub-s. (1) of s. 34, the provisions of s. 31B(1) would have no application. Now, if we turn to the application made by the landlord in this case it would appear that he made his claim to recover possession of the land from his tenant on two grounds, one under sub-s. (1) of s. 31 and the next under sub-s. (1) of s. 34. The landlord stated in that application that he wanted the possession of his land, because he bona fide required it for personal cultivation and he also mentioned in terms that he wanted the land back from his tenant, because the tenant had got in his possession land in excess of the ceiling area. When a landlord claims to recover possession of his land from his tenant under sub-s. (1) of s. 34, the question whether the income of the land, whose possession is required by the landlord, is or is not the principal source of income for his maintenance does not arise, and the only question of fact which would fall to be determined in that case would be whether the tenant was in possession of land in excess of the ceiling area. That being so, the Tribunal was right, in our view, in remanding the case to the Tenancy Court for recording a finding upon the point covered by sub-s. (1) of s. 34 of the Act. After the Mahalkari records his finding, if any party has a grievance against it, the remedy of such party is to go by way of an appeal to the Prant Officer against that finding; and if against the finding of the Prant Officer any party has got a grievance, the remedy of the said party is to approach the Revenue Tribunal by way of revision. If by the order of the Tribunal any party feels aggrieved, the remedy open to him would be a remedy under art. 227 of the Constitution. At the present moment, we do not know what the Mahalkari's finding on the question covered by sub-s. (1) of s. 34 would be and we do not know what attitude the aggrieved party would adopt in respect of that finding. When the landlord's claim under sub-s. (5) of s. 34 is finally decided, it would be open to the aggrieved party concerned to make a fresh application to this Court under art. 227 of the Constitution.

In the result, we reject this application with costs.

Application dismissed.

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 5(1), 4, 29, 34, 40, 30, 3—Bombay Tenancy Act (Bom. XXIX of 1939), Sec. 23(1)(a) and (b)—Rights conferred on tenant under s. 5 as it stood before amending Act of 1956—Contractual tenancy for a period less than ten years whether under s. 5(1) extended to contractual tenancy of ten years—Tenancy rights of statutory tenant whether heritable—Applicability of s. 29 where person in possession a trespasser.

Section 5(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948 (as it stood before the amending Act XIII of 1956 came into force) prohibited tenancies of a period less than ten years and created a statutory tenancy whose period could not be less than ten years. The section did not create an artificial fiction extending the contractual character of the tenancy from a period of less than ten years to a period of ten years.

The tenancy rights of a statutory tenant under s. 5(1) of the Act are not heritable rights.

N. R. Oza, for respondent No. 1.

VYAS J. This application which is made under art. 227 of the Constitution of India by the petitioners raises questions under s. 5 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, as it stood before the amending Act XIII of 1956 came into force on August 1, 1956. What are the rights conferred on a tenant under s. 5? Is he a statutory tenant or a contractual tenant? Are these rights (tenancy rights under s. 5) heritable? These are the questions which fall to be determined in this application and they arise in the following circumstances.

The petitioners are the landlords of S. Nos. 108/3 and 193/3 situated at village Katargam, district Surat. Respondent No. 1, Bai Dhani, is the daughter of one Hari Lala. Hari Lala came on these lands as a tenant in the year 1954-55. It was a one year's lease under which he came into occupation of the lands. Hari Lala died on September 14, 1955. Thereafter, the present petitioners made an application, being Tenancy Application No. 439 of 1955, under s. 29 of the Act for obtaining possession of the lands from Bai Dhani. The Mamlatdar who heard the application came to the conclusion that Bai Dhani was a trespasser and he awarded possession of these lands to the present petitioners. On an appeal being made by Bai Dhani to the Prant Officer, the Prant Officer by an order made by him on April 15, 1956, held that the Mamlatdar had no jurisdiction to hear and decide the application No. 439 of 1955 which was made by the present petitioners, as the proper remedy which the petitioners ought to have pursued was a remedy not under s. 29 of the Act, but under s. 84 of the Act. Consistently with this view of the matter which the Prant Officer took, he reversed the order of the Mamlatdar. Thereafter, on May 5, 1956, these petitioners made an application under s. 84 of the Act before the Assistant Collector, Surat. By an order made by her on June 8, 1956, the Assistant Collector held that Bai Dhani was a trespasser and she also awarded possession of these lands to the petitioners. From the order of the Assistant Collector, Bai Dhani went in revision before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. The Revenue Tribunal by an order dated September 5, 1956, remanded the case to the Assistant Collector with a direction that the terms of tenancy of Hari Lala should be determined and further that it should be decided what rights did Hari Lala possess as a tenant and whether Bai Dhani, as the daughter of Hari Lala, was entitled to inherit the rights which Hari Lala had as a tenant. On remand the Assistant Collector by an order made by her on August 30, 1957, held that Hari Lala was a statutory tenant of these lands and that Bai Dhani, the daughter of Hari Lala, could not inherit the tenancy rights of her father. From this decision of the Assistant Collector, Bai Dhani went in revision before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal and the Revenue Tribunal, by an order made by it on January 20, 1958, allowed the revisional application of Bai Dhani. The Tribunal held that under s. 5 of the Act of 1948, as it stood before the amending Act XIII of 1956 came into force, the tenancy which Hari Lala enjoyed was a statutory tenancy, but the Tribunal held further that the rights of a statutory tenant were heritable rights and therefore Bai Dhani was entitled to continue to remain in possession of these lands. It is this view of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal which is challenged by the petitioners-landlords in this application under art. 227 of the Constitution, their contention substantially being that the rights which a statutory tenant has in respect of the lands enjoyed by him are not heritable rights.

Now, it may be remembered that Hari Lala, the father of respondent No. 1 Bai Dhani, entered upon these lands in the year 1954-55 upon a lease which was a one year's lease. That being so, the Act that would govern this case would be the Act of 1948, as it stood before its amendment. The Amending Act XIII of 1956 came into force on August 1, 1956. Now the relevant section of the Act of 1948 which would apply to the facts of the present case would be s. 5, sub-s. (1). Sub-section (1) provides:

"No tenancy of any land shall be for a period of less than ten years:

Provided that at the end of the said period and thereafter at the end of each period of ten years in succession, the tenancy shall, subject to the provisions of sub-sections (2) and (3), be deemed to be renewed for a further period of 10 years on the same terms and conditions notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary."

It is clear that the statute, the language of which admits of no ambiguity, created a tenancy whose period was not less than ten years. Whatever might be the terms of the contract of lease, the Act of 1948 which came into force on December 28, 1948, created a law that with effect from December 28, 1948, there shall not be any tenancy for less than ten years. The statute did not say that if a contractual tenancy was for a period less than ten years, the said contractual period would be deemed to be extended to ten years. It prohibited the creation of a tenancy for a period less than ten years. Clearly, therefore, by virtue of the statute, Hari Lala's tenancy which was one year's tenancy under the contract became a tenancy for ten years in conformity with the statute that was enacted with effect from December 28, 1948. Accordingly, in our view, the Courts below were right in recording a finding of fact that Hari Lala was a statutory tenant. It is this concurrent finding of fact which the learned advocate Mr. Rajani Patel for the petitioners seeks to support and he contends further that the rights of a statutory tenant are not heritable rights and, therefore, the landlords would be entitled to recover possession of these lands from Bai Dhani, the daughter of Hari Lala. It is the above-mentioned concurrent finding of fact of the Courts below which the learned advocate Mr. Oza, for respondent No. 1, seeks to challenge and he contends that Hari Lala was not a statutory tenant, but was a contractual tenant, and that the rights of contractual tenancy being heritable rights, Bai Dhani, the daughter of Hari Lala, would be entitled to continue to remain in possession of these lands.

Now, upon a question whether the tenancy rights of a statutory tenant are heritable or not, it was held in *Eruck Bapasola v. Mirchandani*¹ that a statutory tenancy does not create a right in property. The learned Chief Justice delivering the judgment of the Bench in that case observed that a statutory tenancy was merely a personal right given by the statute. There is no doubt that although a statutory tenant remains in possession of the land and enjoys the land so long as he complies with the provisions of the statute, he has no estate or interest in the land as an ordinary tenant has. It is undeniable that his right is purely a personal one, and, that being so, unless the statute expressly authorises him to pass on that right to another person, the right must cease the moment he (the statutory tenant) parts with possession of the land or dies. Also in *The State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabhai*² it was held by this Court that a tenant, protected by a statute in the possession of demised premises, is a statutory tenant. It was observed that the right of such a tenant to remain in possession of the premises was a personal right, and not a right which the tenant could assign or deal with. The learned advocate Mr. Oza, appearing for respondent No. 1 Bai Dhani, contends that Hari Lala, the father of Bai Dhani, had a dual capacity: firstly, the capacity of a statutory tenant, the period of the statutory tenancy being not less than ten years, and, secondly, the capacity of a contractual tenant, the period of which tenancy, though the lease was initially a one year's lease, was deemed to have been extended to ten years by virtue of a legal fiction. Mr. Oza says that the contractual tenancy rights being heritable rights, Bai Dhani was entitled to continue to remain in possession of the lands. We are unable to accept the contention of Mr. Oza. In our view, the extension of the period of contractual tenancy which would have been available under s. 23(1)(b) of the Act of 1939 is not available under s. 5(1) of the Act of 1948. The legal fiction of extension of the period of contractual tenancy was done away with when the Legislature enacted the Tenancy Act of 1948. Mr. Oza has invited our attention to a decision of this Court in *Dattu Narayan Patil v. Kittul Popat Chaudhari*³ in support of his contention that the period of the contractual tenancy, which initially was a one year's period in this case, must be deemed to have been extended to ten years. Now, it is to be remembered that the case which came up for consideration in Dattu Narayan Patil v. Kittul Popat Chaudhari was a case under the Tenancy Act of 1939. In that case, the original period of the contractual tenancy was five years, and this Court held that by virtue of the legal fiction created by cl. (b) of s. 23(1) the period of the contractual tenancy was deemed to have been extended to ten years. Section 5(1) of the Act of 1948 does not create an artificial fiction extending the contractual character of the tenancy from a period of less than ten years to a period of ten years. Section 5(1) prohibits tenancies of period less than ten years and creates a statutory tenancy whose period shall not be less than ten years. Mr. Oza contends that s. 5(1), by providing that no tenancy of any land shall be for a period less than ten years, extends the contractual character of a tenancy from a period less than ten years to a period of ten years. We have considered s. 23(1), cls. (a) and (b), of the Act of 1939 and have also given an anxious thought to the provisions of s. 5(1) of the Act of 1948. In our view, the provisions of s. 23(1), cl. (a), of the Act of 1939 conferred upon every tenancy a statutory character of ten years' tenancy and, be it noted, this provision was kept intact by s. 5(1) of the Act of 1948. The provisions of cl. (b) of s. 23(1) of the Act of 1939 which, by a legal fiction, extended the period of contractual tenancy to ten years were dropped—and doubtless purposely dropped—when the Act of 1948 was enacted. In other words, the Act of 1948 did away with the artificial fiction that was created by cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 23 of the Act of 1939. Had the intention of the Legislature, while enacting the Tenancy Act of 1948, been to preserve the legal fiction incorporated in cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 23 of the Act of 1939 and had the Legislature intended to provide that a contractual tenancy, though in fact not for ten years, would be deemed to be one for ten years, they would have enacted, in s. 5 of the Act of 1948, a provision similar to the provision of cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 23 of the Act of 1939. But they did not do so. We must, therefore, reject Mr. Oza's contention that s. 5(1) of the Act of 1948 extends the contractual character of a tenancy from a period less than ten years to a period of ten years.

Mr. Oza has next invited our attention to s. 4 of the Act of 1948. Now s. 4 provides:

"A person lawfully cultivating any land belonging to another person shall be deemed to be a tenant if such land is not cultivated personally by the owner and if such person is not—

- (a) a member of the owner's family, or
- (b) a servant on wages payable in cash or kind but not in crop share or a hired labourer cultivating the land under the personal supervision of the owner or any member of the owner's family, or
- (c) a mortgagee in possession."

Mr. Oza contends that under the above-mentioned provisions of s. 4 of the Act his client Bai Dhani must be deemed to be a tenant, apart from being a

of 1956, decided by Shah and Vyas JJ., on statutory tenant under s. 5(1) of the Act. We have considered Mr. Oza's contention, but we are not impressed by it. It is no doubt true that s. 4 does contain the expression "shall be deemed to be a tenant", but the section does not say that a person lawfully cultivating any land belonging to another person shall be deemed to be a contractual tenant. When a person is deemed to possess a certain character, it is clear that he in fact does not possess that character, but by a legal fiction that character is conferred upon him. In the present case, no question arises of Hari Lala being deemed to be a tenant, since, in fact, he was a statutory tenant under the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 5 of the Act. In these circumstances, a recourse to s. 4 of the Act would not assist Mr. Oza's client.

The next contention of Mr. Oza is that the landlords' application, which in this case was an application under s. 84 of the Act, was not maintainable. Mr. Oza contends that the proper procedure for the landlords to follow was a procedure under s. 29 of the Act and he says that the landlords should have applied before the Mamlatdar and not before the Assistant Collector. There is no force in the above contention of Mr. Oza. In a case where a person is a trespasser and is sought to be evicted, the only section in the Tenancy Act which could be invoked is s. 84. Section 29 has no application to a case where a person is unauthorisedly in possession of land. Now, in this case, as I have stated above, there is no question of a contractual tenancy for ten years in favour of Hari Lala. Hari Lala's rights under the contractual tenancy under which he entered upon these lands came to an end upon the expiry of one year from the date upon which he went into occupation of the lands. Under sub-s. (1) of s. 5 of the Act of 1948 Hari Lala became a statutory tenant, the period of such statutory tenancy being ten years. But it is to be noted, and I have already stated the reasons for this conclusion, that the rights of a tenant who is a statutory tenant are not heritable rights. The right of a statutory tenant to remain in possession of the land is merely a personal right. It is a right conferred upon him by a statute; it is not a right in property and therefore such right does not devolve upon his heirs after his death. In view of these circumstances, Bai Dhani's possession of the lands which are the subject-matter of this application, being possession as a trespasser, the only remedy which was available to the landlords for evicting Bai Dhani from the lands was the remedy under s. 84 of the Act. Apart from the fact that this contention of Mr. Oza has no substance on merits, it may be remembered that this point, viz., that s. 84 of the Act would not be attracted in this case, was not taken by Mr. Oza's client before the Assistant Collector or even before the Revenue Tribunal. That being so, the landlords had no opportunity to meet this point. Upon this ground also this particular point raised by Mr. Oza deserves to fail. However, as I have just stated, it fails even on merits.

Next, Mr. Oza has invited our attention to s. 40 which was introduced into the statute book by the Amending Act XIII of 1956. Section 40, sub-s. (1) provides:

"Where a tenant (other than a permanent tenant) dies, the landlord shall be deemed to have continued the tenant on the same terms and conditions on which such tenant was holding it at the time of his death, to such heir or heirs of the deceased tenant as may be willing to continue the tenancy."

Relying upon this section, Mr. Oza contends that the petitioners-landlords shall be deemed to have continued the tenancy in favour of Bai Dhani, the heir of Hari Lala, on the same terms and conditions upon which Hari Lala was holding the lands at the time of his death. We have carefully considered this contention also, but we have felt constrained to reject it. It is to be noted that s. 40 on which reliance is placed by Mr. Oza was not on the statute book when Hari Lala died. Hari Lala died on September 14, 1955, and the section was introduced into the statute book on August 1, 1956. That being so, the provisions of this section would not be applicable to the facts of the present case. Mr. Oza contends, however, that the provisions of s. 40 of the Act must be given a retrospective effect and, says Mr. Oza, if the provisions are retrospectively applied, Bai Dhani must get the benefit thereof. In support of the contention that the provisions of s. 40 must be retrospectively applied, Mr. Oza has invited our attention to a decision of this Court in Parvatibai Vasudeo v. Shridhar.⁴ The question which came up for consideration in that case was about the effect of the Amending Act LXI of 1953 upon the Explanation below sub-s. (2) of s. 18 of the Rent Control Act. This Court came to the conclusion that the Amending Act introduced a change in the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 18 and the Court held that as soon as the change was introduced the Amending Act finished itself and its purpose was served out. The Court observed in that case that the Amending Act had no independent existence and therefore what was done by it must relate back to the date when the original Act was passed. It pointed out that after the Amending Act came into force, the earlier Act must be read and construed, except where it would lead to repugnancy, inconsistency or absurdity, as if the altered words were written in the earlier Act with the same pen and ink and the old words scored out, so that thereafter there was no need to refer to the Amending Act at all. Now, it is to be noted that in this case there was an inconsistency between the rights conferred upon the tenant under s. 5(1) of the Act of 1948 and the rights conferred by s. 40 which was introduced into the statute book by the Amending Act XIII of 1956. Before the Amending Act XIII of 1956 came into force, the tenant had certain rights under sub-s. (1) of s. 5. The provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 5 did not find place in the Amending Act which came into force with effect from August 1, 1956. That being so, this would clearly be a case of inconsistency between the provisions of the earlier Act, which provisions are to be found in sub-s. (1) of s. 5 of that Act, and the provisions of s. 40 which was for the first time introduced into the statute book with effect from August 1, 1956. Accordingly the decision of this Court in Parvatibai Vasudeo v. Shridhar would not assist Mr. Oza's client.

Decision in Parvatibai Vasudeo v. Shridhar was based upon a decision of the Supreme Court in Shamarao V. Parulekar v. The District Magistrate, Thana.⁵ It was held by the Supreme Court in this case that when a subsequent Act amended an earlier one in such a way as to incorporate itself or a part of itself into the earlier one, then the earlier Act must thereafter be read and construed (except where that would lead to a repugnancy, inconsistency or absurdity) as if the altered words had been written into the earlier Act with the same pen and ink and the old words scored out, so that there was no need to refer to the Amending Act at all. Now, the case with which we are dealing in this application is not a case of incorporation of s. 40 or any part of the provisions of s. 40 into the old s. 5(1). As I have pointed out above, s. 5(1) does not find any place at all in the Act as amended by the Amending Act XIII of 1956. In other words, this is not a case of the amendment of s. 5(1). This is a case where the old s. 5(1) was removed completely from the statute book and an altogether new section, being s. 40, was introduced for the first time with effect from August 1, 1956. That being so, recourse to the case of Shamarao V. Parulekar v. The District Magistrate, Thana, would not assist Mr. Oza's client.

The next case to which our attention is invited by Mr. Oza is B. G. Chavan v. State of Bombay.⁶ In that case, what the Court had to consider was the true effect of Act XXXV of 1954, substituting "four years" for "three years" in s. 25(1) of the Act. Following the decision of the Supreme Court in Shamarao V. Parulekar v. The District Magistrate, Thana, this Court held that where the words "four years" were substituted in place of the original words "three years", the altered words must be read and construed as if they had existed in the original Act. This decision again would be of little assistance to respondent No. 1 in this case. This is not a case of removal of certain words from the old s. 5(1) and substitution of new words in their place. As I have just stated, this is a case where the provisions of s. 5(1) of the Act of 1948 were not incorporated in the Act as amended by Act XIII of 1956.

Mr. Oza has next referred us to an English decision in Hutchinson v. Jauncey.⁷ Now, this was a case in which in October 1945 the tenant of a house within the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts sub-let two rooms in it, sharing the use of the scullery for cooking with the sub-tenant. The sub-tenant subsequently bought the house subject to the tenancy, and in his capacity as landlord he served a valid notice to quit on the tenant expiring on April 25, 1949, and, on the tenant's refusing to comply with it, on May 25 he issued a plaint claiming possession. On that date as the law then stood, the tenancy was not within the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts owing to the sharing of the use of the scullery. On June 2, 1949, the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, came into force, which by ss. 7, 8 and 9 extended the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts to the various cases where the tenant shared accommodation with others. Section 10 provided that the three sections (ss. 7, 8 and 9)

"shall apply whether the letting in question began before or after the commencement of this Act, but not so as to affect rent in respect of any period before the commencement thereof or anything done or omitted during any such period."

It was held by the learned Judges that on the true construction of s. 10 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, the relevant provisions of the Act applied to pending matters. Mr. Oza relies upon this decision in order to contend that the provisions of s. 40 which were introduced into the statute book by the Amending Act XIII of 1956 should be given retrospective effect. This decision also will not help respondent No. 1 for the simple reason that by the language of s. 10 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, itself, retrospective effect was given to the provisions of ss. 7, 8 and 9. Section 10 provided:

"The three last foregoing sections shall apply whether the letting in question began before or after the commencement of Act etc., etc."

The English case, therefore, was a case in which the statute itself retrospectively applied the provisions of certain sections thereof. That is not the case with s. 40 of the Act, which was introduced into the statute book by Act XIII of 1956. Accordingly the provisions of s. 40 cannot be given a retrospective effect and Mr. Oza's contention based upon s. 40 must fail. Whatever rights Hari Lala had in these lands as a contractual tenant came to an end upon the expiry of one year from the commencement of his contractual tenancy and thereafter the lands vested in the petitioners-landlords. The provisions of s. 40 cannot be construed retrospectively so as to take away the vested rights of the petitioners-landlords.

The last contention of Mr. Oza is that apart from the rights of a statutory tenant which Hari Lala had by virtue of sub-s. (1) of s. 5 of the Act of 1948, he had contractual rights also in respect of the lands, whose possession was enjoyed by him, by virtue of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act. Mr. Oza has invited our attention to ss. 30 and 8 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 and has argued that in deciding the present application, due regard must be had to the law as contained in the Transfer of Property Act. Now, s. 30 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 provides:

"Save as otherwise provided in sub-section (3) of section 6 and sub-section (1) of section 27, no other provision contained in this Act shall be construed to limit or abridge the rights or privileges of any tenant under any usage or law for the time being in force or arising out of any contract, grant, decree or order of a Court or otherwise howsoever." Relying upon this section, Mr. Oza contends that the law in respect of contractual rights under the Transfer of Property Act must be taken into consideration while deciding this application. If we turn to s. 3 of the Act of 1948, the section provides:

"The provisions of Chapter V of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, shall, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, apply to the tenancies and leases of lands to which this Act applies."

It is in this manner that Mr. Oza relying upon ss. 3 and 30 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 contends that due effect must be given to the contractual rights which Hari Lala had enjoyed in respect of these lands under the Transfer of Property Act. We have given an anxious thought to this submission of Mr. Oza, but we are of the view that the submission cannot prevail. Clause (a) of s. 111 of the Transfer of Property Act, which falls under Chapter V of the Act, provides: "A lease of immoveable property determines by the efflux of time limited thereby." I have already stated above that the period of the contractual tenancy of Hari Lala was a one year's period. Clearly, therefore, the contractual tenancy of Hari Lala was determined by the efflux of time and it was determined upon the expiry of one year from the date upon which Hari Lala entered upon these lands by virtue of his contractual tenancy. It is true that even upon the expiry of one year from the date of commencement of the contractual tenancy of Hari Lala, he continued to remain in possession of the lands. It is to be remembered, however, that even after the expiry of one year the petitioners-landlords accepted rent from Hari Lala under the provisions of the Tenancy Act. By accepting rent from Hari Lala the landlords did not assent to Hari Lala holding over, or Bai Dhani holding over, as a tenant within the meaning of s. 116 of the Transfer of Property Act. The point which we wish to emphasise is that although the possession of these lands continued with Hari Lala after the determination of his contractual tenancy, the possession continued because Hari Lala was a statutory tenant by virtue of s. 5(1) of the Act of 1948. Hari Lala did not hold over and, after his death, his daughter Bai Dhani did not hold over as a tenant by virtue of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act. In our view, after the expiry of one year from the date of commencement of the contractual tenancy of Hari Lala, Hari Lala had no right under the Transfer of Property Act in respect of these lands. That being so, this particular contention of Mr. Oza based upon ss. 3 and 30 of the Act of 1948 must also fail.

The result, therefore, is that this application made by the petitioners-landlords is allowed, the order made by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal on January 20, 1958, is reversed and the order made by the Assistant Collector on August 30, 1957, is restored. There will be no order as to costs of this application.

Application allowed.

Where the tenant, as a result of the permission granted to his landlord to terminate his tenancy under cl. 13(3)(vii) of the C.P. and Berar Letting of Houses and Rent Control Order, 1949, has vacated the premises, the Additional Deputy Commissioner on an application made to him by the tenant under cl. 13(7) of the Order for reinstatement, after the premises are repaired, has jurisdiction under s. 28(1) of the Order to put the tenant in possession of the premises.

The jurisdiction conferred upon the Deputy Commissioner under s. 28(1) of the Order is to secure compliance with the provisions of the Order itself or to prevent contravention of the Order itself and is not restricted to the orders made by the Rent Control authorities under the Order.

*Decided, September 18, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 148 of 1958.

†The relevant clauses are as under:—

Cl. 13 (1) No landlord shall, except with the previous written permission of the Controller:—

(a) give notice to a tenant determining the lease or determine the lease if the lease is expressed to be determinable at his option; or

(b) where the lease is determinable by efflux of the time limited thereby, require the tenant to vacate the house by process of law or otherwise if the tenant is willing to continue the lease on the same terms and conditions.

(3). If after hearing the parties the Controller is satisfied:—

(vi) that the landlord needs the house or a portion thereof for the purpose of his bona-fide residence, provided he is not occupying any other residential house of his own in the city or town concerned; or

(vii) that the landlord desires to make essential repairs or alterations which cannot be made without the tenant vacating the house; or...

(4). Where the landlord, who has obtained possession of a house or a portion thereof in pursuance of permission granted by the Controller under sub-clause (1) on the ground specified in item (vi) of sub-clause (3), does not himself occupy it without good cause, for the purpose specified in such ground, within one month of the date of obtaining possession, the tenant who has been evicted may apply to the Controller for an order directing that he shall be restored possession of the house or a portion thereof and the Controller shall make an order accordingly.

(5). Where the landlord has obtained possession of a house or a portion thereof in pursuance of the permission granted by the Controller under sub-clause (1) on the ground specified in item (vi) of sub-clause (3), he shall not let the said house or portion thereof to any person other than the evicted tenant except with the previous approval in writing of the Controller in that behalf.

(7). Where the landlord has obtained possession of a house or portion thereof in pursuance of the permission granted by the Controller under sub-clause (1) on the ground specified in item (vi) of sub-clause (3), he shall, after the repairs or alterations have been made, restore possession of the house or portion thereof on the same conditions as before to the tenant who vacated it and shall not let the same to any other person or occupy it himself unless such tenant has waived in writing his claim to have such possession restored to him.

Cl. 28 (1). The Deputy Commissioner may take or cause to be taken such steps and use or cause to be used such force as may, in his opinion, be reasonably necessary for the purpose of securing compliance with, or for preventing or rectifying any contravention of this Order or for the effective exercise of such power of the aforesaid order of the Additional Deputy Commissioner, he be restored to the possession of the house in question.

The facts giving rise to this petition in short are: The petitioner was the tenant of respondents Nos. 1 and 2. They were granted permission on November 15, 1956, to terminate the tenancy of the petitioner under cl. 13(3)(vi) of the C.P. and Berar Letting of Houses and Rent Control Order, 1949, hereinafter referred to as the Rent Control Order. The petitioner then vacated the house on February 28, 1957. According to the petitioner, the house was repaired by respondents Nos. 1 and 2 and the repairs were completed in July 1957 and the premises became fit for occupation by the petitioner. The petitioner then approached respondents Nos. 1 and 2 to reinstate him in the said premises, but they did not put him in possession. He then served a notice on the respondents on July 30, 1957, but to no effect. He then made an application to the Rent Controller under sub-cl. (7) of cl. 13 of the Rent Control Order praying therein that he be reinstated in possession of the house. The Rent Controller held that he had no jurisdiction to grant the relief claimed by the petitioner. He, therefore, dismissed the application. The petitioner then made another application to the Additional Deputy Commissioner under sub-cl. (7) of cl. 13 of the Rent Control Order again praying therein that he be reinstated in possession of the house.

Respondents Nos. 1 and 2 resisted this application on two grounds among others. The first ground was that it was not open to the Additional Deputy Commissioner to order reinstatement of the petitioner under sub-cl. (7) of cl. 13 of the Order and secondly that the repairs of the house have not as yet been completed. Both the contention of respondents Nos. 1 and 2 were upheld by the Additional Deputy Commissioner. The petitioner has, therefore, come up to this Court.

Shri Bhalerao, learned counsel for the petitioner, in the first instance, contends that the Additional Deputy Commissioner was in error in holding that he had no jurisdiction to put the petitioner in possession of the house. In our view, this contention is well-founded.

Now, it is not in dispute that the permission which was granted to respondents Nos. 1 and 2 to serve a quit notice on the petitioner was under cl. 13(3)(vi). Sub-clause (7) of cl. 13 of the Order provides that where the landlord has obtained possession of a house or portion thereof in pursuance of the permission granted by the Controller under sub-cl. (1) on the ground specified in item (vi) of sub-cl. (3), he shall, after the repairs or alterations have been made, restore possession of the house or portion thereof on the same conditions as before to the tenant who vacated it and shall not let the same to any other person or occupy it himself unless such tenant has waived in writing his claim to have such possession restored to him. It is clear that in the instant case permission having been granted under item (vi) of sub-cl. (3) of cl. 13 of the Order, the petitioner would be entitled to obtain possession on completion of the repairs or alterations to the house. The learned Additional Deputy Commissioner, however, has found it difficult to grant the relief claimed by the petitioner, as, according to him, there are no provisions in the Rent Control Order for enforcing the claim made by the tenant under sub-cl. (7) of cl. 13 of the Order. In our opinion, the Additional Deputy Commissioner has fallen in error in holding that there are no provisions in the Rent Control Order to grant such a relief.

It appears that the provisions of cl. 28 of the Rent Control Order had not been brought to the notice of the Additional Deputy Commissioner. Sub-clause (1) of cl. 28 provides that the Deputy Commissioner may take or cause to be taken such steps and use or cause to be used such force as may, in his opinion, be reasonably necessary for the purpose of securing compliance with, or for preventing or rectifying any contravention of this Order or for the effective exercise of such power. The provisions of sub-cl. (1) of cl. 28, in our opinion, are wide enough to confer jurisdiction on the Deputy Commissioner to entertain the claim made by the petitioner in the instant case. The jurisdiction conferred on the Deputy Commissioner is of the following nature to take steps and use and cause to be used such force (i) for the purpose of securing compliance with the Rent Control Order, (ii) for preventing or rectifying any contravention of this Order, and (iii) for effective exercise of the powers conferred by the Rent Control Order. It cannot be disputed that sub-cl. (2) of cl. 13 provides that after the completion of the repairs or alterations the landlord must put back the tenant in possession unless he in writing has consented to the premises being let out to others. If the landlord does not do so, then the Deputy Commissioner is empowered to take necessary steps for the purpose of securing compliance with the provisions of the Rent Control Order. Looked at from another point of view, what the tenant is claiming is that the landlord be prevented from contravening the provisions of this Order. That being the case, the Deputy Commissioner clearly had jurisdiction to deal with such a claim under cl. 28 of the Rent Control Order.

Shri Banerjee, learned counsel for respondents Nos. 1 and 2, contends that the provisions of sub-cl. (1) of cl. 28 are intended to secure compliance with or prevent contravention of the orders made by the Rent Control authorities under the Rent Control Order and is not intended for the purpose of securing compliance with or preventing or rectifying any contravention of the Rent Control Order itself. It is not possible for us to accept this contention of Shri Banerjee. The word used in this sub-cl. (1) of cl. 28 is 'Order' and not "an order made under this Order". It is, therefore, in our opinion, clear that the jurisdiction conferred under sub-cl. (1) of cl. 28 of the Rent Control Order is to secure compliance with the provisions of the Rent Control Order itself or to prevent contravention of the Rent Control Order itself.

Shri Banerjee next argued that the authorities concerned have made specific provisions wherever they thought it proper that any contravention of the provisions of the Rent Control Order should be dealt with by the Rent Control authorities and in this connection Shri Banerjee referred us to sub-cl. (4) and (5) of cl. 13 of the Rent Control Order.

Turning to sub-cl. (4) of cl. 13, it provides that where the landlord who has obtained possession of a house or a portion thereof in pursuance of the permission granted by the Controller under sub-cl. (1) on the ground specified in item (vi) of sub-cl. (3), does not himself occupy it without good cause, for the purpose specified in such ground, within one month of the date of obtaining possession, the tenant who has been evicted may apply to the Controller for an order directing that he shall be restored possession of the house or a portion thereof and the Controller shall make an order accordingly. Now, it would be seen that by sub-cl. (4) jurisdiction is conferred on the Rent Controller to deal with a claim relating to the contravention of item (vi) of sub-cl. (3) of cl. 13 of the Rent Control Order. This only shows that wherever the authority is of opinion that the matter be dealt with not by the Deputy Commissioner but by the Rent Controller himself it has so specifically provided. It does not follow that in other cases the framers of the Order had no intention to confer jurisdiction on the Deputy Commissioner. Similarly is the case with sub-cl. (5) of cl. 13 of the Rent Control Order. Sub-clause (5) provides that where the landlord has obtained possession of a house or a portion thereof in pursuance of the permission granted by the Controller under sub-cl. (1) on the ground specified in item (vi) of sub-cl. (3), he shall not let the said house or portion thereof to any person other than the evicted tenant except with the previous approval in writing of the Controller in that behalf. This again is another side of sub-cl. (4). It would be seen that sub-cl. (4) gives a right to the tenant to claim back possession of the premises in the event the landlord does not occupy it himself, while sub-cl. (5) prohibits the landlord from letting out the premises to anybody else without the consent of the evicted tenant and the jurisdiction to deal with this particular subject-matter has been conferred on the Rent Controller himself under the Rent Control Order.

Lastly, Shri Banerjee contends that the construction placed by us would lead to heavy accumulation of work before the Deputy Commissioner and each and every contravention of the Rent Control Order would become the subject-matter of a complaint before him and that would result in burdening the file of the Deputy Commissioner with heavy work. We are not concerned with this aspect of the case. We are concerned only with construction of the provisions of the Rent Control Order. As to how the work is to be disposed of is a matter which has to be considered by the authorities concerned. Apart from it, we find it difficult to accept the contention of Shri Banerjee. If we accept his contention then it would mean that though sub-cl. (7) of cl. 13 of the Rent Control Order confers a right on the evicted tenant to claim back possession of the premises on completion of the alterations or repairs, the landlord could with impunity go on denying his right and the evicted tenant would have no remedy to get the wrong done to him redressed by the Rent Control authorities. It is difficult to assume that the authors of the Rent Control Order after conferring this right on the evicted tenant provided no remedy for its enforcement. We have already stated that there are no clear words in sub-cl. (1) of cl. 28 of the Rent Control Order to restrict its operation to the orders made under the Rent Control Order. In these circumstances, we see no reason why we should so construe cl. 28(1) of the Rent Control Order as would render enforcement of the right conferred by it difficult. It is, therefore, not possible for us to accept the contention of Shri Banerjee. We, therefore, hold that the Additional Deputy Commissioner was in error in holding that he had no jurisdiction to deal with the application to grant the relief prayed for by the petitioner in the event of his establishing other facts which entitled him to that relief. This conclusion, however, is not sufficient for the purpose of granting any relief to the petitioner. As already stated, the petitioner would be entitled to claim back possession of the premises after the completion of the repairs or alterations.

The fact found in the instant case by the Additional Deputy Commissioner is that the repairs to the house have not been completed as yet and the house is not ready for occupation. This is a finding of fact and that being the case the application of the petitioner wherein he claimed reinstatement was premature and was not well-founded and in this view of the matter it cannot be said that the dismissal of the application by the Additional Deputy Commissioner was erroneous.

In the result, therefore, the petition fails and is dismissed. However in view of the facts and circumstances of the case we direct that the costs shall be borne as incurred.

Petition dismissed.

Hindu Marriage Act (XXV of 1955), Sec. 12—Proceeding instituted under s. 12(1)(d) for decree of nullity of marriage—Respondent alleging in written statement that she was pregnant by petitioner—Burden of proof—Whether petitioner must prove beyond reasonable doubt that respondent was pregnant at time of marriage by some one other than petitioner.

In proceedings instituted under s. 12(1)(d) of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, the petitioner must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the respondent was pregnant at the time of marriage and that she was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner.

*Ginasi v. Ginasi,*¹ *Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones,*² *Batter v. Batter,*³ *Galler v. Galler,*⁴ *Gower v. Gower,*⁵ *Over v. Over*⁶ and *Gaskil v. Gaskil,*⁷ referred to.

ONE Mahendra (petitioner), who was a resident of Bombay, was betrothed to Sushila (respondent), who was a resident of Prantij in North Gujerat, in June or the beginning of July 1945. Their marriage took place on March 10, 1947. From March 10, 1947, to about the end of March 1947, the respondent stayed with the petitioner in Bombay. In about the beginning of April 1947 she went to her parents' place and stayed there upto about 22nd or 23rd of April. After going to Prantij, the respondent did not keep good health and she got herself examined and she was told by the doctor that she was carrying. She came to Bombay on April 23, 1947. The husband and wife during the short period that was available to them before the husband's departure for the United States of America, had marital relations, according to the respondent more than once and according to the petitioner only once. After the petitioner left for the United States of America, the respondent stayed with the father of the petitioner for a few days and thereafter went to Gandevi where the petitioner's sister Sharada and her husband were staying and stayed there for about 26 days and returned to Vile Parle in Bombay where the petitioner's father and mother were residing. The relations between the respondent and the petitioner's mother were not very cordial and on the petitioner's advice the respondent went to Prantij to reside with her parents. On August 27, 1947, the respondent gave birth to a female child at Prantij and due information of it was given to the petitioner by a telegram as well as by a letter. Information was also given to the petitioner's father at Bombay. The petitioner alleged that he was shocked to hear this news and suspected that the child was not his.

The petitioner returned to Bombay in about the middle or end of November 1947, and made an application in the Shahar Nyayadhi Court at Baroda under Lagna Vichhed Niband, the divorce law prevalent in the Baroda State. It was applicable to people who belonged to the Baroda State and who had a minimum residence of one year in Baroda. The respondent contended that the child was born of the wedlock and that the child was of the petitioner. The Baroda Court dismissed the suit of the petitioner on the ground that the petitioner was not domiciled in Baroda.

On April 20, 1956, the petitioner presented the present petition under s. 12(1)(d) of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, for a declaration that the marriage between the petitioner and the respondent was null and void on the ground that the respondent was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner, alleging that he was not aware of that at the time of the marriage and that when he came to know of the fact that the respondent was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner he had not lived or co-habited with the respondent.

*Decided, October 3, 1958. First Appeal No. 135 of 1958, against the decision of G. A. Thakker, Judge, City Civil Court, Bombay, in M. J. Petition No. 1026 of 1956.

ent. The respondent by her written statement contended that she submitted to the petitioner's demands for sex relations after the betrothal as per his entreaties and representations made to the respondent, that amongst their community and according to their religion, betrothal was as good as marriage and that marriage was a mere formality for the legalization of children and as such even if intercourse resulted in conception, the marriage would set things right and she alleged that it was on these representations that the respondent submitted to the petitioner and there were sex relations between the petitioner and the respondent before marriage and as a result the respondent conceived through the petitioner. She further alleged that of these relations the petitioner's parents as well as his sister were well aware prior to the marriage and she denied that she had sex relations with any one else except the petitioner.

The trial Court passed a decree of nullity in favour of the petitioner.

The respondent appealed.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded.] Section 12 of the Act so far as is material to the present case is as follows:—

"12. (1) Any marriage solemnized, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, shall be voidable; and may be annulled by a decree of nullity on any of the following grounds, namely:—

(d) that the respondent was at the time of the marriage pregnant by some person other than the petitioner.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), no petition for annulling a marriage—...

(b) on the ground specified in clause (d) of sub-section (1) shall be entertained unless the court is satisfied—

(i) that the petitioner was at the time of the marriage ignorant of the facts alleged;...

(iii) that marital intercourse with the consent of the petitioner has not taken place since the discovery by the petitioner of the existence of the grounds for a decree."

Section 23 so far as relevant provides:—

"23. (1) In any proceeding under this Act, whether defended or not, if the Court is satisfied that—

(a) any of the grounds for granting relief exists and the petitioner is not in any way taking advantage of his or her own wrong or disability for the purpose of such relief;...

(c) the petition is not presented or prosecuted in collusion with the respondent, and

(d) there has not been any unnecessary or improper delay in instituting the proceeding, and

(e) there is no other legal ground why relief should not be granted, then, and in such a case, but not otherwise, the Court shall decree such relief accordingly."

The issues that would arise would be:—

(1) Whether the respondent was pregnant at the date of marriage.

(2) If she was, whether she was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner.

(3) Whether the petitioner was at the time of marriage ignorant of the facts alleged.

(4) Whether the marital intercourse with the consent of the petitioner has not taken place since the discovery by the petitioner of the existence of the grounds for a decree.

Mr. Vimadalal has argued that in matrimonial suits, the Court must be satisfied that the petitioner has proved his case beyond reasonable doubt. He has relied upon a passage in the treatise on Divorce by Rayden (7th edn.) at p. 203 under the heading "Standard of Proof". The observations are:

"...Adultery, desertion and cruelty must be proved beyond reasonable doubt when they operate by way of a bar to relief, just as much as when they are relied on to found a right to relief;..."

He also relied on the observations in Vol. XII, Halsbury's Laws of England, at para. 445. He has also relied upon the case of *Ginesi v. Ginesi*¹. The ratio is:

"In a matrimonial case the same strict proof is required of adultery (which was regarded by the ecclesiastical courts as a "quasi-criminal offence") as is required in a criminal case of a criminal offence properly so-called, namely, that it must be proved beyond all reasonable doubt to the satisfaction of the tribunal of fact."

He has also relied upon *Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones*², *Batter v. Batter*³ and *Galler v. Galler*⁴, cases which have accepted the standard therein laid down. The observations in Ginesi v. Ginesi received some criticism on the ground that these actions are civil actions in their nature and the standard of proof required was unduly hard. See Gower v. Gower.⁵ At that time Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones was not decided by the House of Lords. In the case of Galler v. Galler, the question of standard of proof in matrimonial cases has been considered and the law discussed. The following observations in the leading judgment of Hodson L.J. at p. 540 are pertinent:—

"I have used the language which I have because, since *Fairman v. Fairman*⁶ was decided, the much debated question whether the standard of proof in a divorce suit, which is a kind of civil action, is the same as that in a criminal case, and whether the same rules apply, has been considered by the House of Lords in Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones. Lord Mac Dermott said:

"I am unable to subscribe to the view which, though not propounded here, has had its adherents, namely, that on its true construction the word 'satisfied' is capable of connoting something less than proof beyond reasonable doubt'.

"The jurisdiction in divorce involves the status of the parties and the public interest requires that the marriage bond shall not be set aside lightly or without strict inquiry. The terms of the statute recognise this plainly, and I think it would be quite out of keeping with the anxious nature of its provisions to hold that the court might be "satisfied", in respect of a ground for dissolution, with something less than proof beyond reasonable doubt. I should, perhaps, add that I do not base my conclusions as to the appropriate standard of proof on any analogy drawn from the criminal law. I do not think it is possible to say, at any rate, since the decision of this house in *Moudaunt v. Moncreiffe*⁷, that the two jurisdictions are other than distinct. The true reason, as it seems to me, why both accept the same general standard—proof beyond reasonable doubt—lies not in any analogy, but in the gravity and public importance of the issues with which each is concerned'.

It might appear from the passages which I have read from the judgment in Fairman v. Fairman, that the analogy of criminal law was the ratio of that decision, but I think the result is the same by whichever road one travels. In divorce, as in crime, the court has to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt."

The cases referred to above do take the view that there is no distinction to be drawn between the word "satisfied" standing alone and the word "satisfied" accompanied by the words "beyond reasonable doubt".

I may also refer to the case of *Over v. Over*⁸ where Sir Lallubhai Shah observed (p. 256):—

"...I desire to make it clear that in divorce cases great care and caution are necessary in dealing with the admissions of parties and it is only the exceptional circumstances of a given case that could justify the Court in acting upon the admissions of a party as to adultery without any corroboration. Generally speaking, as a matter of prudence it is desirable to insist upon evidence corroborative of the admissions."

Martin J., as he then was, observes at p. 259:—

"...No doubt s. 45 provides that 'subject to the provisions herein contained, all proceedings under this Act between party and party shall be regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure'. But that provision, in my opinion, does not override the express directions in ss. 7, 12, 13 and 14 to which I have already alluded."

This was under the Indian Divorce Act, 1869.

The reason of the rule is equally applicable here where the consequences to the woman are very serious. The words in the present Act (Hindu Marriage Act, 1955) and the English Acts are practically similar. Of course these cases laid down the standard of proof in cases of adultery. I think, however, that the same strict standard of proof must be required in cases like the present.

Relying on this rule of strict proof Mr. Vimadalal argues that the burden of the issue "whether the respondent at the time of marriage was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner" is on the petitioner and in spite of the so-called admissions in the written statements, the petitioner was bound to prove it beyond reasonable doubt. According to him, he is bound to prove to the satisfaction of the Court that the respondent was pregnant at the time of marriage and secondly, that she was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner. Mr. Amin, on the other hand, contends very emphatically, relying on para. 9 of the judgment of the lower Court and paras. 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 of her written statement and her statement in Court in her cross-examination that it is not open now to the respondent to urge that the petitioner was bound to prove that she was pregnant at the date of the marriage. He has contended that no party can be allowed to make out a case at variance with the pleadings. The party must be bound to its pleadings for good or bad and has no right in appeal to make a case different and inconsistent from the one made out either in the plaint or in the statement. This principle, no doubt, is a correct principle and no exception can be taken to the same. But these proceedings are matrimonial proceedings, and in matrimonial proceedings there can be no judgment by default or admission. I may refer to Raydon on Divorce at p. 202 wherein the learned author states as follows:—

"A decree must be refused, even if the suit be not defended, where there is no jurisdiction to make it, or in the absence of sufficient proof of the allegations put forward, for judgment by default is unknown in matrimonial causes: the jurisdiction of the Court is not affected by consent, the public interest does not allow it, and no admission binds the court; the analogy of ordinary actions cannot be applied. The Court is obliged by statute to inquire into the existence of the bars to relief."

Mr. Amin has pointed out that the cases referred to by the author were cases apparently of collusion or connivance. In the present case, he points out, the respondent's written statement, by distinct implication, admits the state of her being pregnant before the date of marriage and he says, she must be bound by these admissions contained in her written statement. I may refer in this regard to the case of Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones, wherein the case was somewhat peculiar. The husband was absent from the United Kingdom from August 17, 1945, to February 9, 1946. On August 13, 1946, the wife gave birth to a normal child. The husband, therefore, brought a petition for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her adultery, the charge being based on the fact that a period of three hundred and sixty days elapsed between August 17, 1945, and August 13, 1946, from which it was alleged it followed that the child must have been conceived in adultery. The wife, it appears, adduced witnesses to speak to the visits paid to her by her husband in the late Autumn 1945, and there appears to be no doubt that the purpose in adducing them was to show that the husband and the wife were or might have been together on dates which would naturally account for the child's birth on August 13, 1946, and this evidence was disbelieved by the Commissioner. The argument advanced was that since the case had been conducted by the wife on the footing that the only question was whether the wife and the husband might have been together in October-November, 1945, the other question should not be open to the wife. Lord Normand observes at p. 181 as follows:—

"In divorce proceedings it is for the petitioner to prove the case whether the action is defended or not, and though the putting forward of a false defence may destroy the respondent's credibility, that in itself does not establish the truth of the petitioner's case. Apart from that objection of principle, it would in the circumstances of this case be unjust to the wife to infer or assume that the false defence is tantamount to an admission of guilt. If it is possible that a child may be born three hundred and sixty days after coitus and if that was what had, indeed, happened, the departure from the normal course of things is so extraordinary that the mother, conscious of innocence but believing herself the victim of a sport of nature, might, despairing of establishing the true defence, allow herself to palter with the truth, and might induce others closely connected with her to lend themselves to prevarication or worse."

Their Lordships then considered the other materials on record for the purpose of arriving at a decision as to whether the husband had proved his case beyond reasonable doubt. I may also mention that at the time when the respondent was in the witness-box, an attempt was made to have the written statement amended to include the alternative case that she was not pregnant at the time of marriage. The learned Judge in exercise of his discretion refused to allow the amendment. He has taken a very strict view which, indeed, would be justified in any civil suit; but it cannot be justified in matrimonial suits. Mr. Amin has urged that the Court below was right in refusing any amendment of the written statement and we ought not to interfere with that discretion. I think the case does not depend on the amendment of the written statement. We must be satisfied about the proof of the petitioner's case beyond any reasonable doubt and where a child has lived, we are of the view that s. 112 of the Indian Evidence Act also cannot be disregarded. Mr. Amin has argued that s. 112 of the Evidence Act can apply to a case where the legitimacy of the child is directly in issue and not to a case like the present where the proceedings are between the husband and the wife. A similar argument was advanced in the case of *Gaskill v. Gaskill*⁹. Viscount Birkenhead, L.C. considered the question of the burden and the presumption of law. He observed (p. 434):

"...It is true that the observations were made in reference to a legitimacy suit, but I cannot conceive that in the present case any different principle can apply; otherwise it might happen that the mother would be condemned for adultery on evidence which would not disentitle the child to be declared to be the legitimate issue of her husband."

We are, therefore, of the view that though the defendant has, in her written statement, stated that she was pregnant by the petitioner, we must require the petitioner to prove beyond reasonable doubt that she was so pregnant and that she was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner. We have, therefore, considered the evidence from that aspect also.

[His Lordship after dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded.]

It would appear from Mody's treatise on Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, 12th edn., p. 305, where he observes as follows:—

"...It has been observed that in women whose intermenstrual period is shorter than the usual time, pregnancy has terminated at the eighth or ninth lunar month or even earlier, the child having attained full development. Sidney H. Waddy describes a case in which a woman, aged 30 years, gave birth to a full-time daughter after gestation of 210 days—ten times three weeks—which was her normal intermenstrual period. The child cried lustily at birth, had a good crop of hair, was well coated with vernix caseosa, measured twenty inches in length, and weighed seven pounds. The finger and toe nails were fully developed and the child sucked vigorously on being put to the breast."

In the same volume at p. 307 we find the following observations:—

"...Hubbard records a case where an infant born at the beginning of the seventh month of pregnancy weighed only 15 ounces, and at the age of six weeks was in good health and weighed 32½ ounces."

He has given several illustrations where children were born after 6½ months of gestation period and have lived. One cannot overlook also the case of *Clark v. Clark*¹⁰ where a child was born after a period of gestation which could not have exceeded 174 days on the assumption that the husband was the father of the child. The child lived and at the date of the hearing, it was about 8 years old. The medical evidence was to the effect that a child of so short a period of foetal life would not survive for more than a day or two. It was held:

"Where the date of conception can be fixed, and the actual period of gestation is ascertained, this ascertained period is comparable to the longer notional period, and for this reason what is in fact a six month' child may be comparable to what is called a seventh-month's child. Therefore, when one reduces the actual facts of this case to the same terms as those upon which the theories and the tables are based, it is utterly impossible to say, that there is anything extravagantly improbable about this being a viable child."

These remarks are equally applicable to the present case. We are, therefore, prima facie not satisfied that the petitioner has proved to our satisfaction that the respondent was pregnant by some one other than the petitioner and that the petitioner was not the father of the child which was born.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report.]

GOKHALE J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded.] But the question is whether the finding that there was no pre-marital sex relations between the parties, as alleged by the respondent, would be decisive of the suit. Mr. Vimadalal's argument was that it could not be decisive of the suit because the Court must be satisfied that the petitioner had established that the respondent was pregnant at the time of marriage by someone other than the petitioner and he contends that this being a matrimonial action, the Court's conscience must be satisfied on this issue and, if there is any doubt, its benefit must go to the respondent. In this connection, Mr. Vimadalal pointed out that in certain English cases adultery has been described in the Divorce Division as a "quasi-criminal offence", as for instance in *Ginesi v. Ginesi*¹. It was conceded that this description was condemned in later English cases, such as in Gower v. Gower.² In Halsbury's Laws of England, third edn., Vol. XII, at p. 233, it is stated that a petition for divorce is a civil and not a criminal proceeding. At page 237, para. 445, it is also stated that:

"The onus of proof is on the person who alleges adultery, for there is a presumption of innocence.

Adultery must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court, that is, beyond reasonable doubt; the evidence need not reach certainty, but it must carry a high degree of probability."

In Rayden on Divorce, seventh edn., to which also our attention was drawn, at p. 133 it is stated that:

"The burden of proof is throughout on the person alleging adultery, there being a presumption of innocence. A suit for divorce is a civil and not a criminal proceeding, but the same strict proof is required of adultery as is required in a criminal case before an accused person is found guilty; that is, the tribunal must be satisfied on proof beyond all reasonable doubt."

Reliance was also placed on a passage at p. 202 of the same book where it is stated:

Mr. Amin, however, argues that this is not a case of collusion or connivance. The respondent admitted conception at the time of marriage and set up a false case of pre-marital sexual relations, which in the face of her discrepant testimony and the correspondence, cannot be accepted by any Court of law; and he contends that once her case as set out in the written statement is held not proved, a decree in favour of the petitioner must follow and was rightly granted by the trial Court. In this connection, he strongly relied on the fact that in her written statement, in para. 7, the respondent had made out a case that she had submitted to the petitioner's demands for sex relations after the betrothal on certain representations made by the petitioner and that there were sex relations between them before marriage as a result of which relations the respondent conceived through the petitioner. Mr. Amin pointed out that this statement has been repeated several times in the written statement and on the basis of this written statement and the particulars furnished by the respondent on September 10, 1956, the parties went to trial and the learned trial Judge, in para. 9 of his judgment, has clearly pointed out how the controversy between the parties narrowed down to the question whether the petitioner had pre-marital sex relations with the respondent and whether the latter conceived as a result of those relations.

In this connection, it may be mentioned that while the respondent was giving evidence an application was made to the trial Judge for an amendment of the written statement, in which an alternative case was sought to be introduced, viz., that the respondent conceived through the petitioner after the marriage. This application for amendment was refused by the learned trial Judge on two grounds: firstly, that the respondent was trying to make out a new defence which was totally inconsistent with the defence which she had taken in her written statement, and secondly, if this case had been pleaded by the respondent originally the petitioner would have led evidence of expert witnesses such as doctors to prove that the conception could not have taken place after marriage, having regard to the date of birth of the child and the other circumstances of the case. Mr. Vimadalal contends that this amendment was wrongly refused by the learned trial Judge and should be allowed, if necessary, by this Court at the appellate stage.

In this connection, reliance was placed on *Over v. Over*³, where it was held that the Court will not grant a decree on the petition by a husband on the ground of the wife's adultery, where the allegation of adultery rests only on the admission made by the wife in her letters, unless it is satisfied that "all reasonable ground for suspicion is removed" and that there is no collusion between the husband and the wife. In this case, Sir Lallubhai Shah, Acting Chief Justice, observed that the question whether in a given case the Court should consider the admissions of the wife as to adultery sufficient must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of that case, and the fact that admissions are accepted as sufficient in one case can afford no reason whatever for accepting them in another case. The learned Judge pointed out that the general considerations which would and should guide the Court in this matter are indicated in the judgment of Cockburn C.J. in Robinson v. Robinson and Lane.⁴ In that case, Cockburn C.J. pointed out that though the admissions of a wife, unsupported by corroborative proof, should be received with the utmost circumspection and caution because of danger of collusion and other sinister motives which might lead to the making of such admissions, nevertheless, if after looking at the evidence with all the distrust and vigilance with which it ought to be regarded the Court comes to the conclusion that the evidence is trustworthy and amounts to a clear, distinct and unequivocal admission of adultery, the Court should have no hesitation to act upon such evidence and afford the injured party the redress sought for.

"...I am unable to subscribe to the view which, though not propounded here, has had its adherents, namely, that on its true construction the word "satisfied" is capable of connoting something less than proof beyond reasonable doubt. The jurisdiction in divorce involves the status of the parties and the public interest requires that the marriage bond shall not be set aside lightly or without strict inquiry. The terms of the statute recognise this plainly, and I think it would be quite out of keeping with the anxious nature of its provisions to hold that the Court might be "satisfied", in respect of a ground for dissolution, with something less than proof beyond reasonable doubt. I should, perhaps, add that I do not base my conclusions as to the appropriate standard of proof on any analogy drawn from the criminal law. I do not think it is possible to say, at any rate since the decision of this House in Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe,⁷ that the two jurisdictions are other than distinct. The true reason, as it seems to me, why both accept the same general standard—proof beyond reasonable doubt—lies not in any analogy, but in the gravity and public importance of the issues with which each is concerned."

In this case, Lord Normand in his judgment (p. 131) also observed that in divorce proceedings it was for the petitioner to prove the case whether the action was defended or not, and though the putting forward of a false defence may destroy the respondent's credibility, that in itself did not establish the truth of the petitioner's case. In this case, the House of Lords was concerned with the interpretation of the word "satisfied" in s. 178 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as amended by s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, (now s. 4(1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950). In a later English case, *Galler v. Galler*⁷ Hodson L.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal, observed that the English Courts have taken the view that there was no distinction to be drawn between the word "satisfied" standing alone and the word "satisfied" accompanied by the words "beyond reasonable doubt", and stated that in divorce, as in crime, the Court has to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt.

These principles, in my opinion, would apply with all the greater force to cases under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955. Section 12 of this Act refers to voidable marriages and provides, in so far as it is material:

"(1) Any marriage solemnized, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, shall be voidable; and may be annulled by a decree of nullity on any of the following grounds, namely:—

(d) that the respondent was at the time of the marriage pregnant by some person other than the petitioner."

Under sub-s. (2)(b) of s. 12—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), no petition for annulling a marriage—

(b) on the ground specified in clause (d) of sub-section (1) shall be entertained unless the court is satisfied—

(i) that the petitioner was at the time of the marriage ignorant of the facts alleged;

(ii) that proceedings have been instituted in the case of a marriage solemnized before the commencement of this Act within one year of such commencement and in the case of marriages solemnized after such commencement within one year from the date of the marriage; and

(iii) that marital intercourse with the consent of the petitioner has not taken place since the discovery by the petitioner of the existence of grounds for a decree."

Now, this Act has repealed the Bombay Hindu Divorce Act (XXII of 1947). The Act came into force on May 18, 1955, and under s. 12(2)(b)(iii) both marriages solemnized before the commencement of the Act as well as after the commencement of the Act are affected. As regards marriages solemnized after the commencement of the Act, the proceedings have to be instituted within one year from the date of the marriage, so that in the case of marriages solemnized after May 18, 1955, the marriages cannot be challenged under this section, after the expiry of one year from the date of the marriage. In the case of marriages solemnized before the Act, however, all the marriages would seem to be open to challenge, the only limitation provided being that the proceedings have to be instituted in these cases within one year of May 18, 1955. In my opinion, there can be no doubt in view of these provisions and the effect it was intended to have on marriages solemnised before the commencement of the Act, a very grave and serious onus would lie on the person instituting proceedings with a view to having a decree of nullity of marriage under s. 12 of the Act.

Under s. 23 of this Act, in so far as it is material, it is provided:

"(1) In any proceeding under this Act, whether defended or not, if the Court is satisfied that—

(a) any of the grounds for granting relief exists and the petitioner is not in any way taking advantage of his or her own wrong or disability for the purpose of such relief, and...

(d) there has not been any unnecessary or improper delay in instituting the proceeding, and

(e) there is no other legal ground why relief should not be granted, then, and in such a case, but not otherwise, the court shall decree such relief accordingly."

In my judgment, the satisfaction which the Court has to arrive at in proceedings under this Act must be satisfaction beyond all reasonable doubt. It is necessary, therefore, to state some of the circumstances under which this petition came to be filed.

As I have already stated, the petitioner filed on March 13, 1948, Suit No. 34 of 1947-48 under the Baroda Hindu Marriage and Divorce Act on the ground that the respondent had become pregnant before his marriage with her and that he was not aware of it and the respondent had concealed the fact of her being so pregnant from him and his parents. That suit was resisted by the respondent on the ground that she had become pregnant as a result of sexual intercourse that she had with the petitioner after her marriage with him in March 1947. That suit came to be dismissed, as already stated, on the ground that the petitioner was not domiciled in Baroda and, therefore, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit and the Baroda Hindu Code was not applicable to the parties. Nothing was done, and perhaps nothing could be done by the petitioner till the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, came into force. But even then the petitioner waited till April 18, 1956, that is to say, 11 months after the commencement of this Act, before he filed the present petition. The petition contains not a few untruthful statements. It was stated by the petitioner in para. 3 of the petition that the parties were betrothed some time in the beginning of 1946. But there is no dispute now that the betrothal took place some time in June or July 1945. He further stated in the same paragraph that it was at the request of the respondent's father that the marriage was performed in Bombay on March 10, 1947, contrary to the convention of the community that the marriage should be performed at Prantij, whereas the correspondence clearly discloses that the bride's family was anxious to have the marriage performed at Prantij but it was the desire of the petitioner's family that it should be performed at Bombay. In para. 4 it is stated that within 5 or 6 days of the marriage the respondent insisted on going back to her parents' place at Prantij on the pretext that she had to perform certain religious ceremonies and to offer pooja to the family deity at Prantij. There is no evidence on this point and this has not been even put to the respondent in her evidence. In para. 5 it is stated that the respondent had shown marked unwillingness to stay at Gandevi where the petitioner's married sister Sharda-ben lived with her husband one Dr. Champaklal and that the petitioner's father had made an appointment in Bombay with Dr. Purandare for consultation after the respondent's return from Gandevi, but the respondent successfully evaded the appointment by suddenly coming down to Vile Parle and leaving for Prantij. No evidence has been produced in support of this statement. The petitioner has denied in his evidence that he knew that the respondent was pregnant at the time of marriage. In her evidence in examination-in-chief the respondent has also stated that she did not know at the time of marriage that she was pregnant. No objection was taken to this statement, but what is more, cross-examination was pursued on this point and she repeated in her cross-examination that she did not know prior to her marriage that she was pregnant though she stated that the statements contained in the written statement were true and that she had given instructions to her legal advisers for preparing the written statement. In my view, the respondent's written statement does not contain an unqualified admission that she was pregnant at the time of her marriage. It is well settled that admissions must be read as a whole. In *Motabhoj Mulla Essabhoj v. Mulji Haridas*⁸ it was held by the Privy Council that though it was permissible to accept part and to reject part of a witness's testimony, an admission in a pleading cannot be so dissected; if it is made subject to a condition, it must either be accepted subject to the condition or not accepted at all. Mr. Amin contended that in para. 7 and the other paragraphs of the written statement there is an unequivocal admission by the respondent that she was pregnant at the time of marriage. I am not prepared to accept that contention. The defence set up by the respondent was that on entreaties and representations made to the respondent by the petitioner there were sex relations between the petitioner and the respondent before marriage and as a result of such sex relations the respondent conceived through the petitioner, and that statement cannot, in my opinion, be dissected so as to establish an unequivocal admission on the part of the respondent that she was pregnant at the time of marriage. It is nobody's case that there were signs of pregnancy at the time of marriage. The petitioner has denied any knowledge of respondent's pregnancy at the time of marriage and the respondent has also stated that she did not know that she was pregnant at the time of marriage. It is undisputed that Dr. Champaklal, the husband of Shardaben, had examined the respondent in the month of May 1947. He was not examined by the petitioner and a grievance was made about that in the trial Court on behalf of the respondent; but the learned trial Judge was of the view that because of the admission made by the respondent in her written statement there was no necessity for the petitioner to examine any medical expert to prove the fact that she was carrying at the time of marriage. But it has to be remembered that the frame of issue No. 1 was in accordance with the provisions of s. 12 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, namely, "whether the respondent was at the time of the marriage pregnant by someone other than the petitioner, as alleged in para. 9 of the petition". The wording of the issue was not changed in spite of the so-called admission made by the respondent in her written statement and despite the particulars furnished by her. An application for amendment of the written statement to enable the respondent to set up an alternative case that the respondent conceived through the petitioner after marriage was rejected. But Mr. Amin contends that that was rightly rejected because the respondent could not be allowed to make a new case inconsistent with her admissions in the written statement. Mr. Amin argues that under O. VIII, r. 5, of the Civil Procedure Code, it is well settled that both the plaintiff as well as the defendant must be held bound by the statement of facts in their respective pleadings. That undoubtedly is so. But under the proviso to O. VIII, r. 5, the Court may, in its discretion, require any fact admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admission. The proviso to s. 58 of the Evidence Act is also to the same effect and in Over v. Over, which has been already referred to above, Mr. Justice Marten (as he then was) held that s. 58 of the Evidence Act has in general no application to divorce cases.

Mr. Amin argued that we should not allow any amendment at the stage of this appeal because his client would be placed at a great disadvantage if the case were to be sent down now. Now, it is to be remembered that the petition itself has been filed nine years after the marriage, though undoubtedly the petitioner was entitled to file it before May 18, 1956, under s. 12(2)(b)(ii) of the Hindu Marriage Act. It appears from the evidence that the father of the respondent as well as the doctor who treated her at Prantij are dead. Therefore, the hardship, if any, would not be only on the petitioner but also on the respondent. Mr. Amin further contended that the Court must take into consideration the fact that the child was born to the respondent 170 days after the marriage and he argued that medically it would be improbable that the child would live if it was born within such a short period after conception, if the conception took place after marriage. He also drew our attention to the fact that a notice of motion was taken out by the petitioner offering to have a blood-test taken with a view to ascertaining whether the child was a legitimate child, but the same was refused on behalf of the respondent. As against this, our attention was drawn to the case of Clerk v. Clerk,⁹ in which the husband claimed divorce on the ground of wife's adultery, the only evidence of adultery being the fact of the birth of the child, the period of gestation of which could not have exceeded 174 days, if the husband was assumed to be the father. In that case, the child lived, and, at the date of the hearing, was about 3 years old and it was held, on the basis of the medical evidence on the record, that the husband had not discharged the burden of proof in respect of the adultery, and it was sufficiently proved that the child was conceived in wedlock. Reliance was also placed on Dr. Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, twelfth edition, page 307, and Taylor's Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence, eleventh edition, Volume II, page 34, in both of which cases have been given as to the earliest period at which a child may be born. It is the case of the respondent that the child born to her was prematurely born. It is not necessary at this stage to go into this question since no expert evidence was led on this point.

I, therefore, agree that the case should be sent down to the trial Court to record a finding as to whether it was proved that the respondent was pregnant at the time of marriage. It would be open to both the sides to lead such oral and other evidence including expert evidence as they think fit. In the view we have taken, it is not necessary, I think, to grant any formal amendment of the written statement.

It is also somewhat unfortunate that no specific issue was framed in the trial Court under s. 12(2)(b)(ii) of the Hindu Marriage Act requiring the petitioner to prove that there was no marital intercourse with his consent since the discovery by him of the existence of the ground for a decree of nullity, as alleged by him. It appears that the learned trial Judge allowed the respondent's learned advocate to argue that the petitioner as a reasonable man should have known that the wife must have been pregnant by some other person as soon as he came to know from the respondent's letter in April 1947 that she was pregnant, as is apparent from his letter dated April 5, 1947, which advised her an abortion, and the petitioner should not have had sexual intercourse with her at the end of April 1947 before his departure for America, about which intercourse there is no dispute though there is a dispute as to the number of days they lived as husband and wife. This argument was allowed under the general issue No. 5 framed by the trial Court, which was whether the petitioner was entitled to have the marriage declared null and void. In our judgment, a specific issue as contemplated under s. 12(2)(b)(ii) should have been framed, and if that had been framed, the non-examination of Dr. Champaklal, the petitioner's sister's husband, who seems to have examined the respondent in May 1947 at Gandevi would have assumed some significance. Similarly, the non-production of respondent's letters referred to in the petitioner's letters dated April 5 and 8, 1947, would have some relevance in case this issue had been framed. It is not necessary, however, for us to express any opinion on this question at this stage, as we propose to remit to the trial Court that issue also for a finding. On that issue also both the parties will be allowed to lead such evidence as they wish to produce.

I agree, therefore, with the order proposed by my learned brother.

GANGADHAR RAKHAMAJI JADHAV v. MANJULA GANGADHAR JADHAV^c

Hindu Marriage Act (XXV of 1955), Secs. 28, 3(b)—Bombay Civil Courts Act (Bom. XIV of 1869), Sec. 8—Civil Judge, Senior Division, notified as having jurisdiction in matters dealt with in Act—Decree passed by such Judge in petition for divorce or judicial separation—Appeal against such decree whether lies to District Court or High Court.

When a Court of Civil Judge, Senior Division, notified by the State Government as having jurisdiction in respect of matters dealt with in the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, passes a decree in a petition under the Act, an appeal against the decree lies to the District Court of the district and not to the High Court.

S. B. Bhasme, for the appellant.

V. D. Malpani and V. J. Thaveri, for the respondent.

V. S. DESAI J. This petition for a decree for divorce or judicial separation under the provisions of the Hindu Marriage Act of 1955 was filed by the petitioner Gangadhar Rakhmajji Jadhav in the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, at Ahmednagar. The petitioner alleged that he married the opponent in the year 1943 but that the opponent after having lived with him for four years had deliberately deserted him since 1948 and was living in adultery. The petition was opposed by the opponent. She denied desertion on her part and denied that she was living in adultery as alleged by the petitioner. She contended that she was living peacefully with the petitioner till 1953, but that some time about November 11, 1954, it was the husband who beat her and drove her out of the house. The petition was dismissed by the learned Civil Judge, Senior Division, Ahmednagar, on December 31, 1957, holding that the allegations on which the petition was founded were not proved. The petitioner has, therefore, filed the present appeal from this decision and decree passed by the lower Court, under s. 28 of the Hindu Marriage Act.

The first question to be considered is whether the appeal to this Court is competent. As has already been stated, the petition was filed in the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, at Ahmednagar, and the decision and decree appealed from is of the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division. Section 28 of the Hindu Marriage Act, which provides for the appeals to be filed, states:

"All decrees and orders made by the Court in any proceeding under this Act shall be enforced in like manner as the decrees and orders of the Court made in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction are enforced, and may be appealed from under any law for the time being in force."

Now, the "law for the time being in force" for determining the forum of appeal is the Bombay Civil Courts Act. Under s. 8 of that Act an appeal from the decree or order of a Civil Judge, Senior Division, lies to the District Court except in the case of decisions in suits where the amount or value of the subject-matter exceeds ten thousand rupees. Under the Bombay Civil Courts

^c*Decided, October 29, 1958. First Appeal No. Civil Judge, Senior Division, Ahmednagar, in 234 of 1958, against the decision of P. K. Kute, Miscellaneous Application No. 101 of 1956.*

Act, a District Court is presided over by a District Judge and is the principal Court of original civil jurisdiction in the district within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the present case, the decree having been passed by the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, of Ahmednagar, in a petition under the Hindu Marriage Act, the appeal should lie to the District Court of Ahmednagar.

Mr. Bhasme, who appears for the appellant, however, contends that under the provisions of the Hindu Marriage Act the Court of a Civil Judge, Senior Division, having jurisdiction in respect of matters dealt with in the Hindu Marriage Act is a "District Court" as defined in s. 3(b) of the Act and in view of the meaning which the definition in s. 3(b) gives to the expression "District Court" an appeal from an order or decree of the Court must lie to the High Court. A petition for judicial separation lies to the District Court under s. 10 of the Act and a petition for divorce as provided by s. 13 of the Act also lies to the District Court. The expression "District Court" is defined in s. 3(b) of the Hindu Marriage Act as meaning

"in any area for which there is a City Civil Court that Court, and in any other area the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction" and as including

"any other civil Court which may be specified by the State Government, by notification in the Official Gazette, as having jurisdiction in respect of matters dealt with in the Act."

By a notification No. HMA-1055/52067 published in the Official Gazette on September 1, 1955, the Courts of Civil Judges, Senior Division, in the State have been notified as having jurisdiction in respect of matters dealt with in the Hindu Marriage Act within their respective jurisdictions. Mr. Bhasme argues that under the definition given in s. 3(b) of the Hindu Marriage Act the District Court means the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction in any given area; thus in areas where there is a City Civil Court it is that Court, and in any other area it is the District Court as understood under the Civil Procedure Code as also under the Bombay Civil Courts Act. By reason of the inclusive part of the definition in s. 3(b), says Mr. Bhasme, an inferior civil Court when notified by the State Government as having jurisdiction in respect of matters dealt with in the Act comes to be included within the meaning of the term "district court" as defined by the earlier part of the definition. Mr. Bhasme, therefore, argues that when a Court of Civil Judge, Senior Division, having jurisdiction under the Hindu Marriage Act, decides a petition for judicial separation or divorce, its decree must be regarded as that of a District Court, i.e., of a principal civil Court of original jurisdiction in the district, and since under the Bombay Civil Courts Act the appeal from the District Court, which is the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction, lies to the High Court, the appeal from the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, must also lie to the High Court. We cannot accept this argument of Mr. Bhasme. The definition of the expression "district court" given in s. 3(b) of the Hindu Marriage Act says which Courts are meant and included within that expression as used in the Act. It says that by the expression "district court" are meant in the first place a City Civil Court in the area in which there is such a Court and in any other area the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction. The principal civil Court of original jurisdiction in the areas which are districts is the Court of the District Judge of the District. Thus under this part of the definition all City Civil Courts and all Courts of the District Judges have jurisdiction to deal with matters under the Hindu Marriage Act. The definition then proceeds to say that in addition to these Courts other civil Courts will also be included in the expression "district court" if such other civil Courts are notified by the State Government in the Official Gazette as having jurisdiction in respect of matters dealt with in the Act. Thus under the expression "district court" as used in the Hindu Marriage Act come all City Civil Courts, all Courts of District Judges of the districts and also other civil Courts notified by the State Government in the manner provided. It is not correct to say, as contended by Mr. Bhasme, that any civil Court in the district other than the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction, when notified by the State Government as having jurisdiction in matters dealt with under the Hindu Marriage Act, becomes a "district court" as meaning the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction for the purposes of the Hindu Marriage Act by virtue of the definition given in s. 3(b). It is the Court to which petitions under the Hindu Marriage Act lie and which has jurisdiction in respect of matters dealt with in the Act. Since in the various provisions of the Act the Court which has jurisdiction in matters dealt with in the said provisions is referred to as the "district court" the inclusive part of the definition says that civil Courts other than the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction when notified by the Government will be included within the expression "district court" as used in the Act. The Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, therefore, which is notified by the State Government as having jurisdiction in matters dealt with under the Hindu Marriage Act, is a "district court" within the definition of s. 3(b) of the Hindu Marriage Act, but it is not the principal civil Court of original jurisdiction, nor does it exercise its jurisdiction as such principal civil Court of original jurisdiction. Section 28 of the Hindu Marriage Act leaves the forum of appeal to be determined under the law for the time being in force which, in the present case, is the Bombay Civil Courts Act. The forum of appeal from the order or decree of the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, under the Bombay Civil Courts Act is the Court of the District Judge of the District. In the present case, therefore, which was decided by the Civil Judge, Senior Division, the appeal lies to the Court of the District Judge and not to the High Court.

We, therefore, hold that the appeal filed in this Court is not maintainable and direct that the appeal memo and the papers filed with it be returned to the appellant for presentation to the proper Court. The appellant will pay the costs of the respondent in this Court.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report.]

Order accordingly.

CRIMINAL REVISION.

Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar.

BUDHMAL FOJMAL MARWADI v. THE STATE.*

Prevention of Food Adulteration Act (Bom. XXXVIII of 1954), Secs. 7, 16(1)(a), 2(1)(a), 25(2)—Servant selling adulterated article of food in absence of master—Whether master can be convicted of offence under s. 16(1)(a).

Under s. 7 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954, the master is liable for the acts of his servant committed by him in the course of his ordinary duties, and when a servant sells any commodity or any article of food stocked for sale by the master of the shop, the master is deemed to have authorised the sale of such article by the servant. Therefore if the servant sells any such article of food which is adulterated within the meaning of s. 2(1)(a) of the Act, the master, though not present when the sale is made, can be convicted of an offence under s. 16(1)(a) of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

*Decided, November 4, 1958. Criminal Revision Application No. 1192 of 1958, from the orders of D. G. Gagne, Additional Sessions Judge, Thana, in Criminal Appeal No. 100 of 1958, confirming the order of conviction and sentence passed by M. A. Shaikh, Judicial Magistrate, First Class, III Court, Thana, in Criminal Case No. 2052 of 1956.

MUDHOLKAR J. The applicant has been convicted by the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Third Court, Thana, of an offence under s. 16(1)(a) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954, and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 200. His appeal from the conviction and sentence was dismissed by the Additional Sessions Judge, Thana.

It is common ground that Food Inspector Shimpi of Thana went to the shop of the applicant on July 12, 1956, and purchased 3/8th seer of Belgaum ghee for Re. 1-4-0 after informing the applicant's servant Fulchand Faujmal, who was on duty in the shop at the time, that he intended to send a sample of the ghee for analysis to the Public Analyst. He then divided the ghee into three samples, one of which was given to Fulchand, one was sent to the Public Analyst and the third was kept by the Inspector himself. The report of the Public Analyst showed that the sample of ghee contained 21.86 per cent. foreign fat. After obtaining the requisite sanction of the Administrator of the Thana Borough Municipality, the Inspector filed the complaint in question.

It is contended on behalf of the applicant that the complaint as it was originally filed is bad in law because it was based upon a sanction which stated that the name of the accused was Budhmal Kantilal. Now it may be mentioned that the applicant trades in the name of Budhmal Kantilal and that is how the mistake had occurred. Later when the mistake that the applicant's name was not Budhmal Kantilal but Budhmal Foujmal was discovered, the complainant had the name corrected. It is contended, however, on the applicant's behalf that the original sanction was in the name of a wrong person and therefore it could not be rectified, nor could a complaint filed on the basis of such a sanction be held to be in proper form. In my opinion, there is no substance in this contention. There was merely an error in specifying the name of the applicant and that is all. At no time was Shimpi in doubt as to whom he wanted to prosecute.

It is then contended that the applicant not being present at the time of the actual sale of the ghee, he was not liable to be prosecuted. The learned counsel for the applicant, referring to the decision of the Privy Council in *Shrinivas Mall Bairoliya v. Emperor*¹ and three other decisions following this decision, contended that an offence under the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act being of a serious nature and being liable to be punished by a substantial sentence of imprisonment, it is necessary for the prosecution to establish mens rea and he says that as the applicant admittedly was not present when the sale was made, he cannot be convicted under s. 16(1)(a) of the Act. It is, no doubt, true that in offences which are punishable with substantial sentences of imprisonment, mens rea would have ordinarily to be established by the prosecution. But that does not mean that the Legislature is incompetent to make a law whereunder an offender will be liable to suffer even a long term of imprisonment though mens rea is not established. Now, s. 7 of the Act is in the following terms:—

“Prohibition of manufacture, sale etc., of certain articles of food:

No person shall himself or by any person on his behalf manufacture for sale, or store, sell or distribute:—

(1) any adulterated food;...”

Upon a plain reading of this section, it appears that the master is liable even for the acts of his servant, i.e. he is vicariously liable. It is, however, contended on behalf of the applicant that this section has to be read along with s. 16 and that the two sections should be construed in a harmonious way. If they are construed according to the learned counsel, it would mean that for the master to be liable for the act of the servant, it would have to be established that the Act was done by the servant in the presence of the master. It seems to me that this would be importing something in the section which is quite foreign to the object of the section. Apart from that, I am of the opinion that under

s. 7 the master would be liable for the acts of his servant committed by him in the course of his ordinary duties, and that when a servant sells any commodity or any article of food stocked for sale by the master of the shop, the master will be deemed to have authorised the sale of such article by the servant, and if it turns out that that article is adulterated within the meaning of s. 2(i) (a) of the Act, the master will also be liable.

Lastly, it was contended that ghee or pure ghee was not defined by the rules which were promulgated in the year 1955 under the provisions of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, and that the mere fact that the ghee purchased by Shimpi was found to contain 21 per cent. of foreign fat would not render the applicant liable under s. 16(1) (a) of the Act. Now, the word "adulterated" has been defined in s. 2(i) of the Act. It will not be necessary to refer to the entire definition, but it will suffice to refer to cl. (a) thereof, which is as under:—

"(i) "adulterated"—an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated—

(a) if the article sold by a vendor is not of the nature, substance or quality demanded by the purchaser and is to his prejudice, or is not of the nature, substance or quality which it purports or is represented to be;"

Now, here what was intended to be purchased was pure ghee. But what has been sold was ghee which contained 21 per cent. of foreign fat. It is true that ghee has not been defined, but pure ghee must on the face of it be deemed to exclude foreign fat. It is, however, said that the Food Inspector only asked for Belgaum ghee and it is possible that Belgaum ghee may usually contain foreign fat. The tin out of which the sample was taken bears a label which says that it contains "pure ghee". From this it would follow that what was intended to be sold and intended to be purchased was pure ghee, though in fact it was not pure ghee but adulterated ghee. Section 7 of the Act prohibits the sale of any adulterated food. Section 16 makes the sale of adulterated food punishable at law. Therefore, apart from the reasons given by the learned Additional Sessions Judge, it must be held that the applicant is liable to be punished under s. 16 of the Act for the sale of adulterated ghee by his servant.

The learned Additional Sessions Judge has held that, though the expression "ghee" has not been defined under the rules made under the present Act, the definition contained in the rules made under the Act of 1925 still holds good. According to the learned counsel for the applicant, by virtue of the provisions of s. 25 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954, the rules framed under the Act of 1925 stood repealed immediately after the promulgation of the rules made under the present Act. These rules were promulgated in September 1955 before the alleged offence was committed. Therefore, according to the learned counsel, the definition contained in the rules framed under the old Act cannot be looked into. Now, sub-s. (2) of s. 25 of the new Act is in the following terms:—

"Notwithstanding the repeal by this Act of any corresponding law all rules, regulations and bye-laws relating to the prevention of adulteration of food, made under such corresponding law and in force immediately before the commencement of this Act shall, except where and so far as they are inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of this Act, continue in force until altered, amended or repealed by rules made under this Act."

From this it would follow that only such rules made under the old Act will cease to be in force as are inconsistent with or are repugnant with the provisions of the rules framed in 1955 or have been altered, amended or repealed by the rules made under the present Act. As a matter of fact, in the rules promulgated in September 1955 "ghee" was not defined. Therefore, it is correct to say that the rule made under the old Act in respect of this matter was not altered by rules made under the repealed Act. Therefore, it continued to be in force even subsequent to 1955. I am informed by counsel that "ghee" has now been defined by a rule made by the rule-making authority. If that is so, after the coming into force of that rule, the definition contained in the rule made under the Act of 1925 will cease to be operative. "Ghee" is defined in r. 2(ix) of the rules framed under the Act of 1925 as follows:—

"'Ghee' means ghee prepared exclusively from the milk fat of the cow or buffalo or both."

Now admittedly the ghee which was sold by the applicant's servant could not be said to be "pure ghee" under this definition inasmuch as it contained 21 per cent. of foreign fat.

There is thus no substance in the application and it is accordingly dismissed. The rule is discharged.

Rule discharged.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Acting Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Shelat.

NARAYAN GANPATI PATIL v. THE STATE.*

Indian Evidence Act (1 of 1872), Secs. 157—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 288—Evidence of witness given in committing Magistrate's Court brought on record in Sessions Court under s. 288 of Code—Whether such evidence "testimony" within s. 157 of Indian Evidence Act—Corroboration of such evidence.

The evidence of a witness given in the committing Magistrate's Court which is brought on record in the Sessions Court under s. 288 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, stands on exactly the same footing as evidence given in the Sessions Court and it would be "testimony" within the meaning of s. 157 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, which could be corroborated under s. 157.

CHAINANI Actg. C.J. This is an appeal by accused Nos. 8 and 9 against their convictions under ss. 148 and 307 read with s. 149 of the Indian Penal Code and s. 19(e) of the Indian Arms Act and the sentences passed upon them for these offences. These accused as well as the other eight accused, who were tried along with them, are residents of Kavathe Piran. Witness Tukaram also belonged to this village. About 7-8 years ago there was a quarrel between Tukaram and father of accused No. 5. Since then there was enmity between Tukaram and the accused. Tukaram was also beaten on two occasions. As Tukaram was afraid of living in the village thereafter, he left Kavathe Piran and went to reside at Bhadule in Kolhapur district. On May 5, 1957, Tukaram returned to his village as he had some work in connection with his lands with the Talathi. In the afternoon of that day, Tukaram went to a cloth shop known as Patil Cloth Stores. The prosecution story is that, while he was sitting on a chair in that shop, the ten accused went there. Some of the accused dragged Tukaram outside the shop and he was then assaulted with a scythe by accused Nos. 1, 2 and 5. Accused Nos. 3, 8 and 9 were armed with rifles. They pointed these rifles at the crowd, which had gathered there and prevented anybody from going to the rescue of Tukaram. After Tukaram fell down on the ground, the accused ran away. In the meantime the manager of the cloth shop telephoned to the police station that a 'maramari' was going on in front of his shop and that Tukaram was being beaten with a scythe. A police party was immediately sent to the scene of offence. They found Tukaram lying injured on the ground. Tukaram was then removed to the Civil Hospital. Another police party was returning from a raid about the same time. They saw accused Nos. 1 to 7 running away. Immediately afterwards shouts were heard from the crowd that the persons, who were running away, had committed a murder. Sub-Inspector Bhosale, who was in charge of this party, rounded up these accused and put them in a police van and took them to the police station. As Tukaram's condition was considered to be serious, arrangements were made for his dying declaration being recorded. It was recorded by witness Thorat, Special Executive Magistrate, Sangli. In that statement Tukaram implicated accused Nos. 1 to 4, 8 and 9. He stated that three of them, accused Nos. 3, 8 and 9, were armed with rifles. Thereafter the Sub-Inspector recorded Tukaram's statement (exh. 6-B), which has been treated as the first information of the offence. In that statement also Tukaram implicated the same accused and accused No. 10. Attempts were then made to trace the two appellants, accused Nos. 8 and 9. They could not be found in the village until May 17, 1957, on which date they were arrested. Accused No. 10 was arrested subsequently. Thereafter all the accused were sent up for trial for committing offences punishable under ss. 147, 148 and 307 read with s. 149 of the Indian Penal Code. The appellants and accused No. 3 were also charged under s. 19(e) of the Indian Arms Act. All the accused pleaded not guilty to these charges. The appellants denied their presence at the scene of offence and stated that they had been falsely involved. The learned trial Judge came to the conclusion that the charges had been satisfactorily proved against the two appellants and accused Nos. 1 to 5. He, therefore, convicted these accused under ss. 148 and 307 read with s. 149 of the Penal Code. The two appellants were also convicted under s. 19(e) of the Indian Arms Act. The other three accused Nos. 6, 7 and 10 were acquitted by him.

[His Lordship, after dealing with some evidence in this case, proceeded.] The next and the most important question to be considered is whether the two appellants, accused Nos. 8 and 9, were members of this unlawful assembly and whether they were armed with rifles at that time. Practically all the material witnesses, including Tukaram himself, turned hostile in the Sessions Court. The prosecution, therefore, brought on record the evidence of Tukaram given in the Committing Magistrate's Court under s. 288 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In his evidence in that Court Tukaram has stated that accused Nos. 8 and 9 and accused No. 3 were armed with rifles at the time of the offence and that they were intimidating the other persons and preventing them from rescuing him. He has also stated that witness Baburao had gone to his rescue but that he had been pushed aside by these accused. Tukaram resiled from this evidence in the Sessions Court. In his evidence in the Sessions Court he stated that he had been beaten by some unknown persons and that accused Nos. 1 to 5 and the two appellants had gone to his rescue. Even in his evidence in the Sessions Court, therefore, he stated that the appellants were present at the time of the offence, but his story was that they had gone to rescue him and not in order to assault him. The learned trial Judge did not accept the evidence given by Tukaram in the Sessions Court. He believed the evidence given by him in the Committing Magistrate's Court, which, according to him, was corroborated by the first information and the statement of Tukaram recorded by the Executive Magistrate and the evidence of two witnesses Shankerlal and Mangilal.

[His Lordship then dealt with points not material to this report and proceeded.]

As I have mentioned, Tukaram's dying declaration was recorded by the Magistrate, as his condition was considered to be very serious. In this statement (exh. 34A) Tukaram stated that the two appellants and accused No. 8 were armed with guns and that they had pointed these guns at the crowd and stopped all traffic on the road. This statement is not admissible in evidence as a dying declaration, as Tukaram has survived the injuries received by him. The learned Government Pleader has urged that this statement is admissible under s. 157 of the Indian Evidence Act in order to corroborate the evidence given by Tukaram in the Committing Magistrate's Court. Section 157 provides that in order to corroborate the testimony of a witness, any former statement made by such witness relating to the same fact at or about the time when the fact took place may be proved. This section is contained in Chapter X, the heading of which is "Of the examination of witnesses". Section 135, which is the first section in this Chapter, deals with the order in which witnesses may be examined. Sections 137 and 138 provide for the manner in which a witness may be examined. Sections 141 to 143 relate to questions, which may be put to witnesses, when they are being examined. Section 145 provides for the manner in which a witness's evidence may be contradicted by reference to his previous statements. These and other provisions in this Chapter, which also contains s. 157, have been relied upon by Mr. Paranjape in support of his argument that the words "testimony of a witness" in s. 157 mean the evidence of the witness given at the trial of the case, in which he is examined as a witness and not any statement made by him before the trial. We might perhaps have been inclined to accept this argument, if the question had to be decided by reference to s. 157 only. In this case, however, it is also necessary to consider s. 288 of the Criminal Procedure Code. This section provides that the evidence of a witness duly recorded in the presence of the accused under Chap. XVIII, i.e. in committal proceedings, may, in the discretion of the presiding Judge, if such witness is produced and examined, be treated as evidence in the case for all purposes subject to the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872. As observed by the Supreme Court in Tara Singh v. The State,¹ this section imports into the law of evidence something which is not to be found in the Evidence Act, viz. to make a statement of this kind substantive evidence. Consequently the evidence of a witness given in the Committing Magistrate's Court is, if it is brought on record in the Sessions Court under s. 288, to be treated as if it was evidence given in the Sessions Court. It stands on exactly the same footing as evidence given in the Sessions Court. It would, therefore, be "testimony" within the meaning of s. 157 of the Indian Evidence Act.

Mr. Paranjape has relied on the decision of this Court in Emperor v. Akbar Badoo.² In that case at p. 602 it was observed that only the statements of witnesses made to the trying Court can be corroborated in the manner contemplated by s. 157 of the Indian Evidence Act and that previous statements could be used to corroborate or contradict statements made at the trial, but not to corroborate statements made prior to the trial. The judgment contains no reasons for so limiting the meaning of the word "testimony" in s. 157. This case was decided in 1910. Since then s. 288 has been amended and the words "for all purposes subject to the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872" were added in 1923. Under the section as amended, the deposition of a witness given in the Committing Magistrate's Court is, after its admission under s. 288, to be treated as evidence for all purposes, that is as if it was evidence given in the trial Court. It is therefore also evidence, which can be corroborated under s. 157 of the Indian Evidence Act. This is also the view, which has been taken by the Calcutta High Court in Manar Ali v. Emperor.³ In that case it was held that the object of s. 288 is to place a deposition in the committal enquiry on exactly the same footing as the deposition in the Sessions Court, that the deposition before the Committing Magistrate put in under s. 288 is substantive evidence in a case, that the credibility of the statement before the Committing Magistrate's Court must be considered and tested in the same way as the one made in the Sessions Court and that consequently the statement made by a witness before a Magistrate under s. 164 of the Code is admissible in evidence to corroborate the statement put in under s. 288. With respect, we agree with the view taken by the Calcutta High Court.

The statement of Tukaram, exh. 34-A, recorded by the Executive Magistrate, is, therefore, admissible in evidence for the purpose of corroborating the evidence given by him before the Committing Magistrate's Court.

CRIMINAL REVISION.

Before Mr. Justice Gokhale and Mr. Justice Miahboy.

C. M. TRIVEDI v. C. B. L. BHATNAGAR.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 198-B, 198—Complaint filed by Public Prosecutor alone under s. 198-B in Court of Session—Validity of such complaint—Jurisdiction of Court to take cognizance of complaint—Effect of s. 198-B(13).

A Court of Session can take cognizance of a complaint filed by the Public Prosecutor under s. 198-B of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, notwithstanding the fact that the public servant aggrieved by the alleged defamation has not joined in the complaint.

The effect of s. 198-B(13) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, is that the right of any public servant to file a complaint about an offence of defamation under s. 198 of the Code is not taken away by virtue of s. 198-B of the Code.

Bhatnagar v. State of Bombay,¹ referred to, and the view therein expressed that a complaint under s. 198-B should be a complaint made both by the person aggrieved and the Public Prosecutor, disapproved.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

C. C. Vaidya, Assistant Government Pleader, for the petitioner.
Opponent in person.

GOKHALE J. A question as to the interpretation to be placed on the provisions of sub-s. (13) of s. 198B of the Code of Criminal Procedure has been raised in this revision application on behalf of the Public Prosecutor for Greater Bombay, who is the petitioner in this application. The revision has come to be filed in the following circumstances:

On March 20, 1958, the Public Prosecutor for Greater Bombay, Mr. C. M. Trivedi, filed a complaint against the opponent under s. 198B of the Code of Criminal Procedure, alleging that the opponent had published a defamatory article in the issue of a weekly, named "Congress" dated September 23, 1957, and thereby committed an offence of defamation against a public servant by name J. B. Contractor, who is a Selection Grade Sub-Inspector of Police. The complaint bears an endorsement of the same date to the effect that it was filed before the Registrar, City Sessions Court, Bombay. On March 31, 1958, the Court of the Additional Sessions Judge for Greater Bombay ordered the issue of a bailable warrant against the opponent in the sum of Rs. 1,000 with one surety for a like amount, the returnable date given being April 23, 1958. The opponent applied for and obtained copies of the complaint, as also of the orders passed by the Additional Sessions Judge, the Government sanction and the warrant of arrest, on April 5, 1958. On April 7, 1958, he gave a notice to the Public Prosecutor that he proposed to move the Sessions Court on April 23, 1958, for the dismissal of the said complaint as the Court of Session had no

*Decided, November 16, 1958. Criminal Revision Application No. 1055 of 1956, against the order of dismissal passed by B.C. Vakil, jurisdiction to entertain it. On April 18, 1958, he filed a statement in Court raising several grounds which, according to him, would not entitle the Court to entertain the complaint made by the Public Prosecutor. In the first instance, he contended that the Public Prosecutor had not personally appeared before the Sessions Judge and verified the complaint. It was next contended that the copy of the complaint should have been served upon him with the warrant of arrest, which was not done. He also complained that no list of prosecution witnesses was filed by the prosecution along with the complaint, as required by s. 204(1A) of the Criminal Procedure Code. But his principal grievance was that the complaint had been made by the Public Prosecutor alone and the person aggrieved by the alleged defamation, namely, J. B. Contractor, the Selection Grade Sub-Inspector of Police, had not joined him in filing the complaint, and as such the Sessions Court had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the complaint under the special provisions of s. 198B of the Criminal Procedure Code without commitment.

All the first three objections raised by the opponent were negatived by the learned Additional Sessions Judge, but he upheld the objection of the opponent as regards the non-joinder of the aggrieved party in the complaint and following a decision of this Court in Criminal Revision Application No. 1542 of 1956 decided by Mr. Justice Bavdekar on March 29, 1957, which is subsequently reported in Bhatnagar v. State of Bombay,¹ the trial Court dismissed the complaint on the ground that it had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the complaint, to entertain it and try it. It was further directed that the opponent should be discharged and his bail bond cancelled. It is against this decision that the present revision application has been filed by the Public Prosecutor for Greater Bombay.

It may be mentioned that on behalf of the opponent the points which have been decided against him by the learned Additional Sessions Judge have not been argued before us, and the only point that has been agitated in this revision is whether the Additional Sessions Judge could not take cognizance of the complaint filed by the petitioner under s. 198B of the Code of Criminal Procedure, since the aggrieved person against whom the alleged defamatory article was said to have been published had not joined in the complaint. For examining this argument which has been urged before us, it would be necessary to consider briefly the relevant provisions of s. 198B of the Code. But before I deal with the provisions of that section, I may refer to the provisions of s. 198 of the Code, which provides that no Court can take cognizance of an offence falling under Chap. XIX or Chapter XXI of the Indian Penal Code or under ss. 493 to 496 (both inclusive) of the same Code, except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence. It is not necessary to refer to the two provisos to this section for the purpose of this revision application. Now, s. 198B(1) runs as follows:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Code, when any offence falling under Chapter XXI of the Indian Penal Code (other than the offence of defamation by spoken words) is alleged to have been committed against the President, or the Vice-President, or the Governor or Rajpramukh of a State, or a Minister, or any other public servant employed in connection with the affairs of the Union or of a State, in respect of his conduct in the discharge of his public functions, a Court of Session may take cognizance of such offence, without the accused being committed to it for trial, upon a complaint in writing made by the Public Prosecutor."

Section 198B was inserted in the Criminal Procedure Code by the amending Act XXVI of 1955. Sub-section (1) of s. 198B deals with the subject of prosecution for defamation against public servants in respect of their conduct in the discharge of public functions. It excludes from its ambit the offence of defamation by spoken words, but as regards other kinds of defamation it provides that when such an offence is alleged to have been committed against the President, or the Vice-President, or the Governor or Rajpramukh of a State, or a Minister, or any other public servant employed in connection with the affairs of the Union or of a State, in respect of his conduct in the discharge of public functions, the Court of Session is empowered to take cognizance of such offence, upon a complaint in writing by the Public Prosecutor without the necessity of the accused being committed to that Court. Under s. 193(1) of the Code, except as otherwise expressly provided by the Code or by any other law for the time being in force, no Court of Session shall take cognizance of any offence as a Court of original jurisdiction unless the accused has been committed to it by a Magistrate duly empowered in that behalf. Section 198B(1) would, therefore, appear to provide an exception to s. 193 of the Code, because it enables the Court of Session to take cognizance of the offence of defamation against public servants upon a complaint in writing made by the Public Prosecutor without the accused being required to face committal proceedings. Under s. 198, as we have already seen, before a Court can take cognizance of an offence of defamation or other offences mentioned in that section, a complaint must be made by some person aggrieved by such offence. But s. 198B(1) provides that the Court of Session may take cognizance of an offence of defamation other than by spoken words upon a complaint in writing made by the Public Prosecutor. The question for consideration in this case is whether in spite of the provisions of s. 198B(1), the Court of Session would not be competent to take cognizance of such offence upon a complaint made in writing by the Public Prosecutor alone, if the public servant aggrieved by the alleged defamation does not join in the complaint.

The argument urged on behalf of the petitioner is that sub-s. (1) of s. 198B starts with the non-obstante clause "Notwithstanding anything contained in this Code" and, therefore, this sub-section is an exception also to s. 198, but in view of sub-s. (13), the aggrieved party is not deprived of his right to file a complaint under s. 198. As against this, it is urged on behalf of the opponent that under sub-s. (13) of s. 198B it is provided that the provisions of this section shall be in addition to, and not in derogation of those of s. 198; and, therefore, it is urged that though no doubt a Court of Session may take cognizance of a complaint under s. 198B without the necessity of any prior committal proceedings, a complaint made in writing by the Public Prosecutor alone would not be sufficient to invest the Court of Session with jurisdiction, but the aggrieved party must also join in such a complaint so as to make it his complaint also as required by s. 198 of the Code. As I have already stated, the objection urged on behalf of the opponent was accepted by the trial Court, reliance being placed on the ruling of this Court in Bhatnagar v. State of Bombay. Now, the facts in that case were that a criminal complaint was filed by the State of Bombay at the instance of one M. S. Prasad, an Income-tax Officer, against Bhatnagar, the present opponent, in respect of an article published by the latter in a weekly magazine known as "Bombay City". That complaint was filed under s. 500 of the Indian Penal Code read with s. 198B of the Criminal Procedure Code and was solemnly affirmed by M. S. Prasad, and at the foot of the affirmation were two unsigned remarks, viz., that the complaint was drawn by the Public Prosecutor for Greater Bombay and that M. S. Prasad, Income-tax Officer, would be the witness in respect of this complaint. An objection was raised to the competence of this complaint on behalf of the opponent on the ground that it was not a complaint in writing made by the Public Prosecutor as required by s. 198B of the Code and, therefore, the Sessions Court would have no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the offence without the necessary committal proceedings. That objection was rejected by the Sessions Court. The opponent came in revision and Mr. Justice Bavdekar held that in the circumstances of the case the act of making the complaint was not the act of the Public Prosecutor and, therefore, as the complaint was not made by the Public Prosecutor as required under s. 198B of the Code, the Sessions Judge could not take cognizance of the offence. In arriving at this decision, the learned Judge made certain observations which are principally relied upon by the opponent in this case in support of his contention that the present complaint is also incompetent. Those observations are as follows (p. 366) :—

"...What s. 198B(13) consequently means, when it says that the provisions of s. 198-B shall be in addition to, and not in derogation of the provisions of s. 198, is that any complaint which may be made under s. 198B must also satisfy the provisions of s. 198, that is, the complaint will have to be made both by the person aggrieved and by the Public Prosecutor. I do not think that the language that the provisions of s. 198B shall be in addition to, and not in derogation of those of s. 198 would be the correct language to use, if all that was intended was that it was not to be regarded that s. 198B so to speak repeals s. 198, or that a complaint for defamation could not be made even to a Magistrate by the person aggrieved without the intervention of the Public Prosecutor."

Relying on these observations, it is contended before us by the opponent that in view of Mr. Justice Baydekar's decision in that case that by reason of the provisions of sub-s. (13) of s. 198B the complaint will have to be made both by the person aggrieved as well as by the Public Prosecutor if the Sessions Court is to be competent to take cognizance of the offence of defamation under s. 198B(1), the trial Court was justified in dismissing the present complaint. Now, as I have already stated, the facts in the case before Mr. Justice Baydekar were different. In that case, the complaint was solemnly affirmed by the aggrieved party, but it was not the complaint in writing made by the Public Prosecutor because all that was stated in the endorsement was that the complaint was drawn by the Public Prosecutor for Greater Bombay and that endorsement was an unsigned endorsement. With respect, therefore, in our opinion, Mr. Justice Baydekar was right when he held that it was not a complaint filed within s. 198B(1) as it was not a complaint in writing made by the Public Prosecutor. The question whether in view of the provisions of sub-s. (13) of s. 198B such a complaint will have to be made by both the person aggrieved as well as by the Public Prosecutor did not really fall to be considered in that case. But since the learned Judge has made an observation that in view of the provisions of sub-s. (13) of s. 198B the complaint must be made by the person aggrieved as well as by the Public Prosecutor, before the Court of Session can take cognizance of the complaint, and since this point has directly arisen in this revision, we must examine the correctness of this view.

Now, there can be no dispute that s. 198B was inserted in the Code of Criminal Procedure in 1955 by Parliament providing for special procedure with regard to prosecutions for defamation against public servants. Under sub-s. (1) of that section, as already stated, the Court of Session can take cognizance of such offence without prior committal proceedings, as required under s. 193 of the Code. Sub-section (1) of s. 198B itself provides for an exception in case of defamation by spoken words, the complaint in respect of which would, therefore, be governed by s. 198. Further, the alleged defamation must be in respect of the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions. Under sub-s. (3), a complaint made by the Public Prosecutor under sub-s. (1) must be made with the previous sanction of the authorities mentioned in that sub-section. Where the alleged defamation is in the case of the President or the Vice-President or the Governor of a State, the previous sanction of the Secretary to the Government authorised by the persons concerned will have to be obtained under cl. (a) of sub-s. (3). Under cl. (b), in the case of a Minister of the Central Government or of a State Government, the previous sanction is to be obtained of the Secretary to the Council of Ministers, if any, or of any Secretary to the Government authorised in this behalf by the Government concerned. Under cl. (c), in the case of any other public servant employed in connection with the affairs of the Union or of a State, the previous sanction of the Government concerned has to be obtained. Sub-section (4) of s. 198B provides a period of limitation within which a complaint contemplated by s. 198B has to be made and it is provided that no

Court of Session shall take cognizance of an offence under sub-s. (1) unless the complaint is made within six months from the date on which the offence is alleged to have been committed. Under sub-s. (5), it is further provided that notwithstanding anything contained in the Code, the Court of Session shall try the case without a jury and in trying the case, shall follow the procedure prescribed for the trial by Magistrates of warrant cases instituted otherwise than on a police report and the person against whom the offence is alleged to have been committed shall, unless the Court of Session, for reasons to be recorded otherwise directs, be examined as a witness for the prosecution. So that the accused in every case can test the correctness of the accusations made against him by cross-examining the aggrieved party. Regarding the provisions for awarding compensation, exception is made in the case of very high dignitaries of the State like the President, Vice-President or the Governor or Rajpramukh of a State; but as regards other public servants, if the accusation is found to be false and either frivolous or vexatious, then compensation can be granted. It would appear, therefore, from these provisions that though the complaint itself is made by the Public Prosecutor, in case it is found to be false and either frivolous or vexatious, the accused when discharged will be able to get compensation from the person aggrieved, at whose instance possibly the complaint may have come to be made. The complaint made by the Public Prosecutor under s. 198B would not be a complaint of the aggrieved party though it may be a complaint at the instance of the aggrieved party. In inserting this section, the Legislature apparently seems to have been inspired with the object of enabling the State to maintain and uphold the purity of public administration by prescribing a special and speedier procedure for high dignitaries of the State and other public servants to have their conduct cleared when defamatory statements are made in respect of their conduct in the discharge of public functions. The question is whether this object is likely to be fulfilled if it is further required that in such a complaint made by the Public Prosecutor the party aggrieved must also join. It is true that under sub-s. (13) of s. 198B, the provisions of s. 198B are to be in addition to, and not in derogation of, those of s. 198. In our opinion, the Legislature seems to have made it clear by enacting sub-s. (13) that the provisions of s. 198B would be an alternative provision to s. 198, so that the right of any public servant to file a complaint about an offence of defamation under s. 198 is not taken away by virtue of s. 198B. That, in our opinion, was to some extent necessary because of the non-obstante clause with which sub-s. (1) of s. 198B starts.

Now, against this construction it is urged by the opponent that when the amending Bill was introduced in the Lok Sabha, sub-s. (11) of cl. (25) of the amending Bill stood as follows: "Nothing in this section shall be deemed to be in derogation of the right of the person aggrieved under section 198". But ultimately, instead of accepting the wording of this sub-section, sub-s. (13) came to be worded as it stands at present, namely, "the provisions of this section shall be in addition to, and not in derogation of, those of section 198", and it is contended before us that we must give some meaning to the expression "in addition to". In our opinion, there is no substance in this contention. As I have already indicated, in view of the non-obstante clause with which sub-s. (1) of s. 198B starts, it would have been possible to argue that in the case of public servants who are defamed otherwise than by spoken words, in respect of their conduct in the discharge of public functions recourse can only be had to sub-s. (1) of s. 198B. In order to guard against such a possible construction, Parliament, in our judgment, made it clear by providing in sub-s. (13) that the provisions of s. 198B are to be in addition to, and not in derogation of, those of s. 198, with the result that even a public servant, though he may be defamed in respect of his conduct in the discharge of public functions, can still avail himself of the remedy provided under s. 198.

Then it was contended by the opponent that in case the Court of Session does not examine the aggrieved party as a witness under sub-s. (5) of s. 198B, as it is competent for the Sessions Court to do for reasons to be recorded, the accused person will have no remedy and will be considerably handicapped in proceeding against the party at whose instance the complaint was made in any civil or criminal proceedings launched against him. We are not prepared to accept this argument either. As I have already stated, under sub-s. (5), the aggrieved party has to be examined as a witness for the prosecution, though it would be open to the Court not to do so for reasons to be recorded. But as soon as the Court of Session comes to the conclusion that the accusation made against the accused is false and either frivolous or vexatious, then it has the power to direct the aggrieved person to show cause why he should not pay compensation to the accused, the only exceptions provided being the President, the Vice-President or the Governor or Rajpramukh of a State. In our opinion, under sub-s. (7), it would be open to the accused when discharged to cross-examine the person against whom such notice comes to be issued, when he shows cause against the notice.

Then it is also urged that under s. 345 of the Criminal Procedure Code the offence of defamation under s. 501 of the Indian Penal Code is compoundable and it can be compounded by the person defamed; and it is urged that if the real complainant does not join in the complaint at all, then it would be difficult for the Court of Session to permit the offence to be compounded because on our construction the person aggrieved would not be the complainant. In our opinion, there is no substance in this contention also. As against this it may be argued that though the complaint under s. 198B would be a complaint made by the Public Prosecutor, the aggrieved party, who will be examined as a witness, will be the person defamed and there is no reason why the provisions of s. 345 of the Criminal Procedure Code should not apply to a case tried by the Sessions Court under s. 198B of the Code, and why that Court cannot permit the offence to be compounded. We do not propose to express any opinion on this point because it does not affect the construction of s. 198B.

Then it is also argued that the prosecution in the present case should have applied to the learned Additional Sessions Judge to make a reference to this Court if it was not satisfied with the decision of Mr. Justice Baydekar in Bhatnagar v. State of Bombay and that in fact the present petition is an attempt to have that decision revised by this Court. There is no substance in this argument. As already pointed out, the case decided by Mr. Justice Baydekar was on different facts in respect of a different complaint, though against the present opponent, and it is contended before us on behalf of the petitioner that the view of Mr. Justice Baydekar in so far as it contemplates that a complaint under s. 198B should be a complaint made both by the person aggrieved and the Public Prosecutor would require reconsideration. In our judgment, with respect to the learned Judge, the provisions of sub-s. (13) of s. 198B of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot be interpreted to mean that a complaint under s. 198B(1) should also satisfy the provisions of s. 198 of the Code, with the result that it must be made not only by the Public Prosecutor but also by the person aggrieved by the alleged offence. The complaint contemplated under s. 198B is a complaint in writing only by the Public Prosecutor. But the provisions of sub-s. (13) of s. 198B make it clear that the public servant defamed is not deprived of his remedy to file a complaint under s. 198 of the Code. Any other construction is likely to defeat, in our judgment, the object of Parliament in enacting s. 198B. In inserting this section it appears not merely to have been intended to provide a special and speedier procedure enabling the Court of Session to take cognizance of an offence of defamation, other than by spoken words, against public servants without committal proceedings, upon a complaint made by the Public Prosecutor. The provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 198B, referred to already, regarding according of the sanction would appear also to indicate that in case of the holders of the highest offices in the State, such as the President, the Vice-President and the Governor of a State, their authorization to the sanctioning authority would be necessary, but in case of other public servants it is the Government whether of the Union or of the State, that would be primarily concerned in giving the sanction. This is undoubtedly a salutary provision as, in our view, the Government concerned might in suitable cases insist on the filing of a complaint in the larger interests of public administration itself, even though the public servant, who might be defamed in the discharge of his public functions, might not desire it. This object is not likely to be achieved in case the public servant is also required to join the Public Prosecutor in a complaint under s. 198B.

The result is that we must hold that the present complaint filed by the Public Prosecutor, though it is not a complaint in which the person defamed has joined, is a valid complaint and the Court of Session would have jurisdiction to take cognizance of the complaint, to entertain it and try it. We, therefore, allow the revision application and set aside the order of the learned Additional Sessions Judge dismissing the complaint and discharging the accused. The complaint will be restored and the Sessions Court will entertain it and try it in accordance with law. Rule made absolute.

Application allowed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Vyas and Mr. Justice Tambe.

N. M. NAIK v. COLABA LAND MILLS, COLABA, BOMBAY.*

Bombay Industrial Relations Act (Bom. XI of 1947), Secs. 78(1)A(c), 79, 27A, 32, 33, 115A, 114—Whether employee can initiate proceedings under s. 78(1)A(c) where there is in existence a representative union of industry wherein employee employed—Right of employee to appear and conduct proceedings initiated by him—Agreement referred to in s. 115A whether agreement arrived at when no industrial dispute pending before relevant authority.

Section 79 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946, confers a right to initiate proceedings under s. 78(1)A(c) of the Act on the employee directly affected, notwithstanding the fact that in the particular industry where the employee is employed there is in existence a representative union.

Under ss. 27A, 32 and 33 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946, the right of an individual employee to appear and conduct the proceedings initiated by him is not destroyed unless and until the representative union appears in the case on behalf of that employee whose grievance is being ventilated before the authorities concerned. Section 27A of the Act does not contemplate an appearance of the representative of the employees which might be contrary to the interests of the individual employees who might have initiated a proceeding under the Act.

Gambhirji Odhraj v. Bind Basni Prasad and Raja Kulkarni v. State of Bombay, referred to.

The agreement referred to in s. 115A of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946, is an agreement arrived at between the employer and the representative Union reached after the commencement of the industrial dispute before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court. Therefore, an agreement which is arrived at at a time when no such dispute is pending before any of these authorities will not fall under the terms of s. 115A of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgments.

S. S. Kavlekar and G. G. Kulkarni, with A. N. Shirodkar, for the petitioners.
B. A. Pandya, instructed by Matubhai Jamietram and Madan, for opponent No. 1.

*Decided, August 5, 1958. Special Civil 1 (1958) 57 Bom. L.R. 456.

Application No. 1064 of 1958.

2 [1954] S.C.R. 384, s.c. 56 Bom. L.R. 450.

TAMBH J. This is an application under art. 227 of the Constitution of India wherein the petitioners pray for quashing the orders made on February 6, 1958, by the Industrial Court, Bombay, (opponent No. 3 herein) dismissing the petitioners' appeal, as well as for setting aside the order made by the Labour Court on December 11, 1957.

The facts and circumstances giving rise to this petition, in brief, are: The petitioners claim to be working as Foremen in the Colaba Land Mills, opponent No. 1 hereto (hereinafter referred to as "the mills"). They say that there was an award made by the Industrial Court on May 26, 1956, in the matter of pay-scales for the technical and supervisory staff in the cotton textile mills in Bombay. The parties to this award were Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh representing the employees in the Textile Mills of Bombay (hereinafter referred to as "the Sangh") and the Mill-owners Association, Bombay, representing the mill-owners. According to the petitioners, this award is binding on opponent No. 1 mills. They further claim that according to this award they are entitled to a pay-scale per month of Rs. 215-15-260-20-340 as and from May 1, 1955. They further say that cl. 1 of the award specifically provided that the existing Technical and Supervisory Staff, including Assistant Engineering, shall be classified in the categories of (a) Assistant Masters, (b) Department Assistants, (c) Departmental Assistants who are Technical and Engineering Graduates, (d) Foremen and Assistant Foremen, and (e) Apprentices. They further say that this award, in terms, provides that it would not be open to the management to create a new category or a new cadre or a scale not envisaged by the agreement. According to the workmen, they were working as Foremen in opponent No. 1 mills since 1948 and that it was not open to opponent No. 1 mills to designate them as Electricians. It was also, on account of the terms of the award, not open to the Sangh, the representative Union of opponent No. 1 mills, or opponent No. 1 mills, to change their designation and create a new cadre or a new grade not envisaged in the award. They, therefore, submit that the action taken by opponent No. 1 mills and the Sangh in changing their designation to "Electricians" is mala fide and against the terms of the award. Therefore, opponent No. 1 mills were not justified in designating them as "Electricians" and paying them at the rate of Rs. 78 per month. The petitioners, therefore, made an approach under s. 42 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946, on February 6, 1957, claiming that they should be paid the difference from May 1, 1955, to the date of the notice. A reply thereto was sent by opponent No. 1 mills on February 18, 1957, denying their liability to pay the same. Another approach was made by the petitioners under s. 42 of the said Act on May 13, 1957. But as opponent No. 1 mills did not agree to the claim made by the petitioners, the petitioners, ultimately, on August 2, 1957, made an application under s. 78 (1) A (c) of the Act, complaining against the illegal change effected by opponent No. 1 mills in not paying them the aforesaid pay scale of a Foreman awarded to them by the aforesaid award. In this application under s. 78 (1) A (c) the petitioners prayed that they be designated as Foremen and it be declared that they are entitled to the Foremen's grade and pay-scale prescribed by the aforesaid award. They further prayed that opponent No. 1 mills be directed to pay them the difference.

It appears that during the pendency of this application opponent No. 1 mills made an application to the Labour Court that the Sangh, which was the representative Union of that particular mills, be joined as a party to the application. It further appears that, in pursuance of the notice issued by the Labour Court, the Sangh appeared before the Labour Court on November 27, 1957, and made an application to the Labour Court that it had no desire to join as a party to the above application, but it showed its willingness to appear in its representative capacity under s. 27A of the Act. It, therefore, prayed that the necessary orders may be passed. The Labour Court thereupon made an order and permitted the Sangh to appear in its representative capacity under s. 27A.

Thereafter on December 11, 1957, Shri N. S. Deshpande, Secretary of the Sangh, made an application (exh. 16 on the record of the Labour Court file) to the Labour Court, the material part whereof is as under:—

"After the award for Technical and Supervisory Staff, certain disputes of employees of the opponent mill including those of Narayan Mukund Naik and Sayad Hussain were taken up for negotiation with the mill through the intervention of the Millowners' Association, Bombay, and the disputes including those of Narayan Mukund Naik and Sayad Hussain Sayad were settled and the settlements were also implemented by the opponent mill. The dispute, therefore, does not survive. In view of this, the Sangh prays that the Hon'ble Court may be pleased to dispose of the application."

On the same day the Labour Court made an order under s. 115A of the Act, the material part whereof is as under:—

"At the time of hearing to-day, the representative Union and the opponent mill stated that the order should be passed in terms of the Memorandum Ex. 16 filed in the Court. Under section 115A of the B.L.R. Act, I pass the order in terms of the Memorandum Ex. 16, a copy of which is annexed herewith as Annexure 'A' and direct that the parties should abide by the terms of the same."

The petitioners feeling aggrieved by this order, made by the Labour Court on December 11, 1957, took an appeal therefrom to the Industrial Court, Bombay.

The Appellate Court took the view that as the decision of the Labour Court was in accordance with the agreement between the representative union and the mills, it was not open to the petitioners to appeal against a consent order. It, therefore, dismissed the appeal summarily as not maintainable.

It is against the orders of the Industrial Court and the Labour Court that the petitioners have come to this Court by a petition under art. 227 of the Constitution.

Shri Kavlekar, learned advocate for the petitioners, has raised before us two contentions. He contends that there was no agreement arrived at on December 11, 1957, between the Sangh and the mill-owners. The agreement, which was arrived at was some time prior to August 2, 1957, the date on which the petitioners made an application to the Labour Court under s. 78 (1) A (c) of the Act. Such an agreement, even if made, was not an agreement falling under s. 115A of the Act. The Labour Court was, therefore, in error in holding that there was a binding agreement under s. 115A of the Act and on that view of the matter disposing of the case in terms of the agreement. Shri Kavlekar, secondly, contends that the real question which was raised in the petition by his clients, namely, the validity and legality of the agreement between the Sangh on the one hand and opponent No. 1 mills on the other changing the designation of the petitioners from Foreman to Electricians, has been completely lost sight of by the authorities below and, therefore, the petitioners' real grievance has not been investigated into at all.

In our opinion, both the contentions of the petitioners are well-founded. As regards the first contention, namely, as to whether there was any agreement between the Sangh on the one hand and opponent No. 1 mills on the other within the meaning of s. 115A of the Act on December 11, 1957, we have already reproduced above the material part of the application made by the Sangh on December 11, 1957. From that portion it is clear that there was really in fact no agreement at all on December 11, 1957, between the Sangh on the one hand and opponent No. 1 mills on the other. On the contrary, this application, in terms, refers to some prior agreement. And it is the case of the Sangh that, on account of this prior agreement between the Sangh on the one hand and the Mill-owners' Association on the other, it was not open to the petitioners to raise any dispute as against opponent No. 1 mills and, therefore, the application should be dismissed as no dispute survived. This prior agreement has not been placed on record. We, however, are informed by the learned counsel for opponent No. 1 mills, as well as for the Sangh, that an agreement was arrived at sometime on or about January 16, 1957. It is thus clear that this agreement, on the strength of which dismissal of the petitioners' application was claimed, was an agreement reached prior to the initiation of the proceedings before the Labour Court. As already stated, proceedings before the Labour Court were initiated by the petitioners on August 2, 1957. The question that falls for consideration is whether an agreement, which is arrived at at a time when no dispute is pending before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court, would fall under the terms of s. 115A of the Act.

Shri Pandya, learned counsel for opponent No. 1 Mills, contends that even though an agreement was arrived at at a date prior to the initiation of proceedings before any of the authorities mentioned above, such an agreement would fall under the terms of s. 115A of the Act.

It is not possible for us to accept the contention of Mr. Pandya. Section 115A reads as follows:—

"If any agreement is arrived at between an employer and a representative Union who are parties to any industrial dispute pending before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court, the order, decision or award in such proceeding shall be made in terms of such agreement, unless the Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court is satisfied that the agreement was in contravention of any of the provisions of this Act or the consent of either party to it was caused by mistake, misrepresentation, fraud, undue influence, coercion or threat."

Now, it will be seen that the material words are "If any agreement is arrived at... who are parties to any industrial dispute..." This shows that the section refers to an agreement arrived at between the persons who are already parties to a dispute before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court and not an agreement which was arrived at at a prior stage between the persons who now are parties to the dispute. If really the intention of the Legislature in framing s. 115A had been to include an agreement reached between the employer and the representative union at a stage prior to the commencement of a dispute before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court, then, in our view, the phraseology used would have been "If any agreement had already been arrived at or is arrived at between an employer and a Representative Union". That is not the phraseology used and, in our opinion, it would not be open for us without any adequate grounds to substitute words not used by the Legislature in the section. In our view, therefore, the agreement referred to in s. 115A is an agreement arrived at between the employer and the representative Union reached after the commencement of the Industrial dispute before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court.

The view taken by us finds support in other provisions of the Act, namely, s. 114. Section 114 refers to a registered agreement or a settlement or submission or award arrived at otherwise than in an industrial dispute before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court. We are, therefore, of opinion that this clearly shows that in s. 115A such an agreement is not included.

Shri Buch, who appears for the Sangh also, does not support the contention of Shri Pandya.

Coming to the next contention which is raised by Shri Kavlekar, the real dispute, which is raised by the petitioners, is as regards the validity or legality of the agreement reached between the Mill-owners' Association and the Sangh whereunder the designation of the petitioners was changed from that of Foremen to Electricians. This contention, we find, has been nowhere referred to either by the Labour Court or the Appellate Court, namely, the Industrial Court. It appears that this contention, which is the principal contention raised on behalf of the petitioners, has been completely lost sight of by the two authorities, namely, the Labour Court and the Industrial Court.

Shri Pandya, the learned counsel for opponent No. 1 mills, contends that the petitioners have no locus standi at all under the Act to challenge the validity or legality of the aforesaid agreement reached on January 16, 1957. He says that in this industry there is a representative Union and on true construction of ss. 78, 79 and 27A it is only the representative union, namely, the Sangh, which can agitate any matter before a Labour Court on behalf of the petitioners.

It is not possible for us to accept this contention of Mr. Pandya also. As already stated, the petition is made under s. 78 (1) A (c). Section 78 (1) A (c) provides:

"A Labour Court shall have power to—

A. decide—

(a) ...

(b) ...

(c) whether...any change is illegal under this Act."

The material part of s. 79 provides:—

"(1) Proceedings before a Labour Court in respect of disputes falling under clause (a) of paragraph A of sub-section (1) of section 78 shall be commenced on an application made by any of the parties to the dispute, a special application under sub-section (3) of section 52 or an application by the Labour Officer or a representative union and proceedings in respect of a matter falling under clause (c) of the said paragraph A on an application made by any employer or employee directly affected or the Labour Officer or a representative Union."

It is not in dispute that the application made by the petitioners is under s. 78 (1) A (c) of the Act. Section 79, in terms, confers a right to initiate proceedings under s. 78 (1) A (c) on the employee directly affected. The petitioners, if their grievance is really correct, undoubtedly are the employees directly affected by the alleged change. True, that the section confers a right on the Labour Officer or a representative Union also to initiate proceedings under s. 78 (1) A (c). But the section nowhere says that where in any industry there is a representative union, then in that event the representative union alone has a right to initiate proceedings and not the employees directly affected by the alleged change. To accept the contention of Shri Pandya, we will have to read into the section the following words "Where there is no representative union" after the words "employees directly affected". It is well settled that unless it is absolutely necessary the Courts would not read into the statutes words which are not used by the Legislature.

Shri Pandya next contends that even though the words "employees directly affected" are not qualified by a clause "where there is no representative union", the same results would follow on reading s. 27A of the Act, which confers on the representative union alone the right to appear and act on behalf of the employees.

Section 27A reads as follows:—

"Save as provided in sections 32 and 33, no employee shall be allowed to appear or act in any proceeding under this Act except through the representative of employees."

Now, "representative of employees" has been defined in s. 3, cl. (32). It reads:—

"Representative Union' means a representative of employees entitled to appear or act as such under section 30."

This brings us to the provisions of s. 30, and when we look to the provisions of s. 30, a representative union for such industry is first in order of preference entitled to act as a representative of employees in that industry.

Reading the provisions of s. 27A, s. 3(32) and s. 30, undoubtedly, a representative union in an industry is the representative of the employees within the meaning of s. 27A. But the question is whether a representative union alone would have a right to appear and act on behalf of an employee to his exclusion. It is not possible for us to so hold on reading these three sections.

It will be seen that the provisions of s. 27A are made subject to the provisions of ss. 32 and 33. Section 32 provides:—

"A Conciliator, a Board, an Arbitrator, a Wage Board, a Labour Court and the Industrial Court may, if he or it considers it expedient for the ends of justice, permit an individual, whether an employee or not, to appear in any proceeding before him or it."

The provisions of s. 32 would show that it would be a matter of exercising discretion on the facts of each case for the various authorities mentioned therein to decide whether it would permit an individual employee to appear in any proceeding before that authority, and that would depend upon the facts of a particular case. Shri Pandya, however, contends that no such discretion exists where a representative union has appeared in the case. He relies on the proviso to s. 32. The proviso reads:—

"Provided that no such individual shall be permitted to appear in any proceedings in which a Representative Union has appeared as the representative of the employees."

The proviso no doubt indicates that where a representative union has chosen to appear as a representative of the employees, the employee would not have a right to appear in the proceedings. But the mere appearance of a representative union in a case would not necessarily amount to an appearance of the representative union as a representative of that particular employee in that particular dispute. It again will have to be seen as to whether in fact the representative union is choosing to appear, as undoubtedly it has a right to do so, as a representative of that particular employee, or employees whose grievance is being ventilated before the authorities concerned.

We have already pointed out that in the instant case the application was made under s. 78 (1) A (c). Section 79, in terms, confers a right on an employee directly affected to initiate proceedings. It has to be seen whether the right conferred on the petitioners under s. 79 is in the instant case taken away on account of the appearance of the representative union in the case. In other words, it is to be seen whether the representative union, namely, the Sangh, has chosen to appear in the instant case as a representative of the employees, namely, the petitioners. Shri Buch, learned counsel for the Sangh, frankly concedes that the Sangh has not chosen to appear as a representative of the present petitioners. What he says is that the Sangh has chosen to appear in this case as a representative of the employees in the industry in general and to support the agreement which they have entered into with the Mill-owners' Association on or about January 16, 1957. According to Shri Buch that agreement is a valid and legal agreement and under the provisions of s. 114 of the Act that agreement is binding on the petitioners.

Now, the contention raised, as already stated, by the petitioners is that that agreement entered into by the Sangh on the one hand and the Mill-owners' Association on the other, on or about January 16, 1957, is not a legal and valid agreement binding on them. From the nature of the dispute raised the Sangh cannot represent the present petitioners in this dispute. The position then that emerges is that the petitioners, who claim to have a grievance and who have a right under s. 79 of the Act to ventilate that grievance before the Labour Court, are not being represented by the representative union, as the representative union does not claim to represent them. The petitioners must, therefore, have an opportunity to establish their grievance before the Labour Court and opponent No. 1 cannot be heard to say that they have no locus standi at all in the case to conduct their case and ventilate their grievance on account of the provisions of s. 27A of the Act.

Shri Pandya also referred us to the following observations of the learned Chief Justice reported in Gambhirji Odharaj v. Bind Basni Prasad,¹ (p. 462):—

"... Reading ss. 27A, 32 and 33 together, the scheme is that whenever a representative Union appears in any proceedings, that Union alone can be heard by any Labour Tribunal. But if a representative Union does not appear, there is nothing to prevent an employee from appearing or from authorising any person to appear for him. Therefore it is perfectly true that even when an application is made by an employee under s. 42(4), if the representative Union puts in an appearance, then the representative Union alone can appear or act for the employee. It is therefore pointed out that no useful purpose would be served if the Labour Court is asked to consider the application of the employee under s. 42(4) when only the representative Union can be heard on behalf of the employee. In the first place, it is not necessary to assume that the representative Union will appear when this application is considered by the Labour Court. In the second place, even assuming the representative Union does appear, the representative Union will appear on behalf of the individual employees, and the application that will be considered and decided by the Labour Court would be the application of the employee and not the application of the representative Union."

In our opinion, these observations are not of much assistance to opponent No. 1 mills. But, on the contrary, these observations lend support to the view taken by us. The rule deducible from the aforesaid observations, in our opinion, is that on a true construction of ss. 27A, 32 and 33 the right of an individual employee to appear and conduct the proceedings initiated by him is not destroyed unless and until the representative union appears in the case on behalf of that employee. As already stated, such is not the case here. On the other hand, Shri Buch has made the position clear that the Sangh is not appearing as a representative of the two petitioners in this case.

A reference was also made by Shri Pandya to a decision reported in Raja Kulkarni v. The State of Bombay.² In our view, that judgment has hardly any relevance to the question which we have to consider in this case.

As already stated, in our view, there was no agreement reached between the Sangh and opponent No. 1 mills on December 11, 1957. The agreement reached, according to the Sangh, was one between the mills and/or Mill-owners' Association on the one hand and the Sangh on the other some time on or about January 16, 1957. This agreement was arrived at prior to the commencement of the proceedings before the Labour Court which were in fact commenced on August 2, 1957. The agreement, therefore, was not one falling under s. 115A of the Act.

The order of the Labour Court disposing of the application under s. 115A is clearly erroneous in law on the face of the record.

We have already stated that, in our view, on the facts and circumstances of the case, it cannot be said that the petitioners have no right to appear and conduct their case, inasmuch as the union does not claim to represent them. The application made by the petitioners was under s. 78 (1) A (c). That application was dismissed by the Labour Court. Section 84(1)(c) confers a right of appeal against the decision of a Labour Court in respect of matters falling under cl. (a) or cl. (c) of para. A of sub-s. (1) of s. 78. The petitioners, therefore, clearly had a right of appeal under s. 84. The appeal Court was, therefore, clearly in error in not entertaining the appeal.

Normally, we would have remanded the matter to the appellate Court for a fresh decision of the appeal. But, in our view, no useful purpose will be served by remanding this case to the appellate Court, inasmuch as the principal dispute raised by the petitioners, namely, the validity and the legality of the agreement of January 16, 1957, has not been considered by the Labour Court and that is the principal contention which ought to have been considered and decided by the Labour Court. It will, therefore, in our opinion, be necessary to remand this case back to the Labour Court to have a fresh decision with advertence to the observations made herein.

In the result, for the reasons stated above, this petition is allowed, the order made by the Industrial Court, Bombay, on February 6, 1958, and the order made by the Labour Court on December 11, 1957, are quashed, and it is ordered that the case be sent back to the Labour Court for a fresh decision with advertence to the aforesaid remarks. Costs of this petition will abide the result.

.VYAS J. I agree entirely with the conclusions reached by my learned Brother.

This application raises two important questions. The first question raised is this: Where there is a representative union, is there a right available under the Act to individual employees to complain before the Labour Court that a certain change is an illegal change? This question, in its turn, raises a question of construction of ss. 27A, 32, 33 and 78 (1) A (c) of the Act. The next question raised is as to the construction of s. 115A. Section 115A speaks of an agreement and the question is: Must it be an agreement reached during the pendency of a dispute or might it also be an agreement which might precede the dispute? These questions have arisen in this way:—

The petitioners' case is that they were working as Foremen in the Colaba Land and Mills Company Limited. They filed an application, being Application No. 468 of 1957, before the First Labour Court at Bombay, contending that they were entitled to the wages fixed for Foremen in the award of the Industrial Court made in Reference No. 91 of 1954. This award was passed on May 26, 1956. Thereafter, it would appear that on January 16, 1957, an agreement took place between the Colaba Land and Mills Co. Ltd. and the Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh, Bombay, pursuant to which, say the petitioners, their category was changed from that of Foremen to that of Electricians and their wages were fixed at Rs. 78 per month. After the award was passed, the petitioners made an application to the manager of the mills, requesting the manager that they should be paid according to the revised pay-scales and grades. It may be noted that the revision of the pay-scales and grades was ordered by this award. To the aforesaid application of the petitioners the manager of the mills gave no reply. The petitioners learnt later on that the manager, contrary to the terms of the award, had altered their category from that of Foremen to that of Electricians. It may be noted that during the pendency of application No. 468 of 1957, which was made by the petitioners before the First Labour Court at Bombay, the mills made an application to the Court, and pursuant to that application a notice was issued to the Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh. In response to that notice, the Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh, to whom I shall hereafter refer as "the Sangh", remained present in Court. The Sangh stated to the Court that it wanted to appear in its representative capacity under s. 27A of the Act. It was allowed to do so. When the matter came up for hearing, the representative union and the mills both submitted to the Court that an order should be passed in terms of the agreement dated January 16, 1957. The learned Judge of the First Labour Court accordingly passed an order in terms of the said agreement and the order was passed by him under s. 116A of the Act. From that order of the First Labour Court the petitioners filed an appeal before the Industrial Court at Bombay. The Industrial Court observed:—

"Now, the position is that the representative Union having appeared in the lower Court and as an appeal is a continuation of the proceeding of the Original Court, only the representative Union can file an appeal... It is not open to individual employees to appeal against such a consent order."

Consistently with this view of the matter, the learned President of the Industrial Court dismissed the appeal of the petitioners. It is from the aforesaid orders of the President of the Industrial Court and the Judge of the First Labour Court that this application has been filed by the petitioners under art. 227 of the Constitution of India.

It is the petitioners' case that the change which was brought about in consequence of the agreement dated January 16, 1957, in their category was an illegal change. The petitioners contend that once an award was made by the Industrial Court, it was not open to the employers or the Rashtriya Mill Maz-door Sangh to alter the categories which were fixed under the award. The petitioners, feeling aggrieved by the change, which they considered was an illegal change, made an application before the First Labour Court and there is no doubt that under s. 78 of the Act the Labour Court had jurisdiction to entertain and decide that application. The application clearly fell within the purview of cl. (c) of s. 78, sub-s. (1) A. Section 78 (1) A (c) provides that the Labour Court shall have power to decide whether a strike, lock-out, closure, stoppage, or any change is illegal under the Act. As I have mentioned above, it was the petitioners who commenced a proceeding under the Act to ventilate their grievance against the illegal change—illegal according to the contention of the petitioners—introduced as a result of the agreement dated January 16, 1957. The proceeding was commenced under sub-s. (1) of s. 79. This sub-section provides:—

“Proceedings before a Labour Court in respect of disputes falling under clause (a) of Paragraph A of sub-section (1) of section 78 shall be commenced on an application made by any of the parties to the dispute, a special application under sub-section (3) of section 52 or an application by the Labour Officer or a representative union and proceedings in respect of a matter falling under clause (c) of the said Paragraph A on an application made by any employer or employee directly affected or the Labour Officer or a representative Union.”

The petitioners, who were employees directly affected by the change that was introduced as a result of the agreement dated January 16, 1957, commenced a proceeding in respect of a matter falling under cl. (c) of s. 78 (1) A and this they did under s. 79 (1) of the Act.

As I have stated above, at a certain stage the mills made an application to the Labour Court to the effect that the Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh be made a party to the application made by the petitioners. Upon that application, a notice was issued by the Labour Court to the Sangh and the Sangh put in an appearance in the Court.

Mr. Pandya, the learned advocate appearing for the mills, contends that once the union came on the scene of the dispute, the existence of the individual employees, for the purposes of the proceeding under the Act, came to an end and the petitioners in their character of individual employees were effaced from the scene. Mr. Pandya says that after the union came on the scene, it was not open to the petitioners under the Act to appear or act in any proceeding under the Act.

Mr. Pandya has invited our attention to s. 27A of the Act and he says that the word “act” occurring in this section would include “even the initiation of a proceeding under sub-section (1) of section 79”. In other words, Mr. Pandya’s contention is that it is not open to the petitioners, in a case where a representative union is in existence, to even initiate a proceeding in respect of any of the matters referred to in s. 78 (1) A of the Act.

Mr. Pandya has next invited our attention to the provisions of ss. 32 and 33. It may be noted that the provisions of s. 27A have been made subject to the provisions of ss. 32 and 33. Section 27A provides:

“Save as provided in sections 32 and 33, no employee shall be allowed to appear or act in any proceeding under this Act except through the representative of employees.” Thus the provisions of s. 27A are to be read subject to the provisions of ss. 32 and 33.

Section 32 provides:—

“A Conciliator, a Board, an Arbitrator, a Wage Board, a Labour Court and the Industrial Court may, if he or it considers it expedient for the ends of justice, permit an individual, whether an employee or not, to appear in any proceeding before him or it:

Provided that no such individual shall be permitted to appear in any proceeding in which a representative Union has appeared as the representative of employees.”

Then, there is s. 33 and I shall quote the material portion of that section. It provides:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in any other provision of this Act, an employee or a representative Union shall be entitled to appear through any person,

(a) ...

(c) ...

Provided that...

Provided further that no employee shall be entitled to appear through any person in any proceeding under this Act in which a Representative Union has appeared as the representative of the employees."

Mr. Pandya relies upon the abovementioned provisions of ss. 27A, 32 and 33 in support of his contention that once the representative union had put in its appearance in this case, it was not open to the petitioners as individual employees either to appear in the case or act in the case. An appeal from an order of the Labour Court being a continuation of the application itself, Mr. Pandya says that the view taken by the President of the Industrial Court that the petitioners had no right to file an appeal from the order of the First Labour Court was a correct view.

We have carefully considered the provisions of ss. 27A, 32 and 33, but we find ourselves unable to accept the contention which Mr. Pandya has made upon the basis of these sections. Section 27A provides that subject to the provisions of ss. 32 and 33 no employee shall be allowed to appear or act in any proceeding under the Act except through the representative of employees. It is perfectly true that under this section no employee shall be allowed to appear in any proceeding under the Act or act in any proceeding under the Act, except through the representative of employees. But there is no doubt, in our view, that the representative of the employees must appear and act for the individual employees who might have initiated a proceeding under s. 79 (1) read with s. 78 (1) A (c), but who might themselves not be allowed to appear or act pursuant to s. 27A. The appearance has to be made through the representative of employees. But it must be the appearance for and on behalf of individual employees. Section 27A does not contemplate an appearance of the representative of employees which might be contrary to the interests of the individual employees who might have initiated a proceeding under the Act. All that the section (s. 27A) lays down is that although a proceeding might have been initiated by the individual employees directly concerned by the change which the said employees might consider an illegal change, they would not be permitted to appear in the proceeding or act in the proceeding. The appearance or acting in the proceeding would have to be done for them and on their behalf by the representative of the employees. This, in our view, is the natural construction of s. 27A of the Act.

If we turn to s. 32, the proviso to the section says that no individual shall be permitted to appear in any proceeding in which a representative union has appeared as the representative of employees. It has to be remembered, however, that the Union must appear for the individual employees. It is true that an individual employee is not permitted to appear in any proceeding in which a representative union has put in its appearance. But then the point to be noted is that while appearing as a representative union, the union must appear for and on behalf of the individual employees who might have commenced a proceeding in respect of a matter covered by sub-s. (1) of s. 79 read with cl. (c) of s. 78 (1) A.

Then, there is s. 33, which is subject to two provisos. In this case we are concerned with the second proviso and the second proviso says that no employee shall be entitled to appear through any person in any proceeding under this Act in which a representative union has appeared as the representative of the employees. The language of this proviso is perfectly clear. It admits of no ambiguity. By enacting this proviso the Legislature has laid down that so far as the appearance in the Court is concerned, the appearance shall be the appearance of the representative union. But the said appearance must be an appearance for individual employees. When the Legislature says that no employee shall be entitled to appear himself, but that he shall appear through a representative union, we cannot possibly attach any other intention to the Legislature except the intention that the Union shall put in its appearance on behalf of the employee and not in a manner contrary to or subversive of the interest of the employee. In other words, if the union puts in its appearance in a proceeding initiated by the individual employees, it will be the duty, in our opinion, of the union to press the contentions which might have been put forward by the individual employees in an application made by them under sub-s. (1) of s. 79 read with s. 78 (1) A (c).

Mr. Pandya says that the intention of the Legislature in enacting s. 79(1) was to provide that where there is no representative union, then only an application may be made by an employee directly concerned. We regret we are unable to agree with Mr. Pandya. If the Legislature had any such intention as is contended for by Mr. Pandya, it would have used the words to that effect. It would in that case have said "on an application made by any employee or employees directly affected where there is no representative union". The Legislature always uses appropriate words to express its intention. In order to make its intention clear, the Legislature has in the body of the Act enacted several provisos to several sections and sub-sections. For instance, if we turn to s. 27, sub-s. (1), cl. (a) and (b), there is a proviso to those clauses. If we turn to s. 32, we find a proviso to that section. Similar is the case with s. 33. Indeed to s. 33 there are two provisos enacted by the Legislature. If we turn to sub-s. (1) of s. 35, we find that that section is subject to a proviso. Sub-section (1) of s. 36 and sub-s. (1) of s. 37 are also made subject to the provisos. Similarly sub-s. (4) of s. 42 and sub-s. (1) of s. 44 are also made subject to the provisos. Clearly, therefore, whenever the Legislature has intended to make the provisions of certain sections subject to certain provisos or subject to the provisions of another section, it has always found appropriate language to give effect to that intention. For instance, the Legislature intended to make the provisions of s. 27A subject to ss. 32 and 33 and they clearly stated so in the body of s. 27A. Therefore, if the Legislature had intended that an employee directly concerned would have a right to apply under s. 79, sub-s. (1) only when there is no representative union, it would have doubtless said "on an application made by any employee or employees directly affected where there is no representative union". But we do not find any such words in s. 79, sub-s. (1). In these circumstances we must hold that the petitioners have a right to initiate proceedings in respect of matters referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 79 read with s. 78 (1) A (c).

While on the point of ss. 27A and 79(1) Mr. Pandya has contended that the provisions of s. 79(1) must be read subject to s. 27A. Mr. Pandya says that by reading s. 79, sub-s. (1) subject to s. 27A, it would follow that an individual employee has no right even to initiate a proceeding under the Act. For making this contention, Mr. Pandya relies upon the word "act" in s. 27A. In our view, the construction which Mr. Pandya seeks to put upon s. 79, sub-s. (1), is clearly opposed to the language of s. 79, sub-s. (1). Section 79, sub-s. (1), expressly confers a right upon an employer or an employee or the Labour Officer or a representative union to make an application in respect of matters falling under cl. (c) of s. 78 (1) A. It is clear, therefore, that if a representative union does not choose to initiate a proceeding in respect of a matter falling under cl. (c) of s. 78 (1) A, the employee directly concerned could do so. Once the employee directly concerned does so, his cause is to be taken up by the union and the union has to appear and act for him in the application made by him (individual employee directly concerned), and it is but clear and natural that when the union appears and acts for and on behalf of the individual employee who is directly concerned in an application made by the latter, it must fight the battle for the said employee. If the union does not do so, it cannot be said to represent the employee whom it purports to represent.

In this connection it would be appropriate to refer to Ganbhirji Odharaj v. Bind Bansi Prasad,¹ to which my learned Brother has also referred in the course of his judgment. In this case the learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the Bench, observed (p. 462):—

“...even assuming the Representative Union does appear, the Representative Union will appear on behalf of the individual employees, and the application that will be considered and decided by the Labour Court would be the application of the employee and not the application of the representative Union.”

Thus, we are fortified in the view which we have taken in this application, namely, that once the union puts in its appearance in a case where a proceeding is initiated by an individual employee directly concerned, the union must fight the battle for the employee.

I now proceed to deal with the next important question which has arisen in this case and that question is one of construction of s. 115A. Section 115A provides:—

“If any agreement is arrived at between an employer and a Representative Union who are parties to any industrial dispute pending before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court, the order, decision or award in such proceeding shall be made in terms of such agreement, unless the Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court is satisfied that the agreement was in contravention of any of the provisions of this Act or the consent of either party to it was caused by mistake, misrepresentation, fraud, undue influence, coercion or threat.”

Now, a point has arisen whether the agreement referred to in this section must be an agreement arrived at during the pendency of the dispute or whether it might also be an agreement which might have preceded the dispute. Mr. Kavlekar contends that the agreement, to be enforceable under s. 115A, must be an agreement which takes place during the pendency of the dispute. Mr. Pandya, on the other hand, contends that the agreement might also be an agreement which might have preceded the dispute. In our view, Mr. Kavlekar's contention is right. It is clear that there can be no question of an agreement unless there is a dispute in the first place. An agreement pre-supposes a state of affairs, where but for the agreement or settlement, the matters settled by an agreement would not be settled and the dispute would continue. Therefore, in our view, an agreement to be enforceable under s. 115A must be an agreement arrived at between the parties during the pendency of the dispute.

We are fortified in this construction by the fact that the Legislature has used the word “is” in the opening portion of s. 115A. The section opens with the words “If any agreement is arrived at between an employer and a representative union...”. The intention of the Legislature is always to be gathered from the language used by the Legislature. When the Legislature intends to convey a certain thing, it chooses words appropriate for the purpose. If the intention of the Legislature had been to lay down a law that a dispute subsequently arising between the parties shall be settled in terms of the prior agreement, it would have used the words “If any agreement has been arrived at between an employer and a representative union”. But it is significant to note that the word used in this context by the Legislature is “is” and the words are not “has been”.

Then, again, the important words in this section on the point of construction of the section are “who are parties to any industrial dispute pending before an Arbitrator, Wage Board, Labour Court or Industrial Court”. If the Legislature had intended that an agreement spoken of by s. 115A might precede a dispute, it would have used the words “who might be parties to any industrial dispute”.

Then, again, if we turn to sub-s. (3) of s. 114 of the Act, the sub-section provides:—

"A registered agreement entered into by the representative of the majority of the employees affected or deemed to be affected under section 43 by a change shall bind all the employees so affected or deemed to be affected."

It is, therefore, clear that the agreement referred to in s. 114, sub-s. (3) and s. 115A postulates a change and the representative of the majority of the employees being affected by that change. In other words, it postulates the existence of a dispute. It is clear, therefore, that the agreement contemplated by s. 115A of the Act is an agreement arrived at between the parties during the pendency of the dispute between them.

In the result, I agree with the order of remand proposed by my learned Brother.

Case remanded.

NAGPUR KSHATRIYA KATHIK SAMAJ v. CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF NAGPUR.*

City of Nagpur Corporation Act (C. P. & Berar Act II of 1950), Secs. 57(1)(m), 115(35)(b), 3(2)—Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act (II of 1922), Secs. 179(1)(b-1), (d), (cc), 180(a)(b)(c)(d)(g), 178(5)—Constitution of India, art. 19—Whether Corporation can regulate markets by merely passing a resolution to that effect—Amount Corporation authorised to demand for occupation of its stalls whether a fee or rent—Constitutionality of bye-laws 1 and 14(1) & (11).

Section 57(1)(m) of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948, confers a power on the Corporation to regulate markets by making bye-laws in that respect and not by merely passing a resolution. Therefore, where the Corporation sought to regulate meat markets and prohibit the sale of meat in weekly markets by merely passing a resolution, held that the action of the Corporation in prohibiting the sale of meat in weekly markets could not be upheld under s. 57(1)(m) of the Act.

The Corporation of the City of Nagpur is empowered under the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948, and bye-law 3† to charge an amount for use and occupation of its property and not fees in the legal sense i.e. charges for the service which is rendered by the Corporation to the occupiers of that property. It is not open to the Corporation to charge or claim any amount it likes as rent for the occupation of its property like markets, stalls etc. but the charges must be reasonable.

Bye-law No. 1 and clauses (1) and (4) of bye-law No. 14†† are not ultra vires of the Constitution of India.

C. R. H. Readymoney Ltd. v. State of Bombay,† referred to.

The facts appear in the judgment.

M. B. Bobde, D. L. Jayawant and S. G. Kutde, for the petitioners.

M. N. Phadke and S. M. Hazarnavis, for the respondent.

TAMBE J. The aforesaid applications will be disposed of by this judgment. In our opinion, it would be convenient to dispose of all these applications by this common judgment, as they arise out of the same set of facts culminating in the passing of resolution No. 77 on March 28, 1958, and the action taken by the Corporation thereafter. The respondent in all the aforesaid applications is the Corporation of the City of Nagpur, hereinafter referred to as the Corporation.

*Decided, October 10, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 198 of 1958 (with Special Civil Applications Nos. 286, 222 and 243 of 1958). framed by the Nagpur Municipal Committee. Part III, p. 64.

Facts giving rise to these applications are: The Corporation was constituted on March 2, 1951, under the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948 (Central Provinces and Berar Act No. II of 1950) hereinafter referred to as the Act. Since that date, i.e. March 2, 1951, civil administration of the City of Nagpur is conducted and managed by the Corporation under the provisions of the Act. Prior to that date, civil administration of the City of Nagpur was conducted and managed by the Municipal Committee of Nagpur under various Municipal Acts passed from time to time, the first one was passed in the year 1864 and the last one being the Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act II of 1922, hereinafter referred to as the Municipalities Act.

For the purpose of administration, the municipality of Nagpur had divided itself into two committees, the City municipal committee and the Civil Station Sub-Committee. Each of the two committees exercised jurisdiction over certain defined areas and each of them had made its own byelaws. The byelaws with which we are concerned however are very similar and we would be referring to the byelaws framed by the City Municipal Committee of Nagpur.

It is not in dispute that in the City of Nagpur sale of meat and the markets in which meat was sold were under the control of and were regulated by the aforesaid municipal committees in accordance with the provisions of the Municipalities Act and the byelaws made thereunder. The provisions of the Municipalities Act under which the byelaws were made for the inspection of meat markets as well as stalls and for regulating the sale or exposure for sale of meat within the municipal area of Nagpur were s. 179(1)(b-1), (d) and (cc), s. 180(a),(b),(c),(d) and (g) and s. 178(5) of the Municipalities Act. The byelaws which were in force on the date the Corporation was constituted were those made by the Civil Station Sub-Committee under the aforesaid sections on August 3, 1932 and those made by the City Municipal Committee under the aforesaid sections on July 25, 1939. Sub-section (2) of s. 8 of the Corporation Act provides that every byelaw made under the Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act, 1922, shall, so far as it relates to the Municipality of Nagpur and so far as it is in force at the commencement of, and is not inconsistent with, this Act, be deemed to have been made and issued under the provisions of this Act, and shall, unless previously altered, modified, cancelled or suspended, as the case may be, under this Act, remain in force for the period, if any, for which it was so made. The aforesaid byelaws thus became byelaws under the Corporation Act and were in force at the material time.

As already stated the byelaws of both the committees are similar and we would be referring only to the byelaws of the City Municipal Committee. These byelaws are at page 91 of Part III of the Book styled as "Corporation of the City of Nagpur Byelaws framed by the Nagpur Municipal Committee", and in the preface to this book the Chief Executive Officer has announced that these byelaws, unless they are repugnant to the present Act, will continue in force till new byelaws are framed under the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948 (II of 1950).

It would be convenient to refer to some of the byelaws which are material for the purpose of these cases. Byelaw No. 1 provides that the committee shall, with the sanction of the Deputy Commissioner, from time to time, fix a place or places to be used as meat markets or meat stalls and no meat shall be stored, sold, hawked or exhibited for sale at any place other than markets or stalls so fixed. Byelaw No. 3 provides that meat markets with the stalls therein shall remain open daily from sunrise to sunset. Clause (2) of byelaw No. 9 provides that no meat shall be sold or exposed for sale except the flesh of animals slaughtered at the places fixed for this purpose under s. 140 of the Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act, 1922. Clause (3) thereof provides that all meat intended for sale shall be produced before the slaughter-house inspector appointed by the committee, who shall examine it, and if he passes it as fit for human consumption, shall stamp it in ink as class I, II or III with meat stamps approved by the committee. No meat shall be sold unless it has been so passed and stamped. Clause (4) of the said byelaw provides that meat not sold on the day on which it was passed and stamped shall not be sold, unless it is re-examined and passed in accordance with cl. (2) of this byelaw. Byelaw No. 10 provides that if, during the course of the day, meat which has been passed and stamped deteriorates and becomes unfit for human consumption, it shall no longer be exposed or sold. Byelaw No. 12 provides that no person shall sell meat or expose it for sale to the public within the limits of the municipality without a licence which shall be issued and renewed by the secretary or any officer of the committee specially empowered in this behalf. Byelaw No. 13(1) provides that a fee of As. 8 shall be charged for such a licence. It further provides that the licence issued would remain in force till March 31 of next following. Byelaw No. 14 enumerates grounds on which the licence could be refused. Byelaw No. 15 empowers the municipal authorities to suspend or cancel a licence in case the licence-holder commits a breach of the conditions of the licence or the byelaws. Byelaw No. 17 enumerates the steps which the licence-holder has to take to secure cleanliness. Byelaw No. 21 provides that every occupier of a stall shall keep all his meat exposed to light and air and shall not place it in any box or closed receptacle. Byelaw No. 30 relates to penalties for a breach of the byelaws.

On pleadings of the parties it is common ground that the places fixed for being used as meat markets and meat stalls under the aforesaid byelaw No. 1 were weekly markets, meat markets and nakas owned by the Corporation.

As regards the first place, viz. the weekly markets, since a long time in the City of Nagpur for six days in a week markets are being held in different parts of the City at fixed places. On Mondays and Thursdays, however, markets are held in Sitabuldi. In these markets, sellers and buyers gather to transact business in various types of goods, and commodities such as grain, cloth, vegetable, fruits, fish, flesh, poultry etc. In these markets a portion of land is set apart for the sale of meat and there the holders of licences for the sale of meat go to sell meat and every day they have to go to different places to sell meat, except on Mondays and Thursdays when they go to the Sitabuldi market. We are informed that except in one or two markets there are no chabutras built for these meat sellers to sit for the purpose of selling meat and they have to squat on the ground and for the occupation of the ground they have to pay two annas every day.

As regards other places fixed, viz. municipal meat markets, there are 11 meat markets constructed by the municipal committees (Corporation) and they are spread over different parts of the City. These markets are well-built structures consisting of 141 stalls, both big and small, the bigger ones are called stalls, while the smaller ones are known as kenas and the occupiers of the kenas are known as kenawalas. These kenawalas sell heads, hoofs, liver etc. of goats. Besides the aforesaid 141 stalls, there are also 12 single stalls built either by the municipal committee or the Corporation in different parts of the city. They are known as nakas and are also included in the term 'Municipal meat markets'. We are informed that some of the meat markets and nakas are very near the weekly markets. Licenced meat sellers occupying stalls, kenas or nakas in the municipal markets have to pay certain fees either on monthly or yearly basis. These fees are settled either by auction or otherwise by the municipal officers. It is common ground that last time when auction was held was in the year 1948. Thereafter an attempt was made to hold auction in the year 1952 but it was of no avail. The stall holders are exempt from paying two annas every day as are required to be paid by meat sellers in the weekly markets.

It appears that besides the aforesaid weekly markets and municipal meat markets, meat was also allowed to be sold in eight private stalls and to them two types of licences were issued; one licence was for selling meat and the other was for selling meat in that particular place. It is not clear whether these places were fixed as places to be used for selling meat under byelaw No. 1. It is a matter of regret that the Corporation was not in a position to produce before us the order or notification which must have been issued by it under byelaw No. 1. Shri Phadke contends that these places must have been fixed as places for selling meat under byelaw No. 1. He further contends that, at any rate, the Corporation had power under s. 348 of the Corporation Act to grant licences to those eight persons. We, however, need not concern ourselves with these eight persons as they are not petitioners before us.

On March 28, 1958, the Corporation passed a resolution bearing resolution No. 77. The translation of the material part of this resolution as admitted by all the parties is contained in exh. A-1 in Petition No. 222 of 1958. It reads as follows:

"No 77. The House took into consideration the question of deciding what should be the policy of the Corporation regarding the rent of shops and sites given on behalf of the market department from 1-4-58.

After this the House after taking into consideration the office proposal given in Schedule B and considering the amendment shown in Schedule C unanimously sanctioned the rent of shops and sites in accordance with Schedule D. The House directed that this enhancement of rent shall remain in force only for three years i.e. from 1-4-58 to 31-3-61.

Note

Since many complaints are received against the shop keepers of private meat shops, licenses to run private meat shops should not be given and Corporation should build shops owned by it wherever necessity for meat shops exists. Similarly, licenses should not be given to those licensees who sell meat after giving 0-8-0 as license fee. But license should be given to those who sell meat in shops licensed by the Corporation.

Those licensees who are in arrears of rent on 1-4-58 should not be given the concession of renewing the leases."

Acting in pursuance of the decision taken in this resolution the Market Superintendent, in the first instance, served a notice on March 30, 1958, on all the stall holders in Hansapuri and Machhisath municipal markets. The translation of that notice, as admitted by all the parties, is as given in exh. A-2 in Special Civil Application No. 222 of 1958. It reads:

"Mr. _____ is hereby given notice that you took the license (parvana) for 1957-58 of the Corporation shop No. _____ in your possession in the _____ mutton market at _____ for Rs. _____ per year. Its period ended on 31-3-58.

The Corporation has by its resolution No. 77 dated 28-3-1958 determined the fee (shulk) for the shop in your possession to be Rs. _____ per year. If you want to take the license from 1-4-58 at this rate, three months fee in advance and the current license fee for April at the rate of Rs. _____ per year should be deposited in eight days and agreement should also be given in writing. If taking into consideration the above matter you can not afford to take the license, the shop in your possession should be immediately vacated and handed over to the Market Superintendent of the Corporation. In default, the Corporation will take legal proceedings against you and will not at all be responsible for the loss incurred by you.

Date 30-3-58.

Sd/- Illegible,
Market Superintendent,
Corporation of the City of Nagpur, Nagpur."

In the second instance, the Market Superintendent of the Corporation of the City of Nagpur, put up a similarly worded intimation dated May 29, 1958, on all the municipal slaughter-houses. The translation of the said intimation, as admitted by all the parties, is contained in 'exh. A-2' in Special Civil Application No. 198 of 1958. It reads:

"Intimation.

All Khatiks and butchers are informed that sale of mutton has been stopped in the weekly markets in accordance with resolution No. 77 dated 28-3-58. Proper proceedings will be taken against any person who puts up a shop in the market and sells mutton. And Corporation will not be responsible for your damage.

Sd/- Illegible,
Market Superintendent."

It would be noticed that the combined effect of the aforesaid resolution dated March 28, 1958, and the intimation dated May 29, 1958, was that the sale of meat in the weekly markets and in private stalls was prohibited. The sale of meat was permitted only in the municipal meat markets. But the meat sellers, who had been carrying on their business in the stalls or kenas in Hansapuri and Machhisath municipal meat markets, were required to pay higher fees. It is not in dispute that the approximate increase effected by the aforesaid resolution was from Rs. 5 and Rs. 9 to Rs. 20 and Rs. 25 per month per stall and from Rs. 3 to Rs. 6 per kana per month.

Feeling aggrieved by the aforesaid action of the Corporation, 159 persons (petitioners in Special Civil Applications Nos. 198/58 and 286/58) who claim to be doing business of selling meat in weekly markets; 42 persons (petitioners in Special Civil Application No. 222 of 1958) who claim to be the stall holders or the kenawallas in Hansapuri and Machhisath municipal meat markets and 5 persons (petitioners in Special Civil Application No. 243 of 1958), who say that they want to do business of selling meat in private stalls have approached this Court under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution.

Though a large number of allegations were made and various reliefs were asked in these applications, at the stage of arguments reference was not made to all of them. We, therefore, do not consider it necessary to reproduce in detail the pleas raised and the reliefs asked. It will be convenient to refer to the material pleas raised when we deal with the applications specifically.

Turning now to Special Civil Applications Nos. 198 of 1958 and 286 of 1958, as already stated the petitioners in these applications claim that they had been doing the business of selling meat in the weekly markets. We have already referred above to the manner in which this business was conducted. According to the petitioners weekly markets are being held from time immemorial and meat is also being sold therein from time immemorial and they claim that the business of selling meat in weekly markets has been their ancestral business. The Corporation admits that weekly markets are being held and meat is being sold in these markets from time immemorial. It, however, does not admit that all the petitioners had been doing the business of selling meat in weekly markets as their ancestral business. It, however, admits that some of them have been doing this business. Common law right of a person who intends to sell his goods in the markets in the words of the well renowned and learned author Lord Halsbury is as follows:

"General rights of the public.

"At all times when a market ought lawfully to be held every member of the public has, of common right, the liberty to enter and frequent the market-place for the purpose of bringing thither and there exposing for sale and selling, or of buying, such commodities as are vendible in the market." (Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd Edition, Volume XXII, Paragraph 65 at page 47).

The right available to an intending seller in a public market in India was also the same though it could be curtailed by a statute and such was the position till the advent of the Constitution. The aforesaid right of a seller available to him in Common law, in our opinion, is now enshrined in and is guaranteed to him under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. The learned Chief Justice of the Supreme Court (Das J. as he then was) delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court in *Mohd. Yasin v. Town Area Committee, Jalalabad*¹ observed (p. 117):

"...Under Article 19(1)(g) the citizen has the right to carry on any occupation, trade or business which right under that clause is apparently to be unfettered. The only restriction to this unfettered right is the authority of the State to make a law relating to the carrying on of such occupation, trade or business as mentioned in clause (6) of that article..."

Turning to cl. (6) of art. 19 of the Constitution, it would be noted that there are two limitations imposed on the power of the State to make a law relating to restrictions on the carrying on of a trade or occupation or business and those restrictions are that the law must be in the interests of the general public and the restrictions must be reasonable.

In the instant cases it cannot be doubted that the petitioners were, at any rate, some of them had been carrying on the business of selling meat in weekly markets and as a result of the aforesaid resolution and the intimation posted on the slaughter houses they have now been prohibited from selling meat in weekly markets. This has resulted in imposing restriction on their freedom to do their business in weekly markets. It has, therefore, to be first seen whether there is any valid law under which this restriction has been imposed, and if there is any valid law to sustain this restriction, then it would be necessary to see whether the restriction imposed was in the interests of the general public and whether it is reasonable.

Shri Bobde, learned counsel for the petitioners in these two petitions, in the first instance, contends that the action taken by the Corporation in prohibiting the petitioners from selling meat in weekly markets by merely passing a resolution and fixing an intimation on the slaughter houses was not within the competence of the Corporation as it is not authorised by any provision of the law. He says that these markets are of very ancient origin and to prohibit the sale of meat in these markets it is necessary for the Corporation to have a byelaw to that effect made. At any rate, he further contends that as byelaw No. 1 provides that the places where meat is to be sold are to be fixed with the previous sanction of the Deputy Commissioner—weekly markets being places so fixed for the sale of meat—it was necessary for the Corporation to have obtained sanction of the Deputy Commissioner before prohibiting the sale of meat in weekly markets. The Corporation not having done so, the action taken by it was illegal. In this connection reference was made to s. 20 of the O. P. and

Berar General Clauses Act. In the second instance, Shri Bobde contends that even if it is assumed that the action taken was under any provision of law, it was not taken in the interests of the general public but was taken purely for securing a financial gain to the Corporation. The Corporation has raised rents of meat stalls in two municipal meat markets and to secure customers for the stalls therein it is prohibiting sale of meat in weekly markets. In short, Shri Bobde's contention is that the action taken by the Corporation in prohibiting the sale of meat is mala fide. In the third instance, Shri Bobde contends that, at any rate, the restrictions imposed are not reasonable but are excessive. According to the Corporation authorities the sale of meat in weekly markets was prohibited to secure hygienic conditions for the sale of meat. The Corporation has contended that in weekly markets meat offered for sale was exposed to sun and rain, it was coming in contact with mud in the rainy season and thus caused its deterioration and to prevent this this action was taken. According to Shri Bobde, if that was the object in prohibiting sale of meat then the same thing could have been achieved by imposing a condition on the meat sellers in weekly markets that meat offered for sale should be stored in boxes covered on the top so as to prevent exposure of meat to sun and rain with a wire netting to the side to secure passage of free air and light to the meat. This could have been achieved without putting meat sellers to unnecessary expense. Now, if meat sellers have to carry on the business they would be required to hire six different stalls in six different markets. These stalls they could use only once or twice in a week and yet they would be required to pay Rs. 50 per stall per month. Even if they build their own stalls they would be required to build six stalls in six different markets and each stall might easily cost about Rs. 1,500. Thus the cost involved either in hiring stalls in six weekly markets or in building private stalls being exorbitant the meat sellers would be forced to stop their business. The restrictions, thus Shri Bobde contends, are not reasonable but are excessive.

Shri Phadke, learned counsel for the Corporation, on the other hand contends that the Corporation is authorised to prohibit sale of meat in weekly markets by passing a resolution under the provisions of s. 57(1)(m) of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act. He further contends that byelaw No. 1 only fixes the outer boundary of the market within the limits of which meat can be allowed to be sold. It does not fix the place within those limits where meat is to be allowed to be sold. The power to fix that place is contained in the byelaws framed under s. 179, sub-s. (1), cl. (b), of the C. P. Municipalities Act which are reproduced at page 64 of Part III of the Book styled as "Corporation of the City of Nagpur Byelaws framed by the Nagpur Municipal Committee." He contends that this place is fixed under byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 64 of the Book. For fixing such a place no sanction of the Deputy Commissioner is required. It was, therefore, not necessary for the Corporation to have obtained the sanction of the Deputy Commissioner to prohibit the sale of meat in weekly markets and it is under the provisions of byelaw No. 1 of the byelaws appearing at page 64 that the Corporation has prohibited the sale of meat in weekly markets. He further contends that even assuming that byelaw No. 1 at page 91 governed this case the provisions of s. 20 of the General Clauses Act had no application to the facts of the present cases as the byelaws framed under the Municipal Act is not a law. Therefore, though sanction of the Deputy Commissioner is required for fixing a place for the sale of meat, under the aforesaid byelaw No. 1, his permission is not required for its discontinuance. Shri Phadke faintly argued that what the Corporation has done is not to prohibit the sale of meat in weekly markets for all the time but the sale is only prohibited temporarily till such time as the Corporation is in a position to make adequate arrangements by building stalls therein for the sale of meat.

As regards the second contention of Shri Bobde, Shri Phadke says that the Corporation has not prohibited the sale of meat in weekly markets with a view to achieve any financial gain. The conditions under which meat was sold in weekly markets were very unhygienic and it was only in the interests of the public health that the Corporation had prohibited the sale of meat in weekly markets. As regards the third contention Shri Phadke says that the restrictions imposed are not unreasonable, but, on the other hand, that is the only alternative to secure sale of meat in hygienic conditions.

The byelaws made for regulating the sale of meat appearing at page 91 of the book are made under the provisions of ss. 179(1), (b-1), (d) and (c), s. 180(a), (b), (c), (d) and (g) and s. 178(5) of the C. P. and Berar Municipalities Act.

It is common ground that there is no section in the Municipalities Act authorising municipal committees to regulate markets save and except by making byelaws and these byelaws could be made under the provisions referred to above. Section 57(1)(m) of the Corporation Act provides that the Corporation shall make adequate provision, by any means or measures which it may lawfully use or take, for each of the following matters, namely:

“(m) the construction and maintenance of public markets and slaughter-houses and the regulation of all markets and slaughter-houses.”

On the strength of this clause, the first contention of Shri Phadke is based. According to him, though under the Municipalities Act there was no provision empowering a municipal committee to regulate markets, apart from the provisions made in the byelaws, now under the Corporation Act itself cl. (m) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 specifically confers a power to regulate markets on a municipal committee. The action of the Corporation in prohibiting sale of meat by passing a resolution was, therefore, an action authorised by law. It is not possible for us to accept the contention of Shri Phadke that s. 57(1)(m) confers a power on the Corporation to regulate markets merely by passing a resolution. What sub-s. (1) provides is that it empowers the Corporation to make adequate provision by any means or measures which it may lawfully use or take to regulate. What is intended by the Legislature in saying “by any means or measures which it may lawfully use or take”? To find an answer to this question it is necessary to turn to other provisions of law, and when we turn to s. 415(35) of the Corporation Act in general and to item (b) in particular, we find that it provides that the Corporation may, and if so required by the State Government shall, make byelaws in certain respects and cl. (35) relates to the management of municipal markets and the supervision of the manufacture, storage and sale of food and item (b) thereof specifically relates to the sale of meat. In our opinion, therefore, so far as it relates to regulating meat markets the means and measures which the Corporation can lawfully take in making adequate provisions for regulating it is by making byelaws in that respect and not by merely passing a resolution. It is a well-known rule of construction that where a general intention is expressed, and also a particular intention which is incompatible with the general one, the particular intention is considered an exception to the general one: (Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 10th Ed., p. 172). No doubt, in s. 57(1)(m), general intention expressed is that the Corporation should make adequate provisions by any means or measures which it may lawfully use or take for regulating markets, but the particular intention of the Legislature as disclosed in s. 415, cl. (35), in general and in cl. (b) in particular makes it abundantly clear that the intention of the Legislature so far as it relates to the sale of meat is that it should be regulated by making byelaws, and this particular intention of the Legislature has to be construed as an exception to the provisions of s. 57(1)(m). Even assuming that s. 57(1)(m) conferred a power on the Corporation to regulate meat markets merely by passing resolutions and it was not obligatory upon the Corporation to make byelaws in that respect, it cannot be doubted that s. 415(35)(b) gave an option to the Corporation to make byelaws in that respect. The municipal committees had made byelaws regulating meat markets as appear at page 91 of the Book. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Corporation Act these byelaws would be deemed to be the byelaws made under the Corporation Act. That sub-section gave an option to the Corporation to alter, modify, cancel or suspend a byelaw. The Corporation has not chosen to do so. In these circumstances it will have to be assumed that though the Corporation had a right to regulate meat markets by making resolutions, it has by its own action circumscribed its alleged power under s. 57(1)(m) by making the byelaws and, therefore, the action which the Corporation could lawfully take in regulating meat markets could only be by acting under the byelaws and not by passing a resolution.

Looking at the case from another aspect, by allowing these byelaws to remain in force the Corporation has represented to the general public that it would regulate meat markets in accordance with those byelaws. It would not, therefore, be open to the Corporation to act in excess of the byelaws in regulating meat markets.

There is also another aspect to this case. Looking to the provisions of s. 415 it would be noticed that in respect of the items enumerated therein the State Government had a right to compel the Corporation to make byelaws in respect of any or more items contained in that section; sale of meat was one of such items. Had there been no byelaws in existence regarding the regulation of sale of meat, may be, that the State Government would have compelled the Corporation to make byelaws in that respect. It would be seen that the procedure for making byelaws is elaborate and consent of the Government to make byelaws is required. This in its turn affords a check on the action of the Corporation. By allowing the byelaws to remain in force the Corporation, so to say, has represented to the Government that it has made byelaws for regulating the sale of meat. On account of this the Government might not have called upon the Corporation to make byelaws relating to the sale of meat. The Corporation cannot now turn round and say that it would regulate meat markets irrespective of the provisions of the byelaws. In our opinion, therefore, it is not possible for us to concede in the instant case that the Corporation had any authority of law to regulate meat markets and prohibit the sale of meat in weekly markets by merely passing a resolution. The action of the Corporation in prohibiting the sale of meat in weekly markets cannot be therefore upheld under the provisions of s. 57(1)(m) of the Act.

The other ground on which Shri Phadke claims to sustain the action of the Corporation is the alleged power of the Corporation under byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 64 of the Book. Turning to the byelaws at page 64 it would be seen that they were made under s. 179, sub-s. (1), cl. (b) and s. 178(5) of the C. P. Municipalities Act II of 1922. It would be seen that the word 'markets' had been omitted from cl. (b) of s. 179(1) by the Amending Act of 1934 (the Central Provinces and Berar Act IV of 1934) and for the purpose of regulating markets a separate clause (b-1) was added by the same Amending Act. It, therefore, necessarily follows that it was not competent to the Municipal Committee to make byelaws regulating meat markets under cl. (b) of s. 179(1) of the Municipalities Act after the year 1934 and the byelaws which were made prior to the year 1934 for regulating markets would become redundant by the passing of the Amending Act of 1934. Byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 64 appears to be a byelaw made prior to 1934. It cannot, therefore, be relied on for regulating the sale of meat in meat markets. Byelaws appearing at page 91 are made in July 1939 and are specifically made under s. 179(1)(b-1) and it would, therefore, be these byelaws which would govern the regulation of meat markets. Further, even assuming that byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 64 is a valid byelaw, it is a byelaw in the nature of a general provision while byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 91 specifically deals with the regulation of the sale of meat and when there is a specific provision relating to a particular topic so far as that topic is concerned it would be that specific provision alone that would govern that topic and not a general provision. It is, therefore, not possible for us to uphold the action of the Corporation prohibiting the sale of meat on the strength of byelaws appearing at page 64.

of the book. It is also not possible for us to accept the contention of Shri Phadke that byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 91 fixes the outer limits of the market and not the place within that limit where meat is allowed to be sold. A mere reading of byelaw No. 1 repels this argument of Shri Phadke.

It is also not possible for us to accept the argument of Shri Phadke that it was not necessary for the Corporation to have obtained the sanction of the Deputy Commissioner for prohibiting the sale of meat in weekly markets. It would be seen that s. 419 of the Corporation Act provides that all byelaws and rules made by the Corporation shall have effect as if enacted in the Corporation Act. As already stated, the byelaws made by the municipalities have by virtue of the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 become byelaws made under the Corporation Act. They must, therefore, have the effect as if enacted in the Corporation Act. That being the position in law s. 20 of the General Clauses Act would in terms be attracted. Therefore, in the event the Corporation wants to discontinue sale of meat in weekly markets by issuing an order under byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 91, it will have to obtain a prior sanction of the Deputy Commissioner for issue of such an order. It is not the case of the Corporation that it had discontinued the sale of meat in weekly markets by issuing an order under byelaw No. 1 appearing at page 91; it is, therefore, not necessary to consider whether it would be within the powers of the Corporation to make such an order with the previous sanction of the Deputy Commissioner. It is also not possible for us to accept the contention of Shri Phadke that the sale of meat is only temporarily suspended in weekly markets till the Corporation is in a position to make adequate arrangements for the accommodation of meat sellers. This contention is not based on any plea raised in any of the returns filed by the Corporation and further the statement is too vague. We asked Shri Phadke as to the approximate time within which the Corporation expects to make necessary arrangements but we could get no definite answer from him. In these circumstances it is not possible for us to hold that the Corporation has not prohibited the sale of meat in weekly markets but has only suspended the sale in weekly markets.

It is also necessary to deal with one more contention raised by the Corporation in the pleadings and in arguments which is that it was not the intention of the Corporation to prohibit the sale absolutely in weekly markets and that was not the object with which the resolution dated March 28, 1958, was passed or intimation dated May 29, 1958, was posted on the slaughter houses. The intention of the Corporation was that meat should not be sold in weekly markets on the open ground as it was being done before, that it should be sold in built stalls which would afford protection to the meat against sun, rain, mud and flies, that the Corporation is ready and willing to grant licenses to those persons who are ready to build stalls in weekly markets and negotiations on this basis were carried on with the meat sellers but they were not willing to accept this condition and, therefore, the Corporation had to prohibit the sale of meat. Now, on the byelaws as they stand today, refusal to build stalls for selling meat is not one of the grounds on which licenses to sell meat could be refused. The Corporation, therefore, as the matters stand today, had no authority in law to put such a condition for the granting of licenses to meat sellers to sell meat in weekly markets.

For the reasons stated above, in our opinion, the first contention of Shri Bobde must succeed. The action of the Corporation in prohibiting the sale of meat in weekly markets not being authorised by law has to be struck down.

In view of our finding on the first question it is not necessary to express ourselves on the second and third question. However, we find that the bona fides of a public body, the Corporation, are challenged and therefore we think it necessary to express ourselves on the second question raised by Shri Bobde relating to the bona fides of the Corporation. As already stated the contention of Shri Bobde is that the action of the Corporation was with a view to secure a financial gain and was not in the public interests, while, according to Shri Phadke, the action taken was to secure sale of meat under hygienic conditions. The contention raised by Shri Bobde in arguments has no foundation in the pleas raised by the petitioners. On the other hand the plea in the words of the petitioners is:

"In confining the sale of meat to the markets owned by the Corporation the Corporation is using mala fide the powers given to it by byelaws for maintaining sanitary conditions in the market for the purpose of its own enrichment by creating in its favour a monopoly of meat markets. At these meat markets the Corporation adopts a policy of getting maximum revenue from persons desiring to have stalls by putting the stalls to auction or by fixing a so-called license fee for the use of the stalls on the basis of the estimated profit that the stall holder is able to make from the stall. These stalls are beyond the capacity of an ordinary meat seller to take and the policy of the Corporation serves to enhance the price of meat to the detriment of public interest." (Para. 13 of Sp. C.A. No. 196 of 1958).

It is therefore clear that it was known to the petitioners that the Corporation was claiming that the action taken by it was for maintaining sanitary conditions in the markets and it is the case of the petitioners that that stand of the Corporation was mala fide. Now, the plea raised by the Corporation was that the sale of meat in weekly markets was carried on in very insanitary conditions and it is for this reason that this action was taken. The plea raised by the Corporation finds support in the pleas raised by the petitioners themselves. The conditions prevailing in weekly meat markets in the words of the petitioners are:

"The market is held on open plots of land without any construction of pavement, platforms, flooring, roof or any protection from sun, rain, mud, flies or encroaching dogs. Meat is exhibited for sale on ground which becomes muddy whenever rain falls and people are required to purchase meat in that condition. When any considerable rain falls selling becomes impossible and the sellers are put to great losses because much meat remains unsold and becomes unfit for sale unless heavy costs are incurred for its preservation. The only exceptions to this are that in Budhwari Market platforms for sale are constructed, floor is paved and the place is screened by old iron sheets. In Mangalwari market platforms are constructed for sale though their number is not adequate." (Para. 13 of Sp. C.A. No. 286 of 1958).

If these be really the conditions, and on admission of the petitioners they are the conditions prevailing in the markets, it cannot be said that the action of the Corporation in prohibiting the sale of meat was mala fide. True, we have held that the action taken by the Corporation in prohibiting the sale of meat in the instant cases has to be set aside but that is only because the action impugned in these petitions was taken merely by passing a resolution and by posting an intimation on the slaughter-houses which was not authorised by law. It should not be understood that we are of view that the present insanitary conditions should continue. It will be open to the Corporation to take adequate steps to remove the present insanitary conditions under due authority of law.

Turning now to Special Civil Application No. 222 of 1958, as already stated, this is an application by 42 persons who had been selling meat in stalls in Hansapuri and Machhisath markets. Their only grievance is against the increased rent. The increase is from Rs. 5 and Rs. 9 to Rs. 20 and Rs. 25 per stall per month and from Rs. 3 to Rs. 6 per kona per month. Relying on the provisions of byelaw No. 3 of the byelaws appearing at page 64, it is contended by Shri Bobde that under this byelaw the Corporation was entitled to charge only a fee for the use and occupation of the stalls. Under law the fees have to be commensurate with the services rendered by the Corporation to the stall holders. No additional service is rendered by the Corporation or was proposed to be rendered to the stall holders when it increased the fees, by the resolution dated March 28, 1958. Reliance is placed by Shri Bobde on the decision of the Supreme Court reported in The Commissioner, Hindu Religious *Endowments, Madras v. Sri Lakshmindra Thirtha Swamiar of Sri Shirur Mutt.*² Shri Bobde contends that if we look to the resolution dated March 28, 1958, it is clear that it was passed only with a view to augment the finances and it was never in contemplation of the Corporation to render any additional service. It is, therefore, not open to the Corporation to say that the fees have been raised as the former fees were not commensurate with the services rendered or that the Corporation had intended to render some additional service to the meat sellers. Shri Bobde further contends that the defence raised by the Corporation that the fees fixed by the resolution dated March 28, 1958, were commensurate with the services rendered is mala fide. Shri Phadke, on the other hand, contends that though the word used in byelaw No. 8 is fees it is not a fee in the legal sense. It is in reality a rent. The Corporation is, therefore, free to charge by way of rent any amount as it likes to the stall holders. Shri Phadke further contends that though this is the right of the Corporation it, in fact, does not charge anything more than that which is commensurate with the services rendered by the Corporation to the stall holders. In support of this contention, Shri Phadke referred us to various facts and figures appearing in the returns as well as schedules which he filed before us. It is first necessary to see whether the amount which the Corporation is authorised to demand for the occupation of its stalls is, in law, a fee, or rent.

It is common ground that the fees fixed by the resolution of March 28, 1958, were under the powers conferred on the Corporation by byelaw No. 8 appearing at page 64. That byelaw reads thus:

"3. (a) Fees shall be charged for the use of shops and stalls in any market, such fees being determined in the manner following.

(b) Every year in the month of March, the shops and stalls in any market shall be leased out for one year beginning with the 1st of April next following.

(c) The fees payable for the lease shall be settled by public auction or in such other manner as may be determined by the market sub-committee."

Reading these three clauses of byelaw No. 3 together it would be noticed that the so-called fees is only a charge for the use and occupation of the stalls that are leased by the Corporation to the occupiers and one of the modes by which the fees are fixed is by auction. These factors clearly indicate that what the Corporation is authorised to charge is a sum for the use and occupation of its property under the byelaw and the word fees is used in that sense and not in the legal sense as a charge for any special service rendered to an individual by some governmental agency or public body.

Turning to the provisions of the Municipal Act, s. 87 thereof provides for the incorporation of the municipal committee and confers powers on the municipal committee to acquire and hold property both, movable and immovable. Section 38 enumerates the items of properties that vest in the municipal committee and cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 38 shows that 'market' is one of the items of properties that vest in the municipal committee. Section 42 confers absolute power on the municipal committee to lease its immovable property for a period of three years. Sub-section (2) of s. 70 empowers the municipal committee to charge such fees as will be fixed by byelaws for the use of any building or land belonging to, or under the control of, the committee. Looking to all these provisions it appears that the word 'fees' is used in connection with occupational charges for the occupation of the municipal property and not in connection with any services that the municipality may render to the occupiers of its property.

Turning now to the provisions of the Corporation Act, s. 8 thereof empowers the Corporation to hold property both movable and immovable. Section 73 enumerates the property that vests in the Corporation and municipal markets is one of the items of property that vests in the Corporation. Section 70(2)(a) empowers the Chief Executive Officer of the Corporation to grant leases of immovable property belonging to the Corporation subject to certain restrictions which are contained in sub-a. (1) of that section. Section 78 enumerates the items that are credited to the municipal fund and rent accruing from the property of the Corporation is one of the items going towards the constitution of the municipal fund. Considering all these provisions of the statute and the aforesaid byelaws, in our opinion, what the Corporation is empowered under the Act and the byelaw is to charge an amount for use and occupation of its property and not fees in the legal sense, i.e. charges for the service which is rendered by the Corporation to the occupiers of that property. This, however, does not mean that it is open to the Corporation to charge or claim any amount it likes as rent for the occupation of its property like markets, stalls etc. It is an accepted principle in the American law that though municipalities may require the payment of fees from those occupying stands or stalls in a public market the charge has to be reasonable. In 64 Corpus Juris Secundum, page 316, paragraph 1829 under the heading "Permits and Licenses" it is observed:

"...Municipalities may require the payment of a reasonable amount as a license fee from those occupying stands or stalls in a public market, even under the general power of regulation and control, unless restricted by statute. Charges for licenses or market privileges must, however, be reasonable and without discrimination, and cannot be imposed as a means of raising revenue; but the requirement of a reasonable license fee is not objectionable as a tax for revenue...."

There can be no doubt that this principle, at any rate, would come into play when the Corporation is seeking to have a monopoly of the markets as in the instant case. As already stated, the combined effect of the resolution of March 28, 1958, and the intimation issued is that meat sellers are now left with no option but to go to the stalls erected by the Corporation. Whether this was intended or not, the action taken by the Corporation had resulted in creating a monopoly in its own favour. The Corporation, therefore, could not have claimed any fees it liked for the use and occupation of its stalls but the charges must be reasonable.

It is indeed true that the complaint of the petitioners is that the fees demanded by the Corporation for the occupation of the stalls in Hansapuri and Machhisath are exorbitant, but these allegations of the petitioners are denied by the Corporation and it is the claim of the Corporation that it is not charging anything more than what is required for providing various amenities and services which are required to be maintained for maintaining the meat markets. It says that it requires the services of the various departments like, the Construction Department, Sanitary Department, Public Health Department, etc. for regulating the markets and it is to meet these expenses and to find finance for improving the markets that the charges are increased. It is also a contention of the Corporation that the increase in the charges made for Hansapuri and Machhisath markets was made only with the intent to bring the fees on par with those on other markets. The fees are not in any manner exorbitant. This aspect of the case, in our opinion, can only be decided on recording elaborate evidence on this question. An opportunity will have to be given to the parties to substantiate their respective cases if so desired by them. It will not, therefore, be possible to decide this question in these proceedings. We, therefore, do not decide this question here. It will be open to the petitioners to institute a suit, if they so desire and if they are so advised, to get redress against this alleged grievance. In this view of the matter, Special Civil Application No. 222 of 1958 must fail.

As regards Special Civil Application No. 243 of 1958, as already stated, this application is by five persons who want to do business of selling meat outside the places fixed by the Corporation. As already stated, those places are weekly markets, municipal meat markets and municipal nakas. It is the case of the petitioners that they had applied for licences to sell meat and in their applications had stated their preference of the places where they wanted to do the business. The applications of petitioners Nos. 2 to 5 were rejected on the ground that no space was available to them. The application of petitioner No. 1 Yadavrao, however, has not been disposed of. Shri Jayawant, learned counsel for the petitioners, contends that it is not open to the Corporation to refuse a licence on the ground that there is no place for the petitioners to do their business. He says that it is the bounden duty of the Corporation to provide market places. The Corporation must therefore provide places for all those who desire to do business of selling meat. The Corporation in refusing to grant licences has failed to perform its duty. He further contends that byelaw No. 1 and cls. (i) and (ii) of byelaw 14, are ultra vires of the Constitution inasmuch as they are unreasonable restrictions on the right guaranteed to a citizen to do his business by art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. It is not possible for us to accept any of these contentions raised by Shri Jayawant. We have already summarized the position in law relating to the right conferred on a citizen under art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution and we have stated that that right could be restricted by a valid legislation provided that legislation is in the public interest and the restrictions imposed are reasonable. Here, the restrictions impugned are imposed under the byelaws appearing at page 91 of the book. As already stated, these byelaws under the provisions of s. 419 of the Corporation Act have to be taken as part of the Act itself. The restrictions imposed by the byelaws would therefore be restrictions imposed by law. It cannot be denied that the regulation of the sale of meat is in the interest of general public. Meat is a commodity which easily degenerates and therefore special care and supervision have to be exercised over its sale. It is, therefore, beyond doubt that the regulation of the sale of meat by confining it to certain fixed places is in the public interest, otherwise there is a likelihood of stale and unwholesome meat being sold to the meat-eating public and thereby adversely affecting their health. Byelaw No. 1 restricts the sale of meat to the places fixed under that byelaw and, in our opinion, it is necessary to so fix such places as it is necessary to examine meat before it is offered for sale and see that unwholesome meat is not sold. Further, a check has also to be kept throughout the day that the meat which gets deteriorated during the course of the day is not thereafter offered for sale. Unless sale is confined to certain places such a check cannot be effectively exercised.

We may here usefully reproduce relevant observations in 64 Corpus Juris Secundum at pages 317 to 319:

"...The municipality may enact any reasonable regulation necessary to preserve the cleanliness of market places, may confine the sale of particular articles to certain designated stands or portions of the market and prevent their sale elsewhere..."

"As a general rule a municipal corporation may prohibit by ordinance or by byelaw the sale of marketable articles within certain limits or during certain hours except at the established market, and it is within the power of the Legislature to authorise municipal corporations to do so..."

"It seems to be uniformly held that under a power to regulate the vending of meats, etc., a municipality may prevent their being retailed outside the public markets."

The claim of the petitioners is that they must be allowed to do business at places outside the places fixed for the sale of meat. This demand of the petitioners cannot be conceded. It would be very difficult for the Corporation to keep a check over such persons who would be scattered all over the City of Nagpur which in its turn would result in the possibility of a danger to the health of the meat-eating population of the city. Now, when the sale of meat has to be confined to certain places, it would necessarily follow that the accommodation available in those fixed places would be limited. Clause (ii) of byelaw 14 which empowers the Corporation to refuse a licence on the ground that there is no place or stall in the meat market available for the applicant cannot by itself be said to be an unreasonable restriction on the right of the petitioners to do business. It is true that the Corporation must make adequate provision to meet the demands of the city relating to the sale of meat. Whether the arrangements made are adequate or not must be judged in the light of the demand both of the sellers and that of the consumers of meat in the City of Nagpur. If these arrangements are not correlated to the demand and the places for the sale of meat are fixed in excess of the demand of the consumers to please the sellers, the possible result that would follow would be that the meat brought to the market would not get sold at the end of the day and this would naturally result in stale meat being clandestinely sold to the consumers. It is next to impossible to keep a watch over each and every seller of meat if selling of meat is allowed at places chosen by the sellers. It is true that it is the case of the petitioners that the places provided by the Corporation for the sale of meat are not even adequate considering the demand of the consumers. The allegation of the petitioners has been denied by the Corporation. It is, therefore, not possible for us to place absolute reliance on the allegation of the petitioners. It has not been shown to us that there has been any general agitation by the consumers or even by the sellers that the places which had been so far fixed for sale of meat had not been adequate to meet the demand of the consumers of the city. The challenge of the petitioners to the vires of the byelaw No. 1 and cl. (i) of byelaw No. 14 on the ground of the alleged restrictions on the petitioners' right to do business must, therefore, fail.

As regards cl. (i) of the byelaw No. 14, Shri Jayawant contends that in that clause very arbitrary powers have been conferred on the officers concerned which are likely to be abused by them. Clause (i) of that byelaw provides that a licence could be refused to an applicant on the ground that he is a bad character or suffering from any contagious or infectious disease. Nowhere in the byelaws, it has been defined what "bad character" means or what is meant by a contagious or infectious disease. The officer concerned may even call cold a contagious disease and may refuse licence on that ground of cold. This clause is, therefore, bad in law.

It is true that the terms "bad character" and "contagious or infectious disease" are not defined in the byelaws but then it must be assumed that the officer concerned would understand these terms as they are generally understood by any reasonable person and that he would not be capricious and arbitrary in deciding the application for the grant of a licence. It is to be noticed that the Act makes a provision for an appeal against the decision of a subordinate officer of the Corporation. Maybe, that some officers in certain cases may act capriciously or arbitrarily but then there is an adequate provision made in the Act to get their orders set aside by way of an appeal. In these circumstances this contention of Shri Jayawant also must fail.

The test to be applied in considering whether the restrictions imposed by law are reasonable or not within the meaning of cl. (6) of art. 19 of the Constitution is laid down by a Division Bench of this Court in C. B. H. Ready-money Ltd. v. State of Bombay.³ In our opinion, it is well summarised in the first placitum of the report:

"When a Legislature imposes restrictions upon the fundamental rights of a citizen, the Court must not judge these restrictions by any absolute standard. Whether the restrictions are reasonable or not must largely depend upon what is the object the Legislature is seeking to achieve by legislation and what is the mischief it is aiming at. If the restrictions are necessary and essential in order to achieve the object and to remove the mischief, then ordinarily the Court must uphold those restrictions. To the extent that the restrictions go beyond the necessity for achieving the object or removing the mischief, the restrictions would be unreasonable. Only those restrictions are permissible which are in the interests of general public. If the law which is passed and the policy which is sought to be enforced is in the interests of the general public, then any restriction which makes it possible to enforce the law must equally be in the interests of the policy. It would be erroneous to consider every restriction from the point of view of some vague and indefinite standard which might be set up as to personal liberty and individual rights. Personal freedom and the rights of the individual must be cir-cumscripted by what the Legislature considers to be in the interests of the general public."

Applying this test to the facts of this case for reasons above, in our view, the restrictions imposed by byelaw No. 1 and cls. (i) and (ii) of byelaw 14 are not liable to be struck down on the ground of unreasonableness. We are aware that when the applications of petitioners Nos. 2 to 5 for the grant of licences were refused the Corporation was not intending to grant licences to sell meat in the weekly markets. We are also aware that the application of petitioner No. 1 has not yet been decided. As a result of our decision it would be now open to the sellers who are desirous of selling meat in the weekly markets to apply for licences. We, therefore, asked the petitioners whether they would like to apply for licences to sell meat either in the weekly markets or in the stalls in the municipal markets. Shri Jayawant states before us that the petitioners are not desirous of doing business of selling meat in the weekly markets as the conditions under which meat is sold there are not suitable to them. He also stated that the fees demanded by the Corporation for selling meat in the municipal stalls in the municipal markets are beyond the means of the petitioners. Their demand is that they should be granted licences to sell meat at places of their choice or otherwise but outside the places fixed by the Corporation. In these circumstances and for the reasons stated above it is not possible for us to concede to this demand of the petitioners and the petition must, therefore, fail.

In the result Special Civil Applications Nos. 198/58 and 286/58 succeed. Intimation dated May 29, 1958, issued by the Corporation under the signature of the Market Superintendent and posted on the slaughter-houses is hereby quashed. The Corporation is directed not to give effect to the resolution made on March 28, 1958, so far as it relates to the prohibition of grant of licences to the persons desirous of selling meat in the weekly markets. The Corporation is further directed to consider and dispose of the applications, if any already made, or such as may be made hereafter, for licences for the sale of meat in the weekly markets in accordance with law. Costs of these petitions shall be paid by the Corporation. Only one set of counsel's fee is allowed.

Special Civil Application No. 222 of 1958 fails and is dismissed. We, however, make no order as to costs as the question about the alleged exorbitant nature of the fees demanded by the Corporation for the occupation of the stalls is not decided by us.

As regards Special Civil Application No. 243 of 1958 it fails and is dismissed. Taking into consideration the alleged poor circumstances of the petitioners we make no order as to costs.

Order accordingly.

A decree made without a formal order of appointment of a next friend in a case where a minor was one of the plaintiffs or appellants, does not amount to a nullity merely on the ground of failure to appoint a next friend of the minor.

TAMBE J. This application is made by Sampatlal under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code for the rehearing of First Appeal No. 39 of 1946 decided by a Division Bench of the then High Court at Nagpur on December 30, 1954. Though it is not so stated in the application Shri Halve, who appears before us for Sampatlal, contends that the decision of the Nagpur High Court and the decree made in that appeal were null and void on account of a procedural defect.

It is necessary to set out certain facts in detail. The suit out of which this appeal arises is between the members of two branches of the family which at one time were joint. The following family tree would disclose their relationship:

It would be seen that the present applicant was plaintiff No. 5 to the original suit. It is not disputed before us that Dulichand, Punamchand, Gulabchand, Mangalchand and Sampatlal formed a joint Hindu family of which Dulichand was the karta during his lifetime. These members of the joint family instituted a suit against the male members of the other branch for the recovery of certain property which was alleged to have been left behind by Jadao Bai. The plaintiffs' case was that after the death of Jadao Bai, Nanhoolal succeeded to that property. That property, however, was kept by Nanhoolal in deposit with Ful-chand. After Nanhoolal's death, the plaintiffs succeeded to that property and demanded its return from Fulchand. But as Fulchand refused to hand over possession of the property they instituted this suit for obtaining possession thereof. In the suit Dulichand acted as a next friend of the present applicant Sampatlal. Sampatlal was at that time said to be about 7 years old. The suit was instituted in the year 1944. It failed in the trial Court and was dismissed on November 12, 1945. An appeal was preferred to the Nagpur High Court by the plaintiffs against the judgment and decree of the trial Court. Dulichand at that time was alive and acted as a next friend of Sampatlal in the appeal. It appears that both Dulichand and Punamchand, original plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2, died some time prior to 1954. We should have mentioned earlier that the appeal was presented by Shri A. L. Halve on behalf of all the plaintiffs.

On January 4, 1954, an application was made to the Nagpur High Court by Shri Halve on behalf of the remaining appellants Gulabchand, Mangalchand and Sampatlal stating therein that Dulichand was dead and, therefore, his name be struck off. Shri Halve also made another application on March 17, 1954, stating that plaintiff No. 2 Punamchand was also dead and, therefore, his name should be struck off. Both these applications were dealt with in the Registry of the Court and the Registrar by his orders dated February 3, 1954, and July 21, 1954, ordered deletion of the names of Dulichand and Punamchand respectively.

The appeal came up for hearing before the Court on October 13, 1954, and was heard on that date and on subsequent dates, October 14, 1954, and October 15, 1954, and the judgment was delivered on December 30, 1954. This appeal was also argued by Shri Halve on behalf of all the appellants. It was not pointed out by him at the hearing that on account of the death of Dulichand and continuing minority of Sampatlal it was necessary to appoint a next friend of Sampatlal nor was it stated before the Court by Shri Halve that he was not appearing for Sampatlal. The appeal proceeded on the footing that Shri Halve was arguing the appeal for all the appellants. The appeal was dismissed by the Nagpur High Court and the decree was signed by Shri Halve on January 7, 1955. On March 30, 1955, an application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court was made in the High Court by Gulabchand, Mangalchand and Sampatlal. On this date Sampatlal had not attained majority and Gulabchand in these proceedings acted as his next friend. Sampatlal attained majority on February 11, 1956, and then nearly after two years Sampatlal has made this application under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code for the rehearing of the appeal.

The contention of Shri Halve is that the decision of the appeal by the High Court and the decree made thereunder are null and void on account of non-appointment of a next friend of Sampatlal. According to Shri Halve, it was obligatory on the Court under O. XXXII, r. 10(1), of the Civil Procedure Code to have kept the appeal pending till the appointment of a next friend of Sampatlal was made. The Court not having done so its decision and the decree made are nullity. Reference is also made by Shri Halve to the decisions in Venkatrav Raje Ghorpade v. Madhavrao Ramchandra,¹ Krishnayya v. Raju,² *Pulin Chandra v. Musaffar*³ and Venkateswara v. Ravunni.⁴ We find it difficult to accept Shri Halve's contention.

It is indeed true that r. 10(1) of O. XXXII provides that on retirement, removal or death of the next friend of a minor, further proceedings shall be stayed until the appointment of a next friend in his place; but this rule, in the case of death of next friend, would be attracted only when the fact of the death of the next friend is brought to the notice of the Court. As stated above, it was not brought to the notice of the Court, when the appeal came up before the Court on October 13, 1954, by Shri Halve that Sampatlal was still a minor; that his next friend Dulichand was dead and that, therefore, it was necessary to get another person appointed as a next friend in his place. The facts stated above clearly indicate that Shri Halve well knew that the next friend of Sampatlal was dead. In fact, he had even applied after the death of Dulichand, the next friend of Sampatlal, not only on behalf of Gulabchand and Mangalchand but also on behalf of Sampatlal that Dulichand's name should be removed. It was not stated in that application also that Sampatlal was then a minor and, therefore, it was necessary to get another person appointed as a next friend in place of Dulichand. Had Shri Halve stated this or in any other manner brought to the notice of the Court that Sampatlal was a minor on the date the appeal was heard, certainly the Court would have stayed the hearing of the appeal and awaited an application under O. XXXII, r. 10(2) for appointment of a next friend for minor Sampatlal. It would be seen from the provisions of that sub-rule that, in the first instance, the pleader of the minor is expected to make such an application.

We are not now concerned with the stay of the hearing of the appeal but with altogether a different question, and that question is whether the decree made in the appeal is a nullity. In our view there is a difference between a decree obtained against a minor without appointing a guardian for him and a decree made in a suit brought by a minor plaintiff, without he being represented by a next friend. Provisions of O. XXII, r. (3), and O. XXXII, r. 11(2), of the Civil Procedure Code impose a duty on the Court to make an order of appointment of a guardian for the minor defendant when the fact of his minority becomes known to the Court. This duty has to be performed by the Court irrespective of any application for appointment of a guardian of the minor defendant. There is no such duty imposed on the Court in a case of a minor plaintiff. On the other hand it appears that it is expected of the pleader or of the person who institutes a proceeding on behalf of the minor to see that the name of the minor's next friend is shown on the record; failure of which might render him liable in costs. The decree made in a suit against a minor defendant without appointing a guardian for him may, therefore, on account of failure to perform an imperative statutory duty on the part of the Court, amount as a general rule to a nullity, but such would not necessarily be the case when a suit instituted by or on behalf of a minor without mention of his next friend on record is decided by a Court. In our view, the provisions of O. XXXII, r. 2 make the position clear. Rule 2 of O. XXXII provides that where a suit is instituted by or on behalf of a minor without a next friend the defendant may apply to have the plaint taken off the file, with costs to be paid by the pleader or other person by whom it was presented. In the event the defendant fails to raise this objection and the suit proceeds and a decree is made that decree is not a nullity; see *Kamalakshi v. Ramasami Chetti*⁵ and Suleman v. Abdul Shakoor.⁶

Sub-rule (2) of r. 5 of O. XXXII provides that every order made in a suit or on any application before the Court in or by which a minor is in any way concerned or affected, without such minor being represented by a next friend or guardian for the suit, as the case may be, may be discharged, and, where the pleader of the party at whose instance such order was obtained knew, or might reasonably have known, the fact of such minority, with costs to be paid by such pleader. True that this sub-rule does not in terms apply to a decree but applies to an order made in a suit either on an application or otherwise. In our opinion, there is no reason why the principle underlying this sub-rule should not be applicable even where a decree has been made in a suit by a minor plaintiff, without a next friend. The principle is that every order made in a suit either on an application or otherwise in the absence of an appointment of a next friend or guardian of a minor is not necessarily a nullity. Undoubtedly, it is in the discretion of the Court to discharge such an order when a proper case is made out but it is not obligatory on the Court to do so. In our view, therefore, it is not possible for us to hold that the mere failure to get a next friend appointed for the then minor Sampatlal appellant after the death of Dulichand would render the judgment delivered by the Nagpur High Court and the decree made thereunder null and void.

It is well settled that the Courts should take care of the interests of the minors and we are well aware of the principle. We would not have hesitated to set aside this decree on a proper case being made out, but in the instant case, it is not even alleged in the application that the interests of Sampatlal have in any manner suffered or that prejudice has been caused to him on account of the absence of an order by the Court appointing a next friend of Sampatlal. As already stated, Sampatlal was at the material time a member of a joint Hindu family and it is admitted before us that he is even now a member thereof. On the date of the hearing of the appeal, Gulabchand, being its eldest male member, was the Karta of the joint family and was his guardian. Gulabchand was on record and was actually prosecuting the appeal. Another adult member of the family, Mangalchand, was also on record and was prosecuting the appeal. Shri Halve was engaged as counsel to argue the appeal on behalf of all the appellants. Even Dulichand, when he was alive, had engaged Shri Halve to conduct the appeal not only on his own behalf but also on behalf of Sampatlal. The appeal was argued by Shri Halve on behalf of all the appellants on record. It has not been stated in the application before us nor has it been argued before us that had there been an appointment of a next friend of Sampatlal he would have engaged another counsel or that Shri Halve would have urged some other points than were urged by him in the appeal. In fact, we find that subsequent to the decision of the appeal an application was made to the Nagpur High Court for a certificate to enable the appellants to file an appeal to the Supreme Court and in that application Gulabchand was shown as the next friend of Sampatlal. In these facts and circumstances of the case we are satisfied that no prejudice at all has been caused to the minor Sampatlal on account of the absence of a formal order appointing a next friend for Sampatlal after the death of Dulichand. On the other hand, we are satisfied that his interests have been effectively represented and have been adequately safeguarded in this case by his guardian Gulabchand and the counsel Shri Halve appearing in the case. The principle underlying a minor plaintiff being represented by his next friend or appointment of a guardian of a minor defendant is that a minor being incapable of taking adequate steps to safeguard his interests some adult person should guard his interests. This object has been fully achieved in this case. Even in a case of a decree made against a minor defendant where it is found that the interests of a minor defendant have been adequately safeguarded by his guardian, though he was not formally appointed by the Court as his guardian, their Lordships of the Privy Council have refused to interfere with the decree made. In *Mussamat Bibi Walian v. Banko Behari Pershad Singh*⁷ their Lordships observed (p. 189):

"Their Lordships are unable to concur in the conclusion at which the learned judges arrived. The present plaintiffs were substantially sued in the former suit, and the alleged fraud has been negatived. It appears to their Lordships that they were effectively represented in that suit by their mother, and with the sanction of the Court; and for the reasons given by the First Court their Lordships attach no importance to the certificate of Durga Dutt. There is nothing to suggest that their interests were not duly protected. The only defects which can be pointed out are that no formal order appointing the mother of the now plaintiffs to be their guardian ad litem is shewn to have been drawn up; and that it is not definitely shewn that any attempt was made to serve the summons in the former suit upon the infants personally, or upon their mother..."

In our opinion, these observations would equally apply in the instant case. Here, the interests of minor Sampatlal are adequately safeguarded and effectively represented by his de facto and de jure guardian Gulabchand who had engaged Shri Halve as counsel and who had also been engaged for the minor by his former next friend Dulichand. Shri Halve had not stated before the Court that he had ceased to appear for Sampatlal. It can be safely assumed that he continued to represent the then minor Sampatlal because he was so instructed by Gulabchand. No case is therefore made out of any prejudice having been caused to the minor. On the other hand, we feel that to allow such an application would be unjust to the respondents. It cannot be said that the decree is a nullity so far as the interests of Gulabchand and Mangalchand are concerned who were majors. But what has been asked for is setting aside of the entire decree on the ground that a next friend was not appointed for Sampatlal. In our opinion, it is not open to Sampatlal to ask such a relief.

Further, it was open to him to make an application for review if at all there was any substance in the contention raised by him and pray that the decree be set aside so far as his own interest was concerned in the suit property. Limitation for a review application is only 90 days. Admittedly two years prior to this application Sampatlal had attained majority. No reason is given why a review application was not filed on the ground of an alleged apparent mistake on the record; viz. non-representation of him by a next friend. The period prescribed for a review application has long since elapsed.

This brings us to the decisions referred to us by Shri Halve in the course of his argument.

Venkatrav Raje Ghorpade v. Madhavurav Ramchandra, in our opinion, has no relevance to the question raised. It relates to the validity or otherwise of the appointment of the person who had instituted the suit as an agent on behalf of the plaintiff.

Krishnayya v. Raju is distinguishable on facts. In that case reopening of the decree was not asked for by the minor by way of an application under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code, but a regular suit was filed for setting aside the previous decree passed against the minor in a former suit. The case of the minor was that in the former suit to which he was a defendant a decree was passed against him by the trial Court. He then appealed through his guardian ad litem to the appellate Court. During the pendency of the appeal his guardian ad litem died. No appointment of a guardian ad litem for the minor was thereafter made and the appeal was decided while he was unrepresented, and on this ground it was claimed that the decree made in the former suit against him was a nullity. The contention raised by the minor failed in the trial Court. The minor took an appeal against the decree of the trial Court to the Subordinate Court and the contention of the minor succeeded. An appeal was taken against the decision of the Subordinate Court to the High Court by the opposite party and it was contended that the omission to get a next friend appointed for the minors in the prior proceedings at the appellate stage was a mere irregularity. The argument advanced was founded on the difference between the appointment of a next friend of a minor plaintiff and the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the minor defendant. It was contended that in the former proceedings in the trial Court there was a guardian ad litem appointed for the minors who were defendants. In appeal they were properly represented by that guardian. It is only during the pendency of the appeal arising out of the former suit that the guardian ad litem had died and no fresh appointment was made. This according to the contention raised was on the same footing as no appointment of a next friend of the plaintiff and was therefore a mere irregularity. This contention, however, was negatived by the High Court. In negativing the contention Sadasiva Aiyar J. observed (p. 971):

"...It might also be conceded that minor defendants who are appellants stand in some aspects in the position of plaintiffs and the guardian ad litem of minor defendants-appellants is, in some respects, in the position of the next friend of minor plaintiffs:

Shapurji Hormasji v. Monasseh Jacob. But this is not so in all respects and for all purposes: see Venkata Chandrasekhara Raz v. Alakaramba Maharani, where it was held that the guardian ad litem for the defendant in the lower Court is alone entitled to appeal and nobody else could, on the analogy of the next friend of a plaintiff, prefer the appeal without a proper appointment of himself as guardian by the Court after the removal of the original guardian ad litem.

On the question we have now to consider, namely whether a decree passed in appeal against minor appellants (who were defendants) is valid without their having been legally represented, the above argument based on the difference in procedure in some respects between the cases of minor plaintiffs and minor defendants seems to me to be of no help."

In our opinion, the decision in this case would, therefore, be of no avail to the applicant Sampatlal before us inasmuch as he was a plaintiff in the original Court and also an appellant before the Nagpur High Court in appeal.

Venkateswara v. Ravunni is also distinguishable on facts. The facts in that case were that a suit was instituted in 1905 on behalf of the minor by his next friend. Some time thereafter the next friend of the minor died. On October 26, 1906, the Munsif declared that the suit abated in consequence of the death of the next friend. The minor on attaining majority moved the Munsif's Court in 1912 to set aside the order of abatement. This application was rejected by the Munsif. He, therefore, instituted a regular suit claiming therein the same reliefs which were prayed for in the first suit instituted by the next friend. This suit was dismissed on the ground that the previous order of abatement of the suit had precluded him from claiming the same reliefs on the same cause of action. Against this decision the matter came up before the High Court and it was held by Seshagiri Aiyar J. that the order of abatement passed by the Munsif was erroneous as there was no authority in law to make an order of abatement on the death of the next friend of the minor plaintiff. The fact of the death of the next friend of the minor plaintiff was known to the Munsif. Provisions of O. XXXII, r. 10(1) came into play. It was, therefore, held that the suit was tenable. It would be seen that the suit which was pending before the Munsif was not disposed of by the Munsif on merits; it in fact had not proceeded to trial at all. This decision, therefore, would be no authority for the proposition contended for before us that the decision given in a suit on merits is a nullity merely on the ground of absence of a formal order of appointment of a next friend.

Pulin Chandra v. Musaffar is similarly distinguishable on facts. The facts were that on behalf of a minor a suit for enforcement of a mortgage was filed by his next friend. A preliminary decree was passed in the suit on December 1, 1917, and the period of grace expired on June 1, 1918. In the meantime the next friend of the minor plaintiff died and no steps were taken thereafter by anybody to get a next friend appointed. The minor after attaining majority made an application for getting the preliminary decree made final. This application was within three years of his attaining majority but was beyond the period of limitation prescribed for making an application for a final decree and on this ground of limitation the application made by him was dismissed by the trial Court. The matter came up before the High Court and the High Court held that in the peculiar circumstances of the case the article of the Limitation Act that governed the case was art. 181 of the Act and the right to the decree-holder to make an application for a final decree would accrue to him on his attaining majority. This decision also, in our view, is not an authority for holding that the decree made without a formal order in a case where a minor was one of the plaintiffs or appellants would be a nullity merely on the ground of failure to appoint a next friend of the minor.

In the result, therefore, in our judgment, the application fails and is dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed.

INCOME-TAX REFERENCE.

Before Mr. Justice S. T. Desai and Mr. Justice K. T. Desai.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 42(1)—Indian company doing business of non-resident assessee company—Under terms of agreement between companies, Indian company appointed sole agents of assessee company and Indian company not to buy products of any other company—Commission, advertising and propaganda allowances to be paid by assessee company to Indian company in the latter's territory—No difference in rate at which goods sold by assessee company to Indian company or to an Indian constituent—Whether assessee company liable under s. 42(1) in respect of products supplied and shipped directly to Indian company by assessee company.

The assessee company which was registered in the United Kingdom was doing the business of manufacturing and selling pharmaceutical preparations and medicines. Prior to 1947 it had a branch in India which used to sell its goods in the taxable territories, but early in 1947 the business of the assessee company came to be carried on by an Indian company incorporated and registered under the Indian law. An agreement was arrived at between the two companies whereby inter alia it was provided that the assessee company appointed the Indian company their sole authorised agents in India; that the assessee company would allow the Indian company commission on all goods supplied to the Indian company's territory; that the assessee company would grant the Indian company an advertising and propaganda allowance on its supplies, calculated at 20 per cent. on the nett invoice value after deduction of commissions on such supplies; that all goods invoiced by the assessee company direct to the Indian company would be charged at normal prices, a separate credit note to be sent to the Indian company for commission and advertising and propaganda allowance; that on shipments made to customers in the Indian company's territory, a credit note covering commission and advertising allowance to be sent by the assessee company to the Indian company; that the assessee company would charge the Indian company for supplies shipped direct to the Indian company at current export prices; that the Indian company would undertake to effect an energetic advertising and propaganda campaign in connection with the products of the assessee company upto the extent of the total advertising allowances received by the Indian company from the assessee company and that the Indian company would undertake not to buy or interest itself in any products other than those obtained from the assessee company. The Income-tax Department contended that there was a business connection in regard to all the dealings of the assessee company in respect of the sale of its products in the taxable territories and relied on s. 42 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922. The assessee company did not dispute its liability in respect of goods sold directly to its customers in India nor did it raise any dispute in respect of goods invoiced by it to the Indian company, but it raised a dispute in respect of products supplied and shipped directly to the Indian company, alleging that the sales made by the assessee company which had taken place outside the taxable territories were between principal and principal and as such there was no business connection in the taxable territories within the meaning of s. 42(1) of the Act:—

Held, that, in the circumstances of the case, in regard to the goods in question there was a business connection within the meaning of s. 42(1) of the Act.

The facts appear in the judgment.

G. N. Joshi, with B. J. Joshi, for the Commissioner of Income-tax.
N. A. Palkhwala, for the assessee.

S. T. DESAI J. This reference raises the vexed question of 'business connection.' Income which accrues to an assessee directly or indirectly through any business connection in the taxable territories is under s. 42 deemed to be his income arising in the taxable territories. Business connection is an expression which no Court has attempted to define. Tests have some times been suggested and criteria have been discussed but none of them offer the desired solution and for the obvious reason that in the ultimate analysis the determination of what is business connection must rest upon the facts of each particular case. The question that we have to answer on this Reference is a mixed question of law and fact and we shall take the facts as found by the Tribunal. The assessee is Evans Medical Supplies Ltd. a company registered in the United Kingdom. The assessment years are 1948-49 to 1951-52. The assessee has been treated as "non-resident" in the taxable territories in respect of each of the four assessment years. Its business is to manufacture and sell pharmaceutical preparations and medicines. Prior to 1947 it had a branch in India which used to sell its goods in the taxable territories. Early in 1947 The Evans Medical Supplies (India) Ltd. for brevity called 'Indco'—was incorporated and registered under the Indian law. The Tribunal has found that the business which was formerly carried on by the assessee came to be carried on thereafter by the Indian company. An agreement was arrived at between the two companies and it is dated April 1, 1947. The terms of that agreement, which have particular relevance to this Reference, are as under:

"(1) Evans (assessee) appoint Indco their sole authorised agents in India and Burma.
(2) Evans will allow Indco commissions on all goods supplied to Indco's territory as defined in...

(3) ...

(4) Evans reserve to themselves the right to reduce the rate of commission on any goods which may be sold at special low prices for exceptional quantities or under special circumstances. Such reduced rate of commission shall, however, never be less than 1½ per cent. except by mutual agreement.

(5) ...

(6) Evans will grant Indco an advertising and propaganda allowance on all supplies of Evans Medical Products and Evans Veterinary Speciality products supplied to Indco's territory and duly paid for, calculated at 20 per cent. on the nett invoice value after deduction of commissions on such supplies.

(7) All goods invoiced by Evans direct to Indco will be charged at normal prices, viz. Medical Products H List, a separate credit note being sent to Indco for commission and advertising and propaganda allowance.

(8) On shipments made to customers in Indco's territory, a credit note covering commission and advertising allowance will be sent by Evans to Indco.

(9) ...

(10) Evans will charge Indco for supplies shipped direct to Indco at current export prices, viz. Evans Medical Products H List; Evans Counter Adjuncts, H List minimum printed prices; Evans Pills, Tablets etc. H List Pink section, H List minimum printed prices; Evans Veterinary Products, E List, Green section, minimum printed prices less printed discounts. Drugs at the lowest H List price appropriate to the quantity supplied.

(11) ...

(12) ...

(13) Indco is authorised to appoint its own agents to represent Evans' interests in the territory of Burma.

(14) Such appointments and terms thereof must, however, be submitted to Evans for approval.

(15) ...

(16) Indco undertakes to effect an energetic advertising and propaganda campaign in connection with Evans Medical Products and Evans Veterinary Speciality Products up to the extent of the total advertising allowances Indco received from Evans.

(17) ...

(18) Indco undertakes not to buy or interest in any products other than itself those obtained from Evans."

It will be seen that under the agreement the assessee company was at liberty to sell goods directly to Indian customers and it could also do so through the Indian company. On all such sales, the Indian company got its commission as well as the advertisement and propaganda allowance. It got commission as well as the advertisement and propaganda allowance in respect of all goods supplied to the Indian company directly under cl. 10 of the agreement; in respect of all the sales made to the Indian company by the assessee; in respect both of goods invoiced under cl. 7 by the assessee company direct to the Indian company as well as goods shipped direct to the Indian company under cl. 10 as also goods sold by the assessee directly to customers in India. The assessee did not dispute its liability in respect of goods sold directly to its customers in India nor did it raise any dispute in respect of goods invoiced by it to the Indian company under cl. 7 of the agreement. It, however, raised a dispute in respect of products supplied and shipped directly to the Indian company under cl. 10 of the agreement. It was common ground before the Income-tax authorities that the sales in respect of products supplied and shipped directly to the Indian company under cl. 10 had taken place outside the taxable territories. The objection raised by the assessee company before the authorities was that the sales made by the assessee to the Indian company under cl. 10 of the agreement were between principal and principal and as such there was no business connection in the taxable territories within the meaning of s. 42(1). The ground on which the objection was based was that those sales had taken place outside the taxable territories.

The Department, on the other hand, contended that there was a business connection in regard to all the dealings of the assessee company in respect of the sale of its products in the taxable territories and relied on s. 42 of the Act. The Income-tax Officer as well as the Appellant Assistant Commissioner decided against the assessee company who carried the matter in appeal to the Tribunal. The Tribunal reached the conclusion that in respect of goods sold and supplied by the assessee company to the Indian company directly, there was no business connection, although it found that in respect of the other dealings between the assessee and the Indian company there was a business connection. The Revenue has now come before us on this reference and the question we are asked to determine is:

"Whether there is any business connection in the taxable territories within the meaning of section 42(1) in regard to the goods sold outside the taxable territories by the Evans Medical Supplies Ltd., Liverpool, to Evans Medical Supplies (India) Ltd.?"

It has been argued before us by Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the revenue, that on a proper reading of the agreement, the inference should have been that there was a business connection in respect of all goods invoiced by the assessee company directly to the Indian company under cl. 7 of the agreement as also in respect of goods directly supplied and shipped by the assessee company to the Indian company. Reliance has been placed on a number of clauses in the agreement and it is urged that there was only one agreement between the parties which covered all the operations of the Indian company within the taxable territories. It has been said that cl. 10, which, according to the Tribunal, created a separate category of transactions or separate capacity in the Indian company was an integral part of the whole arrangement under which the Indian company was appointed the sole authorised agents of the assessee company, and it is added that the place where offer and acceptance took place or where the sales can be said to have taken place has no relevance in determining the principal question relating to business connection. It has also been said that there was continuous activity between the assessee company and the Indian company. Now, this principle of the existence of continuous activity in dealings between an assessee and his business connection in the taxable territories has no particular bearing on the present case. The question before us is not whether business connection envisages a single transaction or requires continuous activity of dealings between an assessee and his business connection in the taxable territories. It is also urged that there was no restriction on the price which the Indian company could charge in respect of goods invoiced by the assessee directly to the Indian company or products supplied by the assessee and shipped directly to the Indian company under cl. 10. Reliance is also placed by learned counsel on cl. 18 of the agreement, whereby the Indian company is prohibited from dealing with products of any other merchants.

On the other hand, it has been argued by Mr. Palkhivala that the findings of fact recorded by the Tribunal on certain points are in favour of the assessee. It will be necessary for us to ascertain what those findings are. Undoubtedly, as we have already said, we shall be deciding the matter solely on the findings recorded by the Tribunal. We put it to learned counsel that there was a clear finding recorded by the Tribunal that there was no difference in the rate at which goods were sold by the English company to the Indian company or to an Indian constituent. Mr. Palkhivala said that that was what the Tribunal had done. We put it to learned counsel that it was clear from the relevant terms of the agreement that commission as well as advertisement and propaganda allowance was to be paid by the assessee to the Indian company in respect of all its products whether under cl. 7 or cl. 10 or sold directly by it to any other merchant in India. The answer of learned counsel was that that may be so under the agreement but there was no finding that the sales in question were under the agreement between the parties. This was an extreme argument. It was nowhere the case of the assessee that the dealings between the parties were de hors the agreement between them. It is for the first time that we hear that those sales could have been outside the scope of the agreement between the parties. In fairness to Mr. Palkhivala we must add that he stated that he was not in a position to say that those sales were not under the agreement. It is next submitted by Mr. Palkhivala that the Tribunal was right in taking the view that there were two capacities in which the Indian company carried on its operations. It is said that there was nothing in law to prevent the Indian company to purchase goods directly on its own account from the assessee. We agree that there was nothing to prevent the Indian company from purchasing goods directly from the assessee, but that is not the question before us. The question before us is what was the nature of the dealings between the parties; what were the incidents; what was the effect in law of those dealings in the context of Income-tax law? What we have to determine is: Was there or was there not any business connection between the assessee and the Indian company.

Now, the contention of the Revenue must succeed if it is able to show that the income attributable to sale of goods by the assessee company to the Indian company accrued to it or arose directly or indirectly through a business connection. It is well-settled law that the expression "business connection" is different from, though undoubtedly related to, the expression "business" as defined in the Act. What is insisted by the language of the section is that there should be (i) a business in India (ii) a connection between the assessee and that business; and (iii) the assessee must have directly or indirectly earned income by virtue of or through that connection. It is not necessary that the profit or gain should directly flow from the business connection. It is to be deemed to be the income of the assessee, who may well be a non-resident, even if it has arisen indirectly through the business connection in the taxable territories.

Business connection is an expression of wide and indefinite import and the Legislature has avoided any attempt at definition of the same for it seems extremely difficult, if not impossible, to expect a definition exclusive or inclusive which will aptly meet with every mode or method of business dealings and not fail in some circumstances. Actions of business men are so diverse and infinite that any attempt at a comprehensive meaning would fail to serve its own purpose. The only safe guide, therefore, seems to us to be that it should be gathered from the context in which the expression finds place in the Act itself and the object of the Legislature in laying down this fiction of law—albeit to be gathered from the language of the enactment itself—whereby putative income is to be treated as if it had accrued or arisen in the taxable territories.

The decided cases are no more than illustrative of the instances of business connection. It has been held inter alia that where the element of agency is shown to exist, the business connection would readily be established. On the other hand, the mere fact that the goods of a non-resident find way in the Indian market being sold directly to one or few selected merchants or through brokers in the taxable territories, cannot result in business connection of the nature contemplated by the section. These are cases which fall clearly on each side of the line of demarcation where a business connection must be said to have resulted. Difficulty arises where cases of this type lie close to border line and do not fall within any of the categories of business connection such as agency or instrumentality of a subsidiary company or a branch of the non-resident trader.

Now, in a case of the nature before us where there is no suggestion that there is a modus operandi which is an ingenious device or circuitous process deliberately adopted to avoid tax, we would be rather slow in holding that the non-resident trader has brought himself within the operation of the rule. But in the case before us we have elements and factors the importance of which cannot be ignored or minimised. The Tribunal has observed:

"Obviously having regard to the terms of the agreement dated 1-4-1947, there is a business connection but as already stated there is no dispute in regard to the profits that have been brought to tax in respect of such sales. There is another capacity in which Indco operates in India and that is to make purchases of Evans Medical products and other things at its own risk and to sell them in India as any other Indian merchant would do. The goods are supplied by the English company to Indco at the same rate as it would charge to any other Indian constituent except that commission is payable to Indco on the goods sold to a person in Indco's territory. The commission that Indco would get on sales made to another Indian constituent comes to it in the form of a reduction in the price charged to it. Otherwise, there is no difference in the rate at which goods are sold by the English company to the Indian company or to an Indian constituent."

It is of importance to notice in this context cls. 7 and 10 of the agreement. Clause 7 read in its proper context evidently refers to goods invoiced by the assessee directly to the Indian company but it is of considerable importance and significance to note that the price which the assessee is to get is what is mentioned in the invoice and nothing more. What the Indian company charges thereafter is not the concern of the assessee. Clause 10, as we have already mentioned, relates to products supplied by the assessee and shipped directly to the Indian company. The price to be charged is the current export price. Mr. Palkhivala sought to make a point relying on the wording of cls. 7 and 10, that there was some difference in the matter of the price charged by the assessee to the Indian company under cls. 7 and 10. The finding of the Tribunal clearly negatives that contention. The Tribunal has in terms found—that must have been on the entire evidence before the Tribunal—that the rate at which the assessee sold the goods to the Indian company or to its Indian constituents was the same, and if Mr. Palkhivala's contention were correct, that finding could not have been recorded. In any way that finding has not been challenged in this case. The conclusion of the Tribunal that no business connection can be said to have resulted rests principally on the purchases made by the Indian company of the products of the assessee at its own risk and its right to sell them as any other merchant would do. It will be seen that the Tribunal has drawn a distinction between two separate capacities or categories of business activities of the Indian company. In our judgment the approach of the Tribunal was erroneous. It should have first viewed the matter with the nature of the relevant activities and operations of the assessee as the starting point of enquiry rather than from the other end of the matter, even though some aspect of the matter may overlap and be common to both. Moreover the Tribunal has overlooked one vital factor and a crucial aspect of the case which, when considered in the whole setting, carries the nature of the relationship clearly beyond the line of demarcation where business connection must be said to exist. Here is the case—taking all the facts as have been found by the Tribunal—of a business which was once carried on by the assessee company which came to be carried on by the Indian company in 1947 in the capacity of “the sole authorised agents of the assessee company”. The assessee company sells goods to customers in India either directly or through the Indian company and in respect of all those sales the Indian company gets commission as well as advertisement and propaganda allowance. When the assessee company sells goods to the Indian company under cl. 10, there is no difference in the rate, for they are sold at the same price. As found by the Tribunal the commission that the Indian company gets on sales made to another merchant in India comes to the Indian company even in respect of such direct sales in the form of reduction in the price charged to it. So that in respect of all the goods of the assessee company that find way in the Indian market, there is the same price received by the assessee company. In this context we may as well refer to cl. 2 which states that the assessee company will allow commissions on all goods supplied to Indco's territory. It is a blanket clause applicable to all the goods supplied or sold by the assessee company in Indco's territory no matter through what instrumentality and in what manner. It is stated in cl. 6 that the advertisement and propaganda allowance of 20 per cent. is to be paid by the assessee company to the Indian company in respect of all its products which find way in the Indian market no matter in what manner or mode those goods were sold or supplied. We need not examine all the terms of the agreement some of which raise points which are of minor importance, though those clauses also read along with the other clauses would lend some support to the case of the Revenue. The Indian company as required by cl. 16 undertook to effect the entire advertisement and propaganda campaign in connection with the products of the assessee in the taxable territories and it is of significance to note that the Indian company was bound to spend the whole amount calculated at 20 per cent. of the net invoice value paid to it regardless of the fact that that amount was paid in respect of sales made by the assessee company under cl. 7 or cl. 10 of the agreement. Then comes cl. 18 of the agreement, which, when considered in the light of the whole arrangement and the nature of dealings between the assessee company and the Indian company, definitely carries the matter in the region of business connection and particularly so when the matter is viewed—as indeed in our judgment it must be viewed—from the nature of the activities and operations of the assessee. The assessee has the Indian company as its sole authorised agent in India. In respect of the goods supplied by it to the Indian company's territories directly or through the Indian company or directly to the Indian merchants, it allows stipulated commission. In addition to that, in respect of such goods, it gives the Indian company advertisement and propaganda allowance. The Indian company, as we have already pointed out, is under an obligation to spend the whole of that allowance including that paid in respect of goods directly sold to it. Lastly the Indian company is under an obligation not to buy or even interest itself in any products other than those obtained from the assessee company. This last mentioned obligation raises a crucial consideration which the Tribunal has wholly failed to appreciate. Quod the assessee it has by agreement become the instrument or channel in the taxable territories designated as “sole authorised agents” of the assessee and can only deal in the products of the assessee company. In such a case having regard to the other terms of the agreement, no distinction can be drawn such as the Tribunal has done in the matter of products sold to the Indian company and no stress can be laid on “the two capacities of the Indian agents”. We do not agree that there was any confusion in the matter when the Department taxed the assessee also in respect of its sales. The profits that accrue or arise to the non-resident and are assessed in a case of this type would have at least indirectly flowed from the employment of the same channel or the same

ASSUDOMAL M. RAISINGHANI v. MANSINGH CHUHERMAL.*

Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (XV of 1882), Sec. 74—Application to sue as pauper before Court of Small Causes granted and application registered as suit—Whether such application itself becomes plaint in case—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIII, r. 8.

Section 74 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882, contemplates a single document which, besides containing a prayer for being allowed to sue as a poor person, also contains a statement of the claim. Therefore, where an application to sue as a pauper before the Court of Small Causes is granted and the application is registered as a suit, such application itself becomes the plaint in the case.

The facts appear in the judgment.

M. C. Bhagat, for the opponents.

MUDHOLKAR J. This is an application for revision of an order made by the Small Cause Court, Bombay, dismissing the applicant's suit on the ground that there is no plaint.

The applicant sought leave to sue as a pauper before the Court of Small Causes. The claim made by him against the opponents is for Rs. 3,000 or so. His application for leave to sue as a pauper was enquired into by the Deputy Registrar. The Deputy Registrar allowed the application and granted him leave to sue as a pauper. Thereupon the application was registered as a suit. During the pendency of the matter before the Small Cause Court, the applicant made an application for amendment of the plaint with a view to show that the claim was within time. This application was taken up by the learned Judge on July 19, 1957, when he passed the following order:—

"It is obvious that there is no plaint in this case. The leave to sue in forma pauperis has been treated as a plaint and there is no application even till now to amend the said application in such a manner as to convert it into a plaint. In these circumstances, there being no plaint, the suit must be dismissed..."

Order XXXIII, r. 8, Civil Procedure Code, provides that where an application to sue as a pauper is granted, that application itself is to be registered as a plaint. That is clearly because the Civil Procedure Code requires that an application to sue as a pauper should contain all the particulars which are required in a plaint. It is true that this provision is not applicable to proceedings in the Presidency Small Cause Court. The matter there is governed by ss. 41 and 74 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act. Section 74 of that Act provides that the Small Cause Court may, whenever it thinks fit, receive and register suits instituted by poor persons without payment of Court-fees. It thus contemplates a single document which, besides containing a prayer for being allowed to sue as a poor person, also contains a statement of the claim. No provision has been brought to my notice which requires that a pauper has to file two documents: (1) an application for leave to sue as a pauper, and (2) a plaint. Now, the language of s. 74 itself makes it clear that only one document is contemplated. It may be that in some respects the document filed in this case is deficient. But that is entirely a different matter. After the Deputy Registrar granted leave to the applicant to sue as a pauper and after the suit was ordered to be registered, it could not be said that there was no plaint. The only document before the Court was the application initially made by the applicant, and after leave was granted to him to sue as a pauper and the registration of the suit was ordered, that document became the plaint in the case. Therefore, the learned Judge was not right in saying that there was no plaint. Mr. Bhagat who appears for the opponents says that it is the practice in the Small Cause Court to require two documents to be filed. That may be so. But it does not appear that there is any basis in the Act for that practice. Indeed, the object in establishing Courts of Small Causes was to devise a summary procedure for dealing with a suit. Where in a regular suit only one document is contemplated, it cannot be said that the Legislature wanted two documents to be filed in the Court of Small Causes. The application for amendment has not been considered by the learned Judge on the merits. He will have to do so now.

For these reasons I allow this application with costs and direct the learned Judge to consider the application for amendment of the plaint on merits and proceed with the suit further according to law. The Rule is made absolute.

Application allowed.

CRIMINAL REVISION.

Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar.

VISHNOO RAMCHANDRA v. THE STATE.*

Bombay Police Act (Bom. XXII of 1951), Secs. 57, 157, 142—City of Bombay Police Act (Bom. IV of 1902), Sec. 27—Accused convicted under ss. 318 & 114 of Indian Penal Code in 1949—Order of externment made by Deputy Commissioner of Police against accused under s. 57 of Act XXII of 1951—Validity of order.

Before an order can be made under s. 57 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, the person against whom the order is to be made must be convicted of an offence under Chapter XII, XVI or XVII of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, after the coming into force of s. 57 of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

G. P. Kini and Mrs. K. Pradhan, for the petitioner.

V. T. Gambhirwala, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

MUDHOLKAR J. The petitioner has been convicted by the Presidency Magistrate, Second Court, Mazagaon, under s. 142 of Act XXII of 1951 and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months.

It is common ground that the petitioner was convicted for an offence under s. 318 read with s. 114, Indian Penal Code, by the Presidency Magistrate, 13th Court, Bombay, on November 16, 1949, and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one month. On October 15, 1957, the Deputy Commissioner of Police, Crime Branch, C.I.D., Greater Bombay, made an order under s. 57 of the Bombay Police Act, externing the petitioner. At that time the petitioner was facing a prosecution under s. 411, Indian Penal Code, or in the alternative under s. 124 of the Bombay Police Act. The externment order was, therefore, not executed on the petitioner and he was allowed to stay on within the limits of Greater Bombay. On July 10, 1958, the criminal case came to an end and the petitioner was acquitted. Immediately thereafter, he was taken by a police constable to Mumbra railway station and left there. According to the prosecution, the petitioner, instead of staying out of Greater Bombay, came into the city in breach of the aforesaid order and was arrested by a police constable near Pydhonie. The petitioner, on the other hand, contends that though he was originally taken by a police constable to Mumbra, he was forcibly brought by him to Byculla and from there he was forced to go to Pydhonie. The learned Magistrate did not accept the version of the petitioner and convicted and sentenced him as already stated.

On behalf of the petitioner Mr. Kini has raised three points. The first point is that the Deputy Commissioner of Police did not apply his mind to the facts of the case before making the order of externment. The second point is that s. 57 of the Bombay Police Act is prospective in application, and that before an order could be made thereunder, it had to be established that the person against whom the order is made had been convicted of an offence falling under Chap. XII, XVI or XVII of the Indian Penal Code subsequent to the coming into force of the Act. The third ground is that the belief entertained by the Deputy Commissioner that the petitioner was likely to engage himself in the commission of an offence similar to that for which he was convicted was based on the fact that the petitioner was facing a prosecution before the Magistrate in Bombay, and that since the petitioner was ultimately acquitted in the case against him, the foundation for making the order had disappeared.

It is not necessary for me to deal with the first and the third points because, in my opinion, the second point is a good one and must succeed. Now, the relevant portion of section 57 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, is as follows:—

“If a person has been convicted—

(a) of an offence under Chapter XII, XVI or XVII of the Indian Penal Code,... the Commissioner, the District Magistrate or the Sub-Divisional Magistrate specially empowered by the State Government in this behalf, if he has reason to believe that such person is likely again to engage himself in the commission of an offence similar to that for which he was convicted, may direct such person to remove himself outside the area within the local limits of his jurisdiction by such route and within such time as the said officer may prescribe and not to enter or return to the area from which he was directed to remove himself.”

It has to be noted that the Legislature has used the present participle “has been” and not the past participle. It must, therefore, be inferred that s. 57 was intended to be utilised where a person was convicted subsequent to the coming into force of that section. Indeed, this section being a penal section, the presumption would be that it would not penalise anything that had taken place prior to its coming into force. Mr. Gambhirwala, the learned Assistant Government Pleader, however, said that s. 57 merely reproduced the provisions of s. 27 of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902, and that any liability incurred by a person under that section is preserved by s. 157 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951. It seems to me, however, that this argument does not help the prosecution. The relevant portion of s. 27 of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902, is as follows:—

“(1) Whenever it shall appear to the Commissioner of Police

(a) That the movements or acts of any person in the Greater Bombay are causing or calculated to cause alarm, danger or harm to person or property, or that there are reasonable grounds for believing that such person is engaged or is about to be engaged in the commission of an offence involving force or violence, or an offence punishable under Chapters XII, XVI or XVII of the Indian Penal Code, or in the abetment of any such offence, and when in the opinion of the Commissioner witnesses are not willing to come forward to give evidence in public against such person by reason of apprehension on their part as regards the safety of their person or property;”

Now, this provision does not make any reference to the conviction of a person for an offence under Chaps. XII, XVI or XVII of the Indian Penal Code, whereas s. 57(a) of the present Act does. If a person is convicted subsequent to the coming into force of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, for an offence under Chaps. XII, XVI or XVII of the Indian Penal Code, any of the authorities named in that section would be competent to make an order of externment against that person provided the authority is satisfied that that person was again likely to engage himself in the commission of an offence similar to the one in respect of which he was convicted. Under s. 27(1)(a) of the Act of 1902, a person who has been convicted of an offence under Chaps. XII, XVI or XVII was not rendered liable for being proceeded against under that section. No doubt, the Commissioner of Police, who alone was authorised to make an order under that section, could make an order of externment against a person if there were reasonable grounds for believing that such person was engaging or was likely to engage in the commission of an offence involving force or violence or of an offence punishable under Chaps. XII, XVI or XVII of the Indian Penal Code. But the belief has to be entertained by the Commissioner of Police at the time of the making of the order. No belief of this kind was entertained by the Commissioner of Police with regard to the petitioner in the year 1949 when the petitioner was convicted of an offence falling under Ch. XVI of the Penal Code, or at any time prior to the coming into force of s. 57 of the present Police Act; and, therefore, no order could have been made against the petitioner under s. 27 of the now repealed Police Act of 1902. Since no liability was incurred by the petitioner under the repealed Act, s. 57 of the present Act affords no assistance to the prosecution.

Now, before an order of externment is made under s. 57, one of the conditions precedent which are set out in cls. (a), (b) and (c) of that section has to be fulfilled. There is no suggestion that cls. (b) and (c) have any application to the present case. Reliance was placed only upon cl. (a), which requires that a person against whom the order is to be made has been convicted of an offence under Chaps. XII, XVI or XVII, Indian Penal Code. As already stated, such a conviction should have been made after the coming into force of s. 57. A conviction made prior to that time is of no avail.

Upon this view, I allow this application in revision, set aside the order of conviction and sentence passed against the petitioner, and direct that the petitioner, who is in jail, shall be set at liberty. The rule is made absolute.

Rule made absolute: Conviction and sentence set aside.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Gokhale and Mr. Justice Patel.

SUDHIR LAXMAN HENDRE v. SHRIPAT AMRIT DANGE.*

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), Secs. 123(4), 100—False statement of fact in relation to conduct of a candidate when constitutes 'corrupt practice' under s. 123(4)—Adverse criticism in relation to political views, position, reputation or action of candidate whether comes within mischief of section—True nature of statement how to be ascertained—Legal aspect of agency in elections.

In order to come within the ambit of the term 'corrupt practice' under s. 123(4) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, there must be a false statement of fact by a candidate or his agent which is made in relation to the personal character or conduct of any other candidate. Adverse criticism, however severe, however undignified or ill-mannered, however regrettable it might be in the interests of purity and decency of public life, in relation to the political views, position, reputation or action of a candidate, will not bring it within the mischief of the statute. The Court in such matters cannot judge these statements in the light of their decency or desirability in so far as they are political statements not calculated to attack the personal character or conduct of any rival candidate. What is objectionable is a false statement of fact, and not a false statement of opinion however unfounded or however unjustified. It is only when the person beneath the politician is sought to be assailed and his honour, integrity and veracity are challenged and such a statement is false that it can be said that a false statement of fact about his personal character and conduct is made; and once it is established that such a statement was made, the question whether there was malice or not is immaterial. In ascertaining the true nature of the statement made, the Court must take into consideration all the surrounding circumstances including the occasion when it was published or made, the person against whom it was made, the person publishing it or making it, the audience or readers to whom it is addressed as also the precautions or care taken by the publisher to verify the truth or otherwise of the statement challenged.

The correct legal position regarding agency in elections is that the relation is not the common law one of principal and agent, but the candidate may be responsible for the acts of one acting on his behalf, though such acts are beyond the scope of the authority given, or in violation of express injunction.

Describing a candidate, who is contesting an election as an independent candidate, as really not independent but as being supported by other parties or prominent persons of other parties will not amount to an attack on his personal character.

*Syed Hifazat Ali v. Mr. Mohammad Asghar*⁸, referred to.

ONE S. L. Hendre (petitioner) was a candidate for election to the House of the People from the Bombay City Central Constituency in the general elections which took place in 1957. In this constituency there were two seats and one of the seats was reserved for the scheduled castes. Including the petitioner, there were in all 7 candidates of whom one of the candidates Awati representing the Ram Rajya Parishad retired from the contest. The other candidates were S. A. Dange representing the Communist Party, G. K. Manay representing the Republican Party, G. D. Ambekar and N. S. Kajrolkar, who stood on the Congress ticket, while N. B. Parulekar and S. L. Hendre (petitioner), stood as independent candidates. The voting took place on March 11, 1957, but as some irregularity was discovered at one of the polling stations in connection with the placing of ballot boxes of the independent candidates, the Election Commission passed an order directing a repoll in that particular station which took place on March 21, 1957. As a result of the counting of votes, Dange and Manay were declared as successful candidates and they secured 3,23,526 and 3,03,875 votes respectively. The two Congress candidates G. D. Ambekar and N. S. Kajrolkar secured 1,87,941 and 2,09,769 votes respectively. The votes recorded in favour of N. B. Parulekar were 15,881 and those recorded in favour of the petitioner were 15,440.

The present petition was filed by the petitioner on May 1, 1957, in which he challenged the validity of the election on a number of grounds. The principal objections raised by the petitioner to the election were that the ballot boxes bearing the name and symbol of the petitioner were kept late, after 11-30 a.m., on March 11, 1957, at a number of polling stations and a repoll was ordered only at the polling station situated at the Victoria Memorial School for the Blind, 73, Tardeo Road; that the Returning Officer was in error in starting the counting of votes on March 14, 1957, though a repoll was ordered in respect of the polling station at Tardeo; that the Election Commission should have ordered a fresh election or at any rate a repoll in all the 53 stations where the ballot boxes of the petitioner came to be kept late; that respondents Nos. 1 and 2, i.e., Dange and Manay, along with P. K. Atre, who acted on behalf of these candidates, indulged in a deliberately misleading propaganda through written and spoken statements appealing to the voters to refrain from voting for the petitioner on the ground that he was a bogus candidate and did not believe in the cause of Samyukta Maharashtra and was put up as a candidate by Mr. Y. B. Chavan, Chief Minister, Bombay State, and Mr. S. K. Patil, President of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee and it was asserted that this propaganda was false to the knowledge of the respondents and Atre and they had no reason to believe it to be true and this propaganda prejudiced the chances of the petitioner's election and created a doubt about the genuineness of the petitioner's candidature and also reflected on the personal character and conduct of the petitioner and amounted to corrupt practice within the meaning of s. 123(4) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951; that propaganda was carried on in the Maratha paper owned by Atre which amounted to undue influence within the meaning of s. 123(2) of the Act; that respondents Nos. 1 and 2 supported by Atre and their election agents, canvassers, employees and supporters, indulged in intimidation and wholesale terrorisation and threats of physical violence, social ostracism, spiritual censure and divine displeasure against certain persons who were canvassing for the petitioner and other candidates who were collaborating with the petitioner and as such there was undue influence on a large scale practised throughout the constituency; that certain photographs came to be published in the Maratha, a daily newspaper edited by P. K. Atre, on March 11, 1957, and posters were issued on behalf of the Communist Party which made an appeal to the electors asking them to vote on grounds of community alone and as such came within the mischief of s. 123(3) of the Act; that Awati, the candidate put up by the Ram Rajya Parishad was given some gratification inducing him to retire from the contest, and, therefore, that amounted to a corrupt practice under s. 123(1) read with the Explanation to that section and that the petitioner having stood as a candidate and exercised his electoral right as such had also the right to carry on freely without any interference his election campaign and this right of the petitioner was seriously interfered with and on that account there was undue influence practised in the election so as to amount to a corrupt practice under s. 123(2) of the Act. These objections on which a good deal of evidence was led were negatived by the Election Tribunal which consequently dismissed the petition filed by the petitioner. The petitioner appealed under s. 116A of the Act.

GOKHALE J. [His Lordship after stating the facts of the case proceeded.]

In connection with the order of the Election Commissioner ordering a repoll confined to one polling station, the argument of Mr. Dhabe is that such an action is not warranted by the provisions of the Representation of the People Act. According to Mr. Dhabe, in view of the defect that was brought to the notice of the polling officer as well as the returning officer and to the Election Commission the entire election to the parliamentary seats in this constituency should have been set aside and a fresh election held. Under s. 57 of the Act, provision is made for the adjournment of poll at an election in certain emergencies. It is not disputed that s. 57 would not apply to the facts of this case. Section 58 provides for a fresh poll being taken and it runs as follows:

"(1) If at any election, any ballot-box used at a polling station or at a place fixed for the poll is unlawfully taken out of the custody of the presiding officer or the returning officer, or is in any way tampered with, or is accidentally or intentionally destroyed, lost or damaged, and the returning officer is satisfied that in consequence thereof the result of the poll at that polling station or place cannot be ascertained, he shall—

(a) declare the polling at that polling station or place to be void;

(b) report the matter forthwith to the Election Commission and to the appropriate authority;

(c) with the previous approval of the Election Commission, appoint a day, and fix the hours for taking a fresh poll at the polling station or place; and

(d) notify the day so appointed and the hours so fixed by him in such manner as the Election Commission may direct.

(2) The provisions of this Act and of any rules or orders made thereunder shall apply to every such fresh poll as they apply to the original poll."

It cannot be denied that the failure of the polling officer to keep the ballot boxes of the petitioner at the polling station would not be in terms covered by this section. It is only when a ballot box of any candidate is unlawfully taken out of the custody of the presiding officer or is in any way tampered with or is accidentally or intentionally destroyed or lost or damaged and the returning officer is satisfied that in consequence thereof the result of the poll at that polling station cannot be ascertained, then a fresh poll may be taken under s. 58 after declaring the polling at that polling station to be void and with the previous approval of the Election Commission. But it does seem that even where there is a more serious interference with the ballot box of a candidate a fresh poll can be ordered only for that particular polling station where the ballot box is found to have been tampered with or destroyed. The Election Tribunal was of the view that the principle of this section could be applied in the present case where on account of the wrong information given to the polling officer the ballot boxes in the names of the two candidates were not kept till 11.30 a.m. at the polling booth and, therefore, the order of the Election Commission would be justified on the principles of equity, fair play and natural justice. There is undoubtedly a good deal to be said in favour of this view. Mr. Chari, learned counsel appearing on behalf of the respondents, also relied on art. 324(1) of the Constitution in support of the action of the Election Commission. Under that article,

"The superintendence, direction and control of the preparation of the electoral rolls for, and the conduct of, all elections to Parliament and to the Legislature of every State and of elections to the offices of President and Vice-President held under this Constitution, including the appointment of election tribunals for the decision of doubts and disputes arising out of or in connection with elections to Parliament and to the Legislatures of States shall be vested in a Commission (referred to in this Constitution as the Election Commission)."

Undoubtedly under this article, the Constitution has created an Election Commission for the superintendence, direction and control and conduct of all elections to Parliament and the State Legislatures. But the Election Commission must act within the terms of the statute which Parliament may enact under art. 327 of the Constitution making provision with respect to all matters relating to elections. Under art. 329(b),

"No election to either House of Parliament or to the House or either House of the Legislature of a State shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as may be provided for by or under any law made by the appropriate Legislature."

The Representation of the People Act, 1951, having been enacted by Parliament, the powers of the Election Commission must be exercised in accordance with the provisions of this Act and it does seem that the Act itself does not confer on the Election Commission any power to adjourn a poll or to take a fresh poll beyond what is provided under ss. 57 and 58 of the Act.

But even assuming that s. 58 does not in terms provide for a fresh election at a polling station, under circumstances which have arisen in the present case, the only section which empowers an Election Tribunal to declare an election to be void is s. 100 of the Act and Mr. Dhabe has, therefore, argued that what has happened amounts to a corrupt practice which must invalidate the election.

Now, s. 100(1), in so far as it is material, provides as follows:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (2), if the Tribunal is of opinion—...

(b) that any corrupt practice has been committed by a returned candidate or his election agent or by any other person with the consent of a returned candidate or his election agent; or...

(d) that the result of the election, in so far as it concerns a returned candidate, has been materially affected—...

(ii) by any corrupt practice committed in the interests of the returned candidate by a person other than that candidate or his election agent or a person acting with the consent of such candidate or election agent, or

(iii) by the improper reception, refusal or rejection of any vote or the reception of any vote which is void, or

(iv) by any non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution or of this Act or of any rules or orders made under this Act, the Tribunal shall declare the election of the returned candidate to be void."

In the present case we are not concerned with the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 100. It is clear that there is a distinction between the provisions of cl. (b) and cl. (d)(ii) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100. If it is proved that a corrupt practice has been committed by a returned candidate or his election agent or by any other person with the consent of a returned candidate or his election agent, then the Tribunal has to declare the election of the returned candidate to be void. But if the responsibility of corrupt practice is not on the candidate or his election agent or any person acting with the consent of such candidate or his election agent, but the corrupt practice has been committed in the interests of a returned candidate by a person other than the persons mentioned in cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100, then it must be shown that the result of the election in so far as it concerns the returned candidate has been materially affected, before the Tribunal is empowered to declare the election to be void. It may be observed that the law in England regarding irregularities in election is somewhat similar. In Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., Vol. XIV, para. 261, at p. 150, it is stated as follows:

"An election ought not to be held void by reason of transgressions of the law committed without any corrupt motive by the returning officer or his subordinates in the conduct of the election if the tribunal is satisfied that the election was notwithstanding those transgressions, an election really and in substance conducted under the existing election law, and that the result of the election, was not and could not have been affected by those transgressions. If, on the other hand, the transgressions of the law by the officials being admitted, the tribunal sees that the effect of the transgressions was such that the election was not really conducted under the existing election laws, or it is open to reasonable doubt whether those transgressions may not have affected the result, and it is uncertain whether the candidate who has been returned has really been elected by the majority of persons voting in accordance with the laws in force relating to elections, the tribunal is then bound to declare the election void." (The Islington Division Case, (1901) 5 O'M. & H. 120, at p. 125.)

In the above case, it appears that at certain polling stations the polling continued even after 8 p.m., which was the closing hour, and a number of votes were recorded after this hour in the ballot box and a number of ballot papers came to be supplied after this hour; and Mr. Justice Kennedy, after stating his view of the law as quoted above, observed that:

"this is the view of the law which has generally been recognised, and acted upon, by the tribunals which have dealt with election matters."

According to Mr. Dhabe, the polling agents of the successful candidates were responsible for making a false statement of fact to the polling officer that the petitioner and Mr. Parulekar had withdrawn from candidature. That would be, therefore, a corrupt practice within the meaning of s. 123(4) of the Act, and Mr. Dhabe says that the evidence established that the polling agents of the successful candidates were present at the polling station and were responsible for the information given to Mr. Bharucha. It is contended further that at that polling station the polling agents of Messrs. Hendre and Parulekar were not present and only the agents of other candidates were present and, according to Mr. Bharucha, the polling agents had given him the information that both Messrs. Hendre and Parulekar had withdrawn and on that information he had not kept the ballot boxes of these two candidates in the polling compartment. Now, there are several difficulties in the way of accepting this contention of Mr. Dhabe. In the first instance, exh. P-34, the report of Mr. Bharucha, shows that the majority of the polling agents gave him this information. In his evidence before the Tribunal, he said that the polling agents there gave him to understand that the two candidates had withdrawn. If the polling agents of Messrs. Hendre and Parulekar were not there, the polling agents of the Congress candidates as well as those of Messrs. Dange and Manay would be there and, according to Mr. Hendre's letters both to the Returning Officer as well as to the Election Commission written on the very day of the election, his complaint was that the polling agents of both the Congress as well as the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti candidates had given this wrong information to the presiding officer. As already stated Mr. Manay's evidence shows, and there is no dispute on this point, that on that very day elections were also held for the State Legislative Assembly and there were polling agents of candidates standing for that Assembly and that election was held at the same polling station. It cannot, therefore, be said with certainty that the polling agents of the successful candidates Messrs. Dange and Manay were responsible for giving this false information to Mr. Bharucha. Nor is there any evidence whatever on the record to show that this was done with the consent of the returned candidates or their election agents. The petitioner has also stated in his evidence that owing to the illness of his son he had not been able properly to divide the supervision work of polling stations amongst his workers and it was difficult for him even to cooperate with his workers who were scattered over a wide area and who also believed that he had withdrawn. Mr. Dhabe has drawn our attention to the provisions of s. 46 of the Act under which polling agents are appointed by a contesting candidate or his election agent and to r. 13 of the Representation of the People (Conduct of Elections and Election Petitions), Rules, 1956, published in the Manual of Election Law, second edition, and Form 10 in connection with the appointment of polling agents, and Mr. Dhabe contends that as soon as a polling agent is appointed all his actions must be presumed to be binding on the returned candidate. We are not prepared to accept this argument. As I have already pointed out, when a corrupt practice is committed by a returned candidate or his election agent then the question of consent does not arise, but if it is committed by 'any other person' which expression would include a polling agent then it must be shown that the corrupt practice has been committed with the consent of the returned candidate or his election agent. There is no reliable evidence on the record to show that the polling agents of Messrs. Dange and Manay were responsible for giving this false information to Mr. Bharucha and there is no evidence also to show that this was done with the consent of either the returned candidates or their election agents and, therefore, in our opinion, this would not amount to corrupt practice under s. 100(1)(b) of the Act.

Even assuming that the matter falls under s. 100(1)(d)(ii), inasmuch as false information was given to Mr. Bharucha in the interests of the returned candidates by a person other than the candidate or his election agent or person acting with the consent of such candidate or election agent, then it has to be proved that the election, in so far as it concerns the returned candidates has been materially affected, before the Tribunal can declare the election to be void. Mr. Dhabe has frankly conceded that the view of the Tribunal that the defect in the election at this polling station could not have materially affected the result of the election of the returned candidates cannot be challenged, because as has been already indicated, each polling station was meant to record votes of about 1000 voters, and even assuming that all the votes in this polling station were cast in favour of the candidates other than the returned candidates or in favour of Mr. Hendre alone, it would not have materially affected the result of the election.

Mr. Dhabe has also alternatively contended that the defect pointed out, viz., the absence of the ballot boxes of the petitioner and of Mr. Parulekar at the polling booth in question till 11-30 a.m. would amount to improper reception or refusal or rejection of any vote and would come within the mischief of s. 100(1)(d)(iii) of the Act and would also amount to non-compliance with the provisions of the Act and the rules and orders made under the Act and would thus come under s. 100(1)(d)(iv). But that again would be of no assistance to the petitioner, because even in that case it must be shown that the result of the election in so far as it concerns the election of the returned candidates has been materially affected.

That takes me to the principal and the second objection to the validity of the election urged on behalf of the petitioner. This objection may be summarised as follows: It is argued on behalf of the petitioner that a false propaganda was carried on on behalf of respondents Nos. 1 and 2, the returned candidates, and by their agent Mr. P. K. Atre in his newspaper Maratha and false statements were made which would amount to corrupt practice under s. 123(4) of the Act. Objection was principally taken to three kinds of statements which were made against the petitioner: (1) that the petitioner was a bogus candidate and was really set up by Mr. Y. B. Chavan, Chief Minister, and Mr. S. K. Patil, President of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee; (2) that the candidature of the petitioner was financed by the Democratic Research Service which itself was dependent on American money; and (3) that the petitioner was on friendly terms with Mr. Y. B. Chavan before he became Chief Minister, but he left him because he failed to get contracts from Mr. Chavan and he, therefore, parted company from him but when the elections came he again stood up as a candidate supported and sponsored by Mr. Chavan. It is stated that not only were such false statements published but the candidates and their agents knew them to be false and the statements were in relation to the petitioner's personal character and conduct or at any rate in relation to his candidature and were reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of the petitioner's election and, therefore, the successful candidates were responsible for a corrupt practice which would invalidate the election as a whole.

Before I go to the statements to which our attention was drawn in this connection it is necessary to refer to the relevant provisions of both ss. 123 and 100 of the Act. Section 123, so far as material, provides as follows:—

"The following shall be deemed to be corrupt practices for the purposes of this Act:—...

(4) The publication by a candidate or his agent or by any other person, of any statement of fact which is false, and which he either believes to be false or does not believe to be true, in relation to the personal character or conduct of any candidate, or in relation to the candidature, or withdrawal, or retirement from contest, of any candidate, being a statement reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of that candidate's election."

Now, in order to bring the case within the ambit of this provision, the petitioner must prove firstly, that there has been a publication by a candidate or his agent or by any other person of a statement of fact; secondly, the statement of fact must be false; thirdly, the publisher must either believe it to be false or must not believe it to be true; fourthly, the statement must be in relation to the personal character or conduct of the candidate or in relation to his candidature, withdrawal or retirement from contest; and, lastly, it must be a statement reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of the candidate's election. Now, it cannot be disputed that the onus to prove that a corrupt practice has been committed by a candidate or his agent lies on the person seeking to set aside election on that ground. What is open to objection is a false statement of fact, and such a statement must be with reference to the personal character or conduct of the candidate. In what has come to be known as The North Lough Case,¹ it was observed by Gibson J. (p. 163):

"...A politician for his public conduct may be criticised, held up to obloquy: for that the statute gives no redress; but when the man beneath the politician has his honour, veracity, and purity assailed, he is entitled to demand that his constituents shall not be poisoned against him by false statements containing such unfounded imputations."

In The Borough of Sunderland Case,² a similar view was taken by Mr. Baron Pollock, who observed at p. 62 that any false statement, whether charging dishonesty or merely bringing a man into contempt, if it affects, or is calculated to affect, the election, comes within the election statute, and in such a case the Court has nothing whatever to do with the question which arises in cases of libel as to whether there was malice. And the two illustrations which he has given show how statements about what may be regarded as perfectly innocent acts, in England, which may be ascribed to candidates at the time of election may come within the mischief of the election statute. He observes (p. 62):

"...Supposing any gentlemen in a county constituency was to say of his adversary that he had shot a fox, and he said it for the purpose of working upon the minds of the constituency during an election, that would certainly come within the meaning of the Act. Again, if any person in a constituency, where one of the members was a temperance man, were to say that he had seen him drinking a glass of sherry—a perfectly innocent act—that would also bring him within the Act."

But then it is further stated that a greater difficulty arises when the question has to be considered as to what is a statement of fact and Mr. Baron Pollock stated:

"...a mere argumentative statement of the conduct of a public man, although it may be in respect of his private life, is not always, and in many cases certainly would not be, a false statement of fact."

In another case known as The Cookermouth Division Case,³ reported in the same volume, this is what Mr. Justice Darling stated (pp. 159-160):

"...Now, it must be noted that what the Act forbids is this: You shall not make or publish any false statement of fact in relation to the personal character or conduct of such candidate; if you do, it is an illegal practice. It is not an offence to say something which may be severe about another person, nor which may be unjustifiable, nor which may be derogatory, unless it amounts to a false statement of fact in relation to the personal character or conduct of such candidate; and I think the Act says that there is a great distinction to be drawn between a false statement of fact, which affects the personal character or conduct of the candidate, and a false statement of fact which deals with the political position or reputation or action of the candidate. If that were not kept in mind this statute would simply have prohibited at election times all sorts of criticism which was not strictly true, relating to the political behaviour and opinions of the candidate."

These remarks of Mr. Justice Darling were made in connection with the publication of a placard by the respondent in that case which was alleged to have infringed the provisions of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1895. In Ellis v. The National Union of Conservative etc.,⁴ Justice Buckley was interpreting the expression 'false statement of fact' under the same Act, which conferred on the Court the power to restrain certain defamatory statements, and the learned Judge observed:

"...The language of the statute is 'false statement of fact', and that language must be used in contrast to a false statement of opinion. The language is not merely a 'false statement', but a 'false statement of fact'. Secondly, the statement must be in relation to the personal character or conduct of the candidate. It must, therefore, be a false statement of fact bearing on a candidate's character or conduct."

In that case, the Court was considering the question of restraining the publication of a poster in which the words "Radical Traitors" were used and Mr. Justice Buckley held that the wording of the poster constituted a statement of opinion rather than one of fact. In Bayley v. Edmunds, Byron and Marshall,⁵ a charge that the candidate "hypocritically feeling in his conscience that he was doing wrong for the purpose of making large profits for himself, locked his workmen for a certain length of time and that then, some time afterwards he found that his conscience reproved him, and resolved he would starve them no longer," was held to be a statement within the mischief of the statute. In *Davies v. Ward*² referred to in Halsbury a statement that a candidate would not pay his hotel bill or debts was placed on the same footing. See Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., Vol. XIV, p. 227, Note (a) which quotes these instances. See also Parliamentary Elections by Schofield, 2nd edn., pp. 435 to 438.

It is clear from these decisions that in order to come within the ambit of the term 'corrupt practice' under s. 123(4) of the Act, there must be a false statement of fact by a candidate or his agent which is made in relation to the personal character or conduct of any other candidate. Adverse criticism, however severe, however undignified or ill-mannered, however regrettable it might be in the interests of purity and decency of public life, in relation to the political views, position, reputation or action of a candidate, would not bring it within the mischief of the statute. The Court in such matters cannot judge these statements in the light of their decency or desirability in so far as they are political statements not calculated to attack the personal character or conduct of any rival candidate. Further what is objectionable is a false statement of fact, and not a false statement of opinion however unfounded or however unjustified. It is only when the person beneath the politician is sought to be assailed and his honour, integrity and veracity is challenged and such a statement is false that it could be said that a false statement of fact about his personal character and conduct has been made; and once it is established that such a statement was made, the question whether there was malice or not is immaterial. In ascertaining the true nature of the statement made, the Court will have to take into consideration all the surrounding circumstances including the occasion when it was published or made, the person against whom it was made, the person publishing it or making it, the audience or readers to whom it is addressed as also precautions or care taken by the publisher to verify the truth or otherwise of the statement challenged. It is in the light of these principles that we have to examine the statements which have been objected to by the petitioner as having been made by Mr. Atre in his paper the Maratha on behalf of respondents Nos. 1 and 2.

Taking these statements chronologically, our attention was invited to exh. P-2, which is a letter appearing in the Maratha of February 2, 1957. That letter is signed by one Smt. Vijaya Vinayak Parpatte of Dadar. In that letter, which is headed "S. K. Patil's Scheme (designs)", a portion of three lines was objected to by the petitioner. That portion which is exhibited as B-1 in exh. P-2 reads thus:

"One man had come to inform that he was standing as independent candidate for Lok Sabha from Bombay City Central constituency. This man's candidature is also Patil-sponsored."

With reference to this statement, it is to be observed in the first instance that there is no direct reference to the petitioner at all and it has to be remembered that Mr. Hendre was not the only independent candidate in that constituency, but Mr. Parulekar also was an independent candidate. Besides, it is urged by Mr. Chari that this statement is to be found in a letter written by a reader of the paper and, therefore, no responsibility could be attributed to Mr. Atre for the views expressed by a reader. I shall deal with this point a little later.

The next statement is exh. P-3 appearing in the Maratha dated February 3, 1957, headed "Traitor's Front—Front of the people trying to cause split in the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti" and that statement seems to be from the columns in the Maratha containing comments on current events entitled 'Sword & Shield' (Dhal Talwar) and the passage objected to is:

"Really this united front of Hendre, Birje and Desai is living on the support (blessings) of S. K. Patil."

According to Mr. Dhabe, the sting in this passage is not in the description of the three independent candidates having a united front, but in the description of these candidates as having been set up by Mr. S. K. Patil. But this statement also would be in the nature of political criticism.

Then I come to exh. P-1 which is a letter appearing in the Maratha dated February 14, 1957, and signed by one, Sudhir Chavan, Bombay. The letter is given the title "History of Hendre's candidature" and the following passages including the one marked A-3 from that letter are relied upon;

"Hendre was the right hand man of Yeshwantrao Chavan in the movement of 1942, was the well-wisher and sympathiser of Yeshwantrao and used to help the latter when underground with money, means and shelter.... In 1951, Yeshwantrao started for his oath-taking ceremony after he became Minister with the cocoanut and garlands and felicitations from Hendre. After the oath-taking ceremony, Hendre gave Yeshwantrao a big dinner party on the night of the oath-taking ceremony. But Hendre did not get contracts from Yeshwantrao after the latter became a Minister. Therefore Hendre left the friendship, house and name of Yeshwantrao.

The elections came. The election front of S. M. Samiti came into being. Lists of candidates started getting ready. Hendre started efforts that Samiti should nominate him from anywhere in Bombay or elsewhere he wanted a seat to contest; when no seat was vacant he showed his willingness to contest against Jedhe. But after he came to know that S.M. Samiti was not willing to support him as its candidate he became disappointed (dissatisfied)."

Mr. Dhabe naturally laid emphasis on the wording contained in the portion marked A-3 in exh. P-1. He contends that though the writer wants to give the history of his client's candidature, in reality there is a veiled attack against his personal character and conduct, and stress is laid particularly on the passage A-3 where there is an insinuation that because Mr. Hendre did not get any contracts from Mr. Yeshwantrao Chavan after he became Minister therefore Mr. Hendre proved false to his friendship and parted company from Mr. Chavan. The question is whether the letter read as a whole is an attack on the political views and reputation of the candidate or is an attack on his personal character and conduct.

The petitioner has denied in his evidence the insinuations made in this letter. His evidence indicates that he came to Bombay in the beginning of 1945 and was interested in the business of Amortex Agency, Private Ltd., where his wife also was a director. That company was registered in April or May 1953. Before that, he was the accredited yarn purchaser of Bhiwandi Sari Manufacturers' Association. In 1946, he started an Import and Export Company called Sudhir and Co. and in the middle of 1946 he had established one silk mill called Lokmanya Silk Mills. It appears that an insolvency petition was filed in 1949 against him and he was adjudicated an insolvent in May 1949 and was discharged from insolvency in 1951. From 1951 to 1953 he ran the business of Jagdish & Co. manufacturing surgical dressings on behalf of his wife and, as already stated, Amortex Agency also appears to have been started on behalf of his wife. He admits that he had applied to the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti for a ticket in or about the first week of January 1957. Therefore, the statement in the letter (exh. P-1) that Hendre had first made efforts to get the support of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti is not unfounded. He admits to have met Mr. Yeshwantrao Chavan on some occasions but there is nothing in his cross-examination which would justify us in holding that he was trying to secure contracts with the help of Mr. Chavan when he became a minister. Mr. P. K. Atre in his evidence before the Tribunal stated with regard to this letter that it was written by one Sudhir Chavan, but he was not able to say where he lived and he stated that his address would have to be searched. He further stated that he verified the contents of that letter. He was unable to give the time and place of the reception to Mr. Chavan held by Mr. Hendre in 1951, but even with reference to that he stated that he verified the information regarding the fact of reception. Then he further stated that he did not know if Mr. Chavan refused to give contracts to Mr. Hendre, nor was he able to give the date or time of the visit of the mother of Mr. Chavan to the house of Mr. Hendre. He stated that he could only state about the fact itself and he did not know this personally and he could not give the names of the persons who gave the information to him. He also did not know personally if Mr. Y. B. Chavan set the petitioner as a candidate or gave him help.

Considering the circumstances under which this letter came to be published and the nature and the suggestions contained in the statement to which objection is taken, we are not prepared to hold that this letter contains merely statements of opinion or facts which Mr. Atre could be said to have believed to be true. A reference to Mr. Hendre not getting any contracts from Mr. Yeshwant-rao Chavan when he became a minister does not, in our opinion, constitute merely a statement of fact about the political reputation of the petitioner but, in our view, it is also an attack on the personal character of the petitioner. There are other statements in that letter which do not seem to be objectionable from that point of view.

Then the next statement to which objection is taken is exh. P-6, which appeared in the Maratha dated March 7, 1957, also in the same columns containing comments on current events, and there it was indicated that

"Dr. Naravane's lion of the Legislative Assembly will pounce upon the lion of Hendre, independent candidate for Lok Sabha, as the latter lion is intended to mislead the voters..."

This statement, in our opinion, would not amount to any criticism on the personal character of the petitioner.

Then we were referred to a statement (exh. P-31) made by Mr. Dange, respondent No. 1, which appeared in the Maratha dated March 16, 1957. It is true that this letter appeared after March 11, 1957, when the voting at all the polling stations had taken place. But the objection of the petitioner to this statement is that it was made before March 21, 1957, when a fresh poll was to take place in the Tardeo Polling Station. That statement undoubtedly contains a fling at the Election Commission which may not be fair or proper. But the objection of the petitioner is to the suggestion of Mr. Dange that Mr. Chavan and his followers were trying to get an application filed through Mr. Hendre in order to get the election set aside. That, in our view, would not be a statement which would come within the mischief of s. 123(4) of the Act.

Then the last statement to which our attention was invited is exh. P-5 appearing in the Maratha dated March 20, 1957, which suggested that Mr. Hendre, advised by Mr. Yeshwantrao Chavan and the Democratic Research Service—an institution financed by American money, was standing for Lok Sabha from the Bombay Central Constituency against Mr. Dange. This statement also is purely a political statement.

These are the only statements on which Mr. Dhabe relied in support of his contention that false propaganda intended to lower the personal character of the petitioner was made by the successful candidates. I have already indicated our view that so far as the letter written by Sudhir Chavan (exh. P-1) appearing in the Maratha of February 14, 1957, goes, the reference to Mr. Hendre seeking contracts from Mr. Chavan, after he became a minister, and his failure to get them does appear to be an attack on the personal character of the petitioner and the statement would, therefore, come within the mischief of s. 123(4). As regards the other statements, the grievance of the petitioner is that he has been described as having been set up by Mr. Chavan and by Mr. S. K. Patil and that his candidature is supported by the American Democratic Research service, but these statements would not, in our opinion, be open to similar objection.

Now, Mr. Chari on behalf of the respondents contended that we must make a distinction between editorial or semi-editorial comments contained in the Maratha and comments made by readers of the Maratha, whose letters are published by the editor. We are not prepared to accept this argument. If letters are published in a newspaper containing statements which are derogatory to persons mentioned in those letters, we do not think that the editor can escape responsibility for what is contained in those letters. It may be that the letters might contain the views of the readers and, if it is made clear, as is generally done, that the views expressed in the readers' letters are not necessarily the views of the paper, then no doubt such letters may stand on a somewhat different footing. But if the letters contain statement of facts which are false, then we do not think it could be said that the editor would not be responsible for what is stated in those letters. Mr. Atre in fact in his evidence has stated that he took precautions to verify the facts contained in the letters and he stated that when letters are sent to his paper for publication, the facts are verified but not the opinion which is of the writer of the letter himself. Referring to the letter (exh. P-2) published in his paper, he stated that he himself and his reporters verified the information, though he was unable to give the names of his reporters, but stated that he himself collected some information. He further stated that he had a strong suspicion that Mr. S. K. Patil gave financial assistance to Mr. Hendre, though he was unable to say when Mr. S. K. Patil gave money to Mr. Hendre, before whom, at what time and on what date. He also stated that when he was in the Congress he had done Congress propaganda in 1945 in company with Mr. S. K. Patil and he personally knew that Mr. Patil financed the sabotaging of opposition candidates. He further stated that he had seen Mr. Hendre in the company of Mr. S. K. Patil at least twice, when he dined in his company in the Chetana Hotel in Bombay and secondly when the petitioner emerged out of the Congress House, Bombay, in company with Mr. S. K. Patil, and that he was justified from this in inferring that Mr. Hendre was hand in glove with Mr. Patil. As I already stated, the petitioner denied that he was set up either by Mr. Patil or by Mr. Chavan. Mr. S. K. Patil categorically denied that he had set up Mr. Hendre as a candidate for the Bombay City Central Parliamentary Constituency and asserted that he had never seen him before the election and did not in fact know the existence of Mr. Hendre. The other independent candidate Dr. Desai, who subsequently withdrew, also denied that he was set up as a candidate by Mr. Patil. It has to be mentioned that though the petitioner, Dr. Desai and Dr. Birje had a sort of understanding in these elections, the latter two having stood for seats to the State Legislative Assembly, Dr. Desai and Dr. Birje withdrew from the contest and the allegation against these candidates also was that they were set up by Mr. Patil. But, as already stated, Dr. Desai denied that his candidature was sponsored by Mr. Patil. Mr. Dange stated in his evidence that he did not believe that Mr. Hendre was put up by Mr. S. K. Patil or Mr. Y. B. Chavan, though he admitted that in his speeches at meetings he expressed his apprehension that the independent candidates would split up votes and thereby indirectly help the Congress and he made a general appeal that all candidates opposed to the Samiti should withdraw. Mr. Lalji Pendse, the election agent of Mr. Dange, admitted that he did not issue any statement repudiating the propaganda in the Maratha alleging that Mr. Hendre was put up by Mr. Patil and Mr. Chavan; and this gains partial support from the evidence of witness Mr. Wable, who was examined on behalf of the petitioner. Mr. Wable stated that he was the editor of the weekly paper Shivner and at a meeting at Shivaji Park on March 9, 1957, Mr. Dange had said that independent candidates like Shri Hendre should withdraw from the contest, and if they did not withdraw, it was well known what would happen next. Mr. Dange further said that Mr. Hendre was not an independent candidate and was set up by the Congress and so he could not be in favour of the Samyukta Maharashtra. But that itself shows that Mr. Dange never alleged in his speeches that Mr. Hendre was either sponsored or financed by Mr. Patil or Mr. Chavan. The evidence, however, shows that the statement that Mr. Hendre was sponsored by Mr. Patil or Mr. Chavan was a false statement. There is no reliable evidence to indicate that the petitioner received any financial support from the Democratic Research Service alleged to be financed by American money. In his evidence, however, Mr. Hendre admitted that he knew that there was an organisation of the name of Democratic Research Service, and it has been brought out in his cross-examination that he had an admiration for the economic system of America. In our opinion, that would not justify any inference that the petitioner's candidature was financed by the Democratic Research Service or that this Service itself was financed by American money.

But even taking these statements to be false statements, it does appear that Mr. Atre tried to verify some of the statements contained in the letters published by him and believed that those statements were true. It cannot, therefore, be said that these false statements of facts were known to be false to Mr. Atre or that he did not believe them to be true. Apart from that, in our judgment, describing a candidate as really not independent but as being supported by other parties or prominent persons of other parties would not amount to an attack on his personal character. It is true that Mr. Hendre described himself as an independent candidate. It is also true that according to him, he sympathised with the cause of Samyukta Maharashtra and disagreed with the Congress on several political matters. But even then, if a belief was entertained by his opponents that he was set up by the Congress, that, in our opinion, would not amount to making an attack on his personal character or conduct. Mr. Dhabe contended that describing a candidate as other than what he was standing for would really be an attack on the honesty of his character. In this connection, he relied on Syed Hifazat Ali v. Mr. Mohammad Asghar,⁷ where a candidate set up by the Muslim League was depicted to be in league with the Congress, which was alleged to have paid him Rs. 10,000 and it was further alleged that he had promised to sign the Congress pledge after his success. That case stands on a different footing, because the allegation in that case was that not only was the candidate in league with a rival body but a traitor to the body which had adopted him as a candidate.

It is further contended that these statements, though they may not amount to an attack on the personal character of Mr. Hendre, would certainly be false statements made in relation to Mr. Hendre's candidature. Mr. Dhabe argued that the expression "in relation to the candidature" in s. 123(4) of the Act is an expression with a wide connotation and cannot be given the restricted meaning attributed to it by the Election Tribunal, viz., the bundle of rights and qualifications which entitle a person to stand as a candidate in a particular constituency as well as the factum of his being a candidate. Under s. 79(b) of the Act, a "candidate" is defined as "...a person who has been or claims to have been duly nominated as a candidate at any election, and any such person shall be deemed to have been a candidate as from the time when, with the election in prospect, he began to hold himself out as a prospective candidate;"

The first limb of this definition undoubtedly seems to refer to the qualifications of a person for being nominated as a candidate in any constituency and to the fact of his so nominated. The second part provides that that person will be deemed to get the status of a candidate with effect from the time he begins to hold out as a prospective candidate. But Mr. Dhabe's argument in effect amounts to this, that any false statement of fact made about a person, after he announced his candidature, must come within the ambit of the expression "in relation to the candidature". But that interpretation would not fit in with the subsequent terms used in s. 123(4) which refer to the withdrawal or retirement from contest of any candidate. According to the Concise Oxford Dictionary "candidature" means "standing for election, being candidate". Speaking for myself, in view of the use of the subsequent expression "withdrawal, or retirement from contest, of any candidate", in s. 123(4) of the Act, the term "candidature" must have reference to his qualifications for being nominated as a candidate in a constituency and to his being so nominated in fact. But since we have held that Mr. Atre did not believe these statements of facts to be false, it is not necessary for us to go further into this question.

That takes me to the question whether the statement contained in the letter (exh. P-1) by one Sudhir Chavan, published in the Maratha of February 14, 1957, a portion of which we have held to be an attack on the personal character of Mr. Hendre, should justify us in holding that it is a false statement made by Mr. Atre as the agent of the successful candidates. In this connection, Mr. Dhabe strongly relies on Explanation (1) to s. 123 of the Act, which says that the expression "agent" in the section "includes an election agent, a polling agent and any person who is held to have acted as an agent in connection with the election with the consent of the candidate." Mr. Dhabe contends that the term "agent" in s. 123 cannot be interpreted in the sense it has under the Law of Contract, and that under the law applied to elections it must be held to have a wider connotation. According to him no authorisation or declaration in writing is necessary and the fact of agency will be established by circumstances arising out of the general features of the case, the conduct and connection of the parties, and the subsequent recognition of the acts of the supposed agent or at least an absence of disavowal of such acts, and that the doctrine of agency is carried by election law much farther than in civil and criminal cases. He drew our attention to the observations of Grave J. in *The Boston Case*⁸ quoted in Frazer's The Law of Parliamentary Elections, 3rd edn., p. 73, as follows:—

"...with regard to election law, the matter goes a great deal further, because a number of persons are employed for the purpose of promoting an election, who are not only not authorized to do corrupt acts, but who are expressly enjoined to abstain from doing so. Nevertheless, the law says that if a man chooses to allow a number of people to go about canvassing for him, to issue placards, to form a committee for his election, and to do things of the sort, he must, to use a colloquial expression, take the bad with the good. He cannot avail himself of these people's acts for the purpose of promoting his election and then turn his back or sit quietly by, and let them corrupt the constituency."

He also relied on Hammond's observation in his book "The Indian Candidate and Returning Officer", at page 57, to the following effect:—

"In the ordinary sense of the word, a man cannot easily make another his agent without having his eyes fully open to what he is doing. But he may create an agent in the election sense of the word without being conscious of what is being done and in fact, in such a manner that when the person is ultimately decided to be his agent nobody is more astonished than himself."

Mr. Dhabe further argued that in case this principle is accepted, then it must necessarily be held that newspapers which make special propaganda for the election of a particular candidate could, in certain circumstances, be treated as the candidate's agents for purposes of election law; and in this connection reliance was placed on the following observation of Blackburn J. quoted in Rogers on 'Elections' (p. 391):—

"A candidate is responsible generally, you may say, for the deeds of those who to his knowledge for the purpose of promoting his election, canvass and do such other acts as may tend to promote his election, provided that the candidate or his authorised agents have reasonable knowledge that those persons are so acting with that object." (Wakefield, (1874) 2 O'M. & H. 103.)

Parker in his "Election Agent and Returning Officer" has stated as follows (pp. 311-312):—

"It is not necessary, in order to prove agency, to show that the person was actually appointed by the candidate; it is sufficient to show the conduct or connection of the parties, the recognition by the candidate of the acts of the person alleged to be an agent, or the absence of any disavowal of such acts. The various acts proved to establish agency may each, taken singly, be insufficient, and yet, taken as a whole, may be held to prove agency conclusively. Where the agency cannot be distinctly proved, it may be inferred or implied from the acts of the candidate, and from other facts and circumstances."

"Every instance in which it is shown that, either with the knowledge of the candidate, or of his appointed agents, a person acts at all in furthering the election for him, or in trying to do so, is some evidence to show that he is an agent; and if a person assumes to act for a candidate, and the latter accepts his services, he makes such person his agent. To establish agency, therefore, it may be unnecessary to show that the election agent himself knew of and accepted services voluntarily tendered; knowledge and acceptance by other persons in control of the election may be sufficient."

These passages and the observations of English Judges on the legal aspect of agency in elections would appear to support Mr. Dhabe's contention. Reference may also be made to Schofield's Parliamentary Elections, 2nd edn., pp. 201 to 205, where, after quoting numerous passages from decisions in election cases, it is observed that though the law of agency as applied to election petitions has been differently expressed by different Judges, all agree that the relation is not the common law one of principal and agent, but the candidate may be responsible for the acts of one acting on his behalf, though such acts are beyond the scope of the authority given, or indeed in violation of express injunction (p. 205). In our opinion, this would represent the correct legal position regarding agency in elections.

Mr. Dhabe says that there is ample evidence on the record to establish that Mr. P. K. Atre was an agent, so far as election propaganda was concerned, of both the candidates Messrs. Dange and Manay, who stood on the Samyukta Maharashtra ticket. It is not disputed that Mr. Dange was the Chairman of the Samyukta Maharashtra Election Samiti and Mr. Atre was a member of that Election Samiti. The Samiti consisted of various political parties of Maharashtra and the Communist Party was one such constituent party of which Mr. Dange is a member. There is also no dispute that Mr. Manay was a member of the Scheduled Castes Federation, now known as the Republican Party, and stood for a reserved seat on behalf of that party in the same constituency. Mr. Atre admits that the Samiti had no single political symbol, as it is a joint front of different political parties. The Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti had given badges to its workers and volunteers. There was no particular propaganda in favour of a particular candidate. There was general propaganda. Such of the workers who were carrying on active work were wearing the badges of the Samiti. It was also admitted by Mr. Dange that he and Mr. Atre jointly addressed some election meetings. He stated that when his candidature was accepted by the Parliamentary Board of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti, Mr. Atre was not present. He explained that there were two types of members of the Board, regular members and invitees, and Mr. Atre was only an invitee member. He also admitted that one Vinayak Bhawe was a member of the Communist Party and at the time of the election he was doing voluntary service in the office of the Maratha newspaper. He also stated that the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti had nothing to do with the Maratha which was Mr. Atre's proprietary concern. Mr. Atre also stated in his evidence that the Maratha was his sole proprietary concern, but he admitted that propaganda was carried on in the Maratha on behalf of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti and that he was carrying on propaganda in favour of Messrs. Dange and Manay. It would appear from Mr. Dange's evidence that the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti as such had no official organ of its own. In his cross-examination Mr. Dange admitted that he contributed, in the beginning of January 1958, Rs. 3,000 to the Maratha for purchasing a rotary machine, as his contribution to the Rotary Fund started by the Maratha. On this evidence, the Election Tribunal held that Mr. Atre was an agent of Messrs. Dange and Manay so far as speaking at public meetings was concerned, but he was not an agent with regard to propaganda that was carried on on behalf of these two candidates in the columns of the Maratha.

The finding of the Election Tribunal that Mr. Atre could be regarded as an agent for the purpose of addressing meetings has not been challenged before us, and it seems that it cannot be so challenged because admittedly a political campaign by way of public meetings was being carried on on behalf of the candidates who had obtained Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti tickets. The question is whether Mr. Atre could be also regarded as an agent of the two successful candidates when he carried on propaganda in his paper Maratha on behalf of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti candidates. It has been admitted by Mr. Lalji Pendse, the election agent of Mr. Dange, that there was a joint office of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti for propaganda on behalf of the candidates. Mr. Atre, as we have already seen, has also stated that the propaganda was carried on in the Maratha, which was his sole proprietary concern, on behalf of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti candidates and he was accordingly carrying on propaganda in favour of Messrs. Dange and Manay also. He was a member of the Samiti of which Mr. Dange was the Chairman. Now, being a member of a candidate's election committee has been held to be strong evidence of agency. See Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., Vol. XIV, p. 171, para. 304. In the case of elections, as we have already seen, the expression "agent" has to be given a wider interpretation and, in our judgment, therefore, the Tribunal's view that Mr. Atre was not an agent of Messrs. Dange and Manay with regard to election propaganda is not correct. We must, therefore, hold that so far as exh. P-1, the letter by Sudhir Chavan, appearing in the Maratha of February 14, 1957, is concerned, there was a publication by an agent of the candidates and the portion A-3 objected to in that letter contains a false statement in relation to the personal character of the petitioner Hendre. The evidence would also indicate that Mr. Atre could not have believed the statement to be true, and that statement was undoubtedly calculated to prejudice the prospects of the petitioner's election. We must, therefore, hold that so far as the portion A-3 in exh. P-1 is concerned, there has been a corrupt practice within the meaning of s. 123(4) of the Act.

That takes me to the question whether the election of the returned candidates has to be declared void under s. 100 of the Act. Mr. Dhabe's contention is that this statement in exh. P-1 would amount to a corrupt practice and would come within s. 100(1)(b) of the Act inasmuch as, according to him, it is committed by a person with the consent of the returned candidate or his election agent. In this connection, our attention was invited both by Mr. Dhabe as well as Mr. Chari to s. 100, before its amendment in 1956. Under the old s. 100(2)(b), the Tribunal had to arrive at a finding that the corrupt practice had been committed by a returned candidate or his agent or by any other person with the connivance of the returned candidate or his agent; so that under the section, before its amendment, a corrupt practice committed by any agent would have come within the mischief of this section. If it was not committed by either the returned candidate or his agent but by any other person, then, before it could affect the election, it had to be with the connivance of the returned candidate or his agent; and connivance undoubtedly means, in the context, consent, express or implied. After the amendment, the section has substituted for the expression "agent" the expression "election agent", so that a corrupt practice has to be committed by a returned candidate or his election agent; and then no question of consent naturally arises. But if it is a corrupt practice, which has not been committed by a candidate or his election agent, then before it affects the election, it has to be proved that it has been committed by any other person with the consent of the returned candidate or his agent. At one stage, Mr. Chari attempted to argue that the word "consent" must necessarily imply express consent, but he had to concede that consent may be express as well as implied. Since Mr. Atre was not the election agent of respondents Nos. 1 and 2, the question whether he was an agent for the purpose of propaganda is not really relevant for the purpose of this section. Before Mr. Dhabe's client can take advantage of s. 100(1)(b), he will have to prove that Mr. Atre, in publishing the impugned statement in exh. P-1, had either the implied or express consent of Messrs. Dange and Manay or their election agents. Now, Mr. Dhabe contends that we must look to the circumstances under which this publication was made. It is undoubtedly true that the Maratha was carrying on a campaign in favour of all the candidates set up by the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti. But the question is whether all these candidates will be bound by any statement that appeared in the Maratha. Just as Mr. Atre would be an agent for the returned candidates in respect of the propaganda carried on in the Maratha in their favour, he would also be an agent for the other candidates set up by the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti. In an election of this type, the newspaper is bound to publish statements and appeals and everything that may be published in the newspaper would not bind the candidate, unless it is proved that there was either implied or express consent of either the candidate or his election agent. Mr. Dhabe argued that though undoubtedly the onus in such cases is on the person challenging the election, the Court may have regard to all the circumstances in which the propaganda on behalf of the successful candidates is carried on. In support of his argument Mr. Dhabe relied on an observation of the Supreme Court in Jagan Nath v. Jaswant Singh,⁹ where it was observed that it is always to be borne in mind that though the election of a successful candidate is not to be lightly interfered with, one of the essentials of that law is also to safeguard the purity of the election process and also to see that people do not get elected by flagrant breaches of that law or by corrupt practices. Though this observation has been made in connection with a different set of circumstances, the principle underlying this observation has to be accepted in deciding election cases. In this connection, Mr. Chari relied on the meaning of the word 'consent', as given in Wharton's Law Lexicon, as being

"an act of reason accompanied with deliberations the mind weighing, as in a balance, the good or evil on either side. Consent supposes three things—physical power, a mental power, and a free and serious use of them."

Reference may also be made in this connection to a passage from Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., Vol. XIV, p. 170, para. 301, which is to the following effect:

"... Mere non-interference on the part of the candidate with persons who, feeling interested in the success of the candidate, may act in support of his canvass is not sufficient to saddle the candidate with any unlawful acts of theirs of which the candidate and his election agent are ignorant." Taunton (Borough) Case."

There is nothing on the record of this case which would indicate that either the returned candidates Messrs. Dange and Manay or their election agent had knowledge about this letter (exh. P-1) appearing in the Maratha of February 14, 1957. No question or suggestion seems to have been put either to Mr. Dange or Mr. Manay or Mr. Lalji Pendse, Mr. Dange's election agent, on this point. We may also observe that with regard to some of the other statements also, about which grievance was made but which we have held to be not false statements of fact affecting the personal character or conduct of the petitioner, there is no evidence to show that either of the returned candidates or their election agents had knowledge about these statements. If that be so, it cannot be held that the statement in exh. P-1 has been made with the consent, express or implied, of respondent Nos. 1 and 2 or their election agents. Giving our most anxious consideration to this question, we must hold that even this statement would not fall within s. 100(1)(b) of the Act.

Mr. Dhabe has not relied on s. 100(1)(d)(ii) of the Act, and he has frankly stated that there is no evidence that this corrupt practice, even though it may have been committed in the interests of the returned candidates, would have materially affected the result of the election in so far as it concerned the returned candidates.

That takes me to the third and fourth points which have been urged before us by Mr. Dhabe. He has relied on three exhibits, viz., exh. P-26, P-48 and P-27 (which is the same as exh. P-53) for the purpose of his argument that the election is vitiated by corrupt practice on account of undue influence and also on account of a systematic appeal being made by the respondents and their agents to the electors to vote on grounds of community, which statements, according to Mr. Dhabe, would fall within the ambit of s. 123(2) and (3) of the Act. I will take both these points together because reliance is placed on the same three exhibits regarding these points. In this connection, our attention is drawn to exh. P-48, which is a statement which appeared in the Maratha, dated March 6, 1957, over the signature of Mr. Dange as the President of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti. The statement reads thus:

9 [1954] A.I.R. S.C. 210.

10 (1874) 2 O'M. & H. 66, at p. 74.

"Brother-workers, in the name of Maharashtra and 105 martyrs, do not go out on 11th without giving votes and do not betray Samyukta Maharashtra."

We fail to see how such an appeal would either be an appeal to the voters to vote on grounds of community or how it would amount to undue influence. The appeal is addressed to the workers and it cannot, therefore, be obviously said that it is an appeal to any particular community. This appeal is published in the Maratha just before the date of the election which was March 11, and the same was declared to be a holiday. The workers were, therefore, enjoined not to go out without recording their votes. Mr. Dhabe says that this statement refers to the duty of the workers "in the name of Maharashtra and 105 martyrs" to give their votes on the 11th. We do not think on that ground it would either amount to any threat or injury of any kind or social ostracism and excommunication or expulsion from caste or community or of the electors being threatened that they would be objects of divine displeasure or spiritual censure, as Mr. Dhabe tried to suggest relying on the provisions of s. 123(2), proviso (a) (i) and (ii), of the Act. Nor can this appeal be regarded as an appeal to voters to vote on grounds of community or religion.

Then, our attention is invited to exh. P-26, which is an issue of the Maratha dated March 11, 1957. Objection is taken to several passages in this issue. There is, first of all, the appeal to "Lions of Maharashtra, make the Congress bullocks bolt away". There is also an appeal, "Saints and warriors of Maharashtra give us blessing". Then there is also an appeal to the following effect: "Worship the Shivashakti (Power of Shivaji) of Maharashtra with the 'bel' (leaves) of your votes". Then there is an appeal headed "Vow of the Maratha" with a picture below which are the words "Where is the black stone of the great bilingual? I reduced it to powder by the hammer of votes." Then on the third page of the issue, photographs of persons who were killed in the Bombay firing are published and on the top of the page there is a heading "Marathas of Bombay, take revenge of this devilish murder". Below these photographs are the words, "The Congress ballot box is besmeared with this blood of the martyrs". On the fourth page of the issue there is a picture of a hand with the Congress ballot box on the palm and on the top of the picture are the words: "Have you seen this ballot box of the Congress" and at the bottom are the words "It is smeared with the blood of the Marathas". The Tribunal was disposed to take the view that all these were political statements, however strong the words used therein, and we are not disposed to take a different view of either the statements or the pictures published in this issue.

Exhibit P-27, which is the same as P. 53, is a poster issued admittedly by the Communist Party on the same date, i.e. March 11, 1957, and on the top of this poster there are words expressing "salutation to the immortal martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the cause of Samyukta Maharashtra and Maharashtra-Gujarat" and at the bottom there is an appeal that the sacrifice of these martyrs should be remembered and the voters should make the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti successful. That also, in our opinion, is in substance a political appeal to the voters. Mr. Dhabe contended that both exh. P. 26 and exh. P. 27 contain ghastly pictures and were bound to revive the memory of firings in Bombay and would, therefore, amount to undue influence or direct or indirect interference with the electors' right to freely exercise their power to vote. It cannot be denied that these pictures were meant to be an appeal to the sentiments of the voters, but we are not prepared on that account to say that the publication of these pictures in the issue of the Maratha or the publication of the poster on the voting day amounted to undue influence which constituted any direct or indirect interference with the electors' right to freely exercise their power to vote.

Alternatively, Mr. Dhabe contended that the reference to the Marathas of Bombay in exh. P. 26 was an appeal to the voters to vote in favour of the Samiti candidates on grounds of community. Mr. Dhabe said that it might either be an appeal to the Maratha community as such or an appeal to the Marathi speaking citizens of Bombay. But even then according to Mr. Dhabe, it would come within the mischief of s. 123 of the Act. He further argued that we should not, in considering this appeal, construe the term 'community' in the popular sense of that term, and in this connection he relied on the case of Yeshwantrao v. K. T. Mangalmurti,¹¹ where a division bench of this Court construed the expression "all the contesting candidates" in s. 82(a) of the Act as meaning not merely those candidates who contested at the election but also those candidates who contested for the election, and the Court rejected the meaning of the expression "contesting candidate who retired from the contest" as not being a contesting candidate in the popular acceptance of the term. That was undoubtedly a case on different facts. In construing the word "community" in s. 123(3) we must no doubt give the word its natural meaning if it can bring out the real intention of the Legislature. In this connection, Mr. Chari referred us to a passage from Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn., pp. 19 and 20. Mr. Chari contended that we must construe the term "community" bearing in mind the rule in Heydon's case which required consideration of the law as it stood when the statute to be construed was passed, the nature of the mischief or defect for which the old law did not provide and the remedy and the reason for it which was provided by the subsequent statute to cure that mischief or defect. In this case, there is no amendment in the wording of s. 123(3) which is the same as the wording of the old s. 124(5) prior to the amendment of the Act in 1956. Before the said amendment, this kind of corrupt practice was classed as a minor corrupt practice, as distinguished from major corrupt practices included in s. 123 of the old Act. That distinction between major and minor corrupt practices was done away with by the amendment of the Act in 1956. Mr. Chari contends that we ought not to construe the term "community" so as to include therein a community of persons speaking a common language. According to him, what Parliament intended was the avoidance of rousing of communal or religious passions to influence voting at elections and that, he contends, must be understood in the sense it was always understood in this country so far. Now, the Representation of the People Act was passed in 1951 and it was amended in 1956 and Mr. Dhabe's argument in reply to Mr. Chari's contention is that in 1956 circumstances had considerably changed on account of the reorganisation of States and the agitation which ensued in connection with it, and he contends that the term "community" would also, therefore, apply to a 'linguistic' community and reliance is placed on the principle of construction which allows the extension of the language of a statute to new circumstances. In this connection, reference may usefully be made to a passage from Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 10th ed., at p. 79:

"Except in some cases where the principle of excessively strict construction has been applied, the language of a statute is generally extended to new things which were not known and could not have been contemplated by the Legislature when it was passed. This occurs when the Act deals with a genus, and the thing which afterwards comes into existence is a species of it."

There is some force in what Mr. Dhabe has contended. Now, in sub-s. (3) of

s. 123 of the Act, what is regarded as objectionable is a systematic appeal to the voters to vote or refrain from voting on the ground of caste, race, community or religion. In our judgment, the term "community" cannot in the context be confined to a religious community only.

If we were to construe the appeal in the Maratha of March 11, 1957, as an appeal to the "Marathas" as a caste, then undoubtedly it would fall within the mischief of this section. But it cannot be so interpreted. The Maratha itself is a newspaper which is obviously intended to be read by the Marathi speaking and Marathi knowing persons, and Mr. Atre has admitted that the average circulation of his daily paper in January, February and March 1957 was about 40000 copies per day. The pictures published in that paper as well as in the posters issued by the communist party contain pictures of Gujarati victims of police firings, who appear to be described as being residents of Ahmedabad. The pictures of other victims also are not confined to persons belonging to the Maratha caste or community. Exhibit P. 27, the poster issued by the Communist Party, appealed for the unification of Maharashtra and Mahagujarat. It is not disputed that candidates standing on the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti ticket were drawn from all communities speaking Marathi and non-Marathi languages. In these circumstances, we are not prepared to hold that either these appeals were intended to be addressed to the caste or community of Marathas or intended to be an appeal to the Marathi speaking electors to vote on the ground of their being a separate community. It is possible to construe these appeals as calling on the voters to vote in favour of the political principle of formation of separate States of Maharashtra and Mahagujarat by voting in favour of candidates pledged to that principle, though undoubtedly they were intended to make an intensely emotional appeal to the voters. We agree, therefore, with the finding of the Election Tribunal that these publications cannot fall within the mischief of sub-s. (3) of s. 123 of the Act.

Besides, it has to be remembered that exh. P. 26 as well as the poster exh. P. 27 were issued on the election day, that is to say, on March 11, 1957, and we agree with the view of the Election Tribunal that these two publications on the election day would not amount to a systematic appeal contemplated under s. 123(3) of the Act. We are not prepared to accede to Mr. Dhabe's argument that because of the publication of the pictures both in exh. P. 26 and exh. P. 27 on the election day, we should hold that there was a systematic appeal to the voters to vote on the ground of community. The expression 'systematic' would involve an element of planning, of method, of some continuity or persistence and admittedly exh. P. 26 and P. 27 or P. 53 were published on the day of the election only. The argument, therefore, that the publication of these exhibits constituted either undue influence or a systematic appeal to the voters to vote on the ground of community must, consequently, fail.

That takes me to the next argument of Mr. Dhabe that the present election has been vitiated by a corrupt practice falling within s. 123(1) of the Act, and Mr. Dhabe says that Mr. Awati, the candidate who stood on the Ram Rajya Parishad ticket, was induced to retire from the contest by reason of a reward offered to him by publication of his photograph in the Maratha dated March 12, 1957. That issue of the Maratha is exh. P. 30. It may be mentioned that in the trial Court it was also alleged by the petitioner that Mr. Awati was offered a bribe of Rs. 1,800 by one Vinayak Bhawe or somebody else on behalf of the Samyukta Maharashtra Samiti. Mr. Awati denied that allegation and stated that the statement that he got Rs. 1,800 from Vinayak Bhawe or anybody else was false. He characterised it as a creation of the petitioner's brain. He further stated that he had told the Ram Rajya Parishad that he could not afford to incur the expenses of election and as the Parishad was not giving him the necessary aid he would retire; and that was the sole reason of his retiring from the contest. The Tribunal, therefore, rejected the allegation of the petitioner that there was corrupt practice on the part of the successful candidates in inducing Mr. Awati to retire from the contest by giving him

Rs. 1,800. Mr. Dhabe has very properly not pursued that allegation in this Court. But he contends that the publication of Mr. Awati's photograph on the day after the election, giving him a prominent place and showing that he had supported the Samiti candidate, amounted to gratification as defined in the Explanation to s. 123(1). Below the photograph appearing in the Maratha it was stated that Mr. Awati who had withdrawn his candidature was the first to give his vote to the Samiti candidate, and Mr. Awati was to be seen in the photograph at the polling station at Shivaji Mandir at Dadar. Mr. Awati in his evidence stated that the representatives of the Maratha had not come to him to take his photograph and nobody had asked him to attend to give the first vote at the election. He went of his own accord to the Shivaji Mandir polling booth. He himself, his wife and daughter-in-law went to give their votes, but he did not pose for his photo for any photographer. He did not disclose to anybody for whom he was voting or for whom he voted because it was a secret poll. Then he explained that as there was only one woman voter, who was ahead of him to go inside for voting, and as the number of that voter could not be traced, he was given the ballot paper first. Mr. Atre in his evidence also stated that he did not know for whom Mr. Awati voted, that he was not present when he voted and that the photographer of the Maratha took this photo as those were his standing orders. He explained that it was stated in exh. P-30 that Shri and Smt. Awati voted for the Samiti candidate because his correspondent told him that they had in their hands Samiti cards. We do not think that the publication of this photograph amounts to any reward or gratification to Mr. Awati at all. The Explanation to sub-s. (1) of s. 123 of the Act refers to "all forms of entertainment and all forms employment for reward". It is really difficult to appreciate the argument that the publication of Mr. Awati's photo on the next day after the election would amount to a corrupt practice within the meaning of the Explanation to s. 123(1) of the Act.

PATEL J. ... So far as the question of agency is concerned, it must be mentioned that the word has not been defined anywhere in the Act, though it has been freely used in s. 123, s. 100 at one place and s. 98 as well. For the purpose of s. 123, Explanation No. 1 is appended to that section which says:

"In this section the expression 'agent' includes an election agent, a polling agent and any person who is held to have acted as an agent in connection with the election with the consent of the candidate."

This is an inclusive definition and not an exhaustive one and the question whether or not Mr. Atre was the agent of the returned candidate must therefore be determined with reference to the use of the word "agent" as understood in the law of elections all these days.

I may refer to a passage from the judgment of Mr. Justice Willes in *The Blackburn Case*¹ which is as follows (p. 201):—

"Nothing can be clearer than this law; it has existed for a very considerable period, I believe certainly from as early as the time of James I. Some 265 years ago the general principle was laid down upon the first and only occasion upon which the jurisdiction of the House of Commons over Parliamentary elections was seriously questioned, (Goodwin's case, 2 State Trials, 1) and upon which occasion it was confirmed. And it is enacted and settled as the law by the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854, s. 36, which, to my mind, does no more than lay down in very distinct terms that which has been always the understood law of Parliament, or rather the common law of the land, with respect to the election of members of Parliament; that is to say, that no matter how well the Member may have conducted himself in the election, no matter how clear his character may be from any imputation of corrupt practice in the matter, yet if an authorised agent of his, a person who has been set in motion by him to conduct the election, or canvass voters on his behalf, is in the course of his agency guilty of corrupt practices, an election obtained under such circumstances cannot be maintained. As it has been expressed from early time, no person can win and wear a prize upon whose behalf the contest has not been legitimately and fairly carried on, or, as it was expressed [in Goodwin's case (2 St. Tr. 91)] non coronabitur qui non legitime certaverit, which is only so much in Latin showing the antiquity of the principle I have already expressed in English; and, whether it be the person who contends in respect of any unfair play of his own, whether it be the owner of a horse in respect of the foul riding of his jockey, whether it be the owner of a ship in respect of the fault of his steersman, or the hoisting of an additional sail against the rules of the race by one of the seamen; or whether it be a candidate, in a Parliamentary contest in respect of his agent, in every one of those cases, whether it has been the principal who has been guilty of illegality, or whether the illegality has been committed by his agent only, even without his authority or against his will, provided it be done in his agency, and for the supposed benefit of his principal, such principal must bear the brunt, and cannot hold the benefit in respect of that in which the agent has compromised him, and would in a matter of this description have also betrayed the public, who have a right that a just election shall be had."

Without multiplying reference to case law it may be stated that Tribunals in England have followed the principle of what is stated above without attempting to lay down a definite and precise definition of the word 'Agency' in election matters for the possible reason "that in some other case that particular definition might be evaded, although what came to substantially the same thing, might have taken place" (Grove J. in *Wakefield Case*²).

Our own Act has not given a precise definition of the word 'agent' and has left it to the Tribunal deciding an election case to determine in what relation a particular person canvassing for the votes for the candidate stands to him and from that to determine whether or not he is the agent of that candidate.

... The question then is whether the action of Mr. P. K. Atre in so far as the publication of the letter by even a correspondent which came within the ambit of s. 123(4) could be brought within s. 100 for declaring the result of the election void. If we turn to s. 123 which defines corrupt practices, in every component part of the section we find the use of the word "by a candidate or his agent or by other person" and those words appear not in sub-s. (1) but in every other sub-section of that section. Coming, however, to s. 100 it is a somewhat different matter. So far as relevant for the immediate purpose it is as follows:—

"100. (1) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (2), if the Tribunal is of opinion...

(b) that any corrupt practice has been committed by a returned candidate or his election agent or by any other person with the consent of a returned candidate or his election agent;...

(d) that the result of the election, in so far as it concerns a returned candidate, has been materially affected...

(4) by any corrupt practice committed in the interests of the returned candidate by a person other than that candidate or his election agent or a person acting with the consent of such candidate or election agent;...

(2) If in the opinion of the Tribunal, a returned candidate has been guilty by an agent, other than his election agent, of any corrupt practice but the Tribunal is satisfied—

(a) that no such corrupt practice was committed at the election by the candidate or his election agent, and every such corrupt practice was committed contrary to the orders, and without the consent, of the candidate or his election agent;

(b) that all such corrupt practices were of a trivial and limited character or took the form of customary hospitality which did not affect the result of the election;

(c) that the candidate and his election agent took all reasonable means for preventing the commission of corrupt practices at the election; and

(d) that in all other respects the election was free from any corrupt practice on the part of the candidate or any of his agents, then the Tribunal may decide that the election of the returned candidate is not void."

Clause (1) (b) is intended to be directed to any corrupt practice committed by the candidate or election agent who has been defined in the Act, whatever be the nature of the corrupt practice. However if the corrupt practice is by some one other than those two then consent must be proved. Sub-clause (2) cannot be a proviso to this clause for the obvious reason that though an agent may fall within the words "any person other than a candidate or his election agent" as found in sub-cl. (1), to come within the proviso it must be established that the corrupt practice was committed "without consent", a contradiction in terms. Moreover, on fundamental principles acts of agents cannot have been intended to be treated so leniently, for it would be in a rare case that consent of the candidate could be established. It would appear that sub-cl. (2) is meant to be a proviso to some provision which would enable the tribunal to declare the election of a returned candidate void on the ground of a corrupt practice by an agent. But such a provision is absent from this section. If Mr. Atre's action falls within sub-s. (1) even though he is an agent then for the reason stated by my learned brother and with which I agree, consent of the returned candidates or their election agent not having been established the election cannot be held to be void.

Is it then possible to bring this particular action of Mr. Atre within any other provision of the section? The only one under which it could possibly be brought is sub-s. (1) (d) of s. 100. This provision in relation to the words "or a person acting with the consent of such candidate or election agent" is capable of being read in two ways, (1) by any corrupt practice committed in the interest of the returned candidate by a person other than a person acting with the consent of such candidate or election agent, and (2) by any corrupt practice committed by a person acting with the consent of such candidate or election agent. It seems this sub-cl. (d) is directed to something or the other done or omitted to be done by some one other than a candidate or his agent. It is, therefore, that "result of the election is materially affected" required before the election could be set aside. This is obvious for in elections it is common experience, of some persons "volunteers" who without even the knowledge of the candidate or his agent take so much interest in the election of a particular party or person and act in furthering his election. The provision is meant for canvassers like them. As an illustration in the very case it has appeared that in a chawl some persons put up a board and at other places some persons refused to allow the canvassers to even enter the chawl. I would, therefore, read the provision in the first meaning suggested by me. If it is read in this sense, then Mr. Atre's conduct will not be covered by it since he is not some one "other than a person acting with the consent of such candidate or election agent".

Is it possible to assign the second meaning to the section? For that purpose reference must be made to the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 100 which I have stated before. It must be remembered that this part must be read as a qualification to sub-s. (1), which undoubtedly it is, as it gives jurisdiction to the Tribunal to decide that the election of the returned candidate is not void if it is satisfied about certain matters in relation to the corrupt practices of an agent of a candidate. The result of applying it to sub-cl. (d) would be that if the corrupt practice is committed by some one falling within the words "person acting with the consent of the candidate" but is not "an agent" then the election must be set aside if it materially affected the result of the election. But if the corrupt practice is by an agent, a person who is more than a person acting with the consent of the candidate or his election agent, then the further facts, if established, would enable the Election Tribunal to decide that the election of the returned candidate is not void, a result obviously not intended. The provisions of this sub-section are wholly unsuited for being applied as a proviso to this method of reading that sub-clause. It is, therefore, impossible to read the section in its second meaning. Further this conclusion is strengthened by the very wording of that sub-s. (2) which refers specifically to a corrupt practice by an agent for which apparently there is no provision in the earlier sub-section.

The discussion above would show that it is a case of omission, an unfortunate result which should not be lightly created. It is no doubt possible to get over this difficulty and to bring out the real intention of the Act by reading the word "his agent" instead of the words "his election agent" in cl. (ii) of s. 100(1) and that is no doubt open to a Court construing a statute (See Maxwell, 10th Edition, page 229):—

"...This may be done by departing from the rules of grammar, by giving an unusual meaning to particular 'words', by altering their collocation, or by rejecting them altogether, under the influence, no doubt, of an irresistible conviction that the Legislature could not possibly have intended what its words signify and that the modifications thus made are mere corrections of careless language and really give the true meaning. Where the main object and intention of a statute are clear, it must not be reduced to a nullity by the draftsman's unskillfulness or ignorance of the law, except in a case of necessity, or the absolute intractability of the language used."

I would have been tempted to do it in the case under discussion but for the fact that in the Bill† as presented in the House the words were "his agent" while in the Act as passed the words are "his election agent". It would, therefore, appear that what was done was done with some purpose which has, however, left a gap in the legislation. It is not for the Court to remedy that gap. There is, therefore, apparently no provision under s. 100 under which the action of Mr. P. K. Atre can be brought as an agent of the returned candidate. Assuming that the second meaning can be assigned to the provision then it is not proved that the result of the election has been materially affected. The election, therefore, cannot be declared void.

As to the other grounds urged by Mr. Dhabe my learned brother has dealt with them in great detail and I agree with his conclusions and have nothing further to add. I, therefore, agree with the final order that is proposed by my learned brother.

Appeal dismissed.

SUPREME COURT.

NANI BAI v. GITA BAI RAMA GUNGE.*

Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sec. 134—Indian Registration Act (XVI of 1908), Secs. 17(1)(b), 49—Mortgagor's suit for possession after redemption—Applicability of art. 134 to such suit—Burden of proof whether on defendant that mortgagee has transferred larger interest than justified by mortgage—Partition severing only joint status of members of Hindu coparcenary without division of property by metes and bounds—Document evidencing such severance whether comes within purview of s. 17(1)(b) of Indian Registration Act.

Article 134 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, contemplates a sale by the mortgagee in excess of his interest as such. Therefore, to attract the operation of art. 134, the defendant has got affirmatively to prove that the mortgagee or his successor-in-interest has transferred a larger interest than justified by the mortgage. If there is no such proof, the shorter period under art. 134 is not available to the defendant in a suit for possession after redemption.

Under Hindu law a partition by allotting specific properties or parcels to individual coparceners may be effected orally, but if the parties reduce the transaction to a formal document which is intended to be the evidence of the partition, it has the effect of declaring the exclusive title of the coparcener to whom a particular property is allotted by partition, and is, thus, within the mischief of s. 17(1)(b) of the Indian Registration Act, 1908. But a partition which is only a severance of the joint status of the members of the coparcenary i.e. what was once a joint title, has become a divided title though there has been no division of any properties by metes and bounds, may be brought about by a document and such a document which affects only the status of the member or the members who have separated themselves from the rest of the coparcenary, does not come within the purview of s. 17(1)(b) of the Act, and is, therefore, not compulsorily registrable.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

SINHA J. This is a defendants' appeal by leave granted by the High Court of Judicature at Bombay, from the decision of that Court, dated October 9, 1950, in two cross-appeals from the decision of the Special Judge of the Special Tribunal Court at Mangalvedhe, dated July 31, 1946, in Special Suit No. 1322 of 1938. Of the two cross-appeals, the First Appeal No. 361 of 1948, by the appellants, was dismissed, and the First Appeal No. 363 of 1948, by the plaintiff, was allowed. The plaintiff-respondent had instituted another suit, being Suit No. 1894 of 1937, which was also tried along with Special Suit No. 1322 of 1938. The former suit stands dismissed as a result of the judgment of the High Court, and no appeal has been brought against that judgment to this Court.

The suit out of which this appeal arises (Special Suit No. 1322 of 1938), was instituted under the provisions of the Sangli State Agriculturists Protection Act, granting certain reliefs from indebtedness to agriculturists of that State which was then outside what used to be called "British India". The suit as originally framed prayed for accounts in respect of two mortgages, though there were really three mortgages, to be described in detail hereinafter, and for possession of the lands comprised in those mortgages. Defendant No. 1 filed his written statement on January 6, 1940, contesting the suit mainly on the ground that the plaintiff had no title to the mortgaged properties in view of the events that had happened; that the mortgaged properties had been sold at auction and purchased by the defendant's father who, thus, became the full owner thereof; and that he had sold most of the properties to other persons who were holding those properties as full owners. Defendant No. 3, who also represents the original mortgagee, filed a separate written statement supporting defendant No. 1. Of the defendants who are transferees from the original mortgagees or their heirs, only defendant No. 8 filed his written statement on March 26, 1940, substantially supporting defendant No. 1's written statement and adding that he had purchased the bulk of the mortgaged properties after acquisition of full title by the mortgagees themselves more than 12 years before the institution of the suit, and that, therefore, it was barred by limitation.

The trial Court dismissed the suit by its judgment dated November 26, 1941, with costs. On appeal by the defeated plaintiff, the Special Bench of the High Court of Sangli State, by its judgment dated June 13, 1944, remanded the suit for a fresh trial after having permitted the plaintiff to amend the plaint so as to include the relief for redemption. It appears that during the pendency of the suit after remand, an application was made in February, 1945, for making substitution in place of defendant No. 2 who had died meanwhile, but the application was refused by the Court on the ground that the suit had abated as against that defendant. After re-framing the issues and re-hearing the case, the trial Court, by its judgment and decree dated July 31, 1946, dismissed the suit as against defendants Nos. 6 to 9 who were holding portions of the mortgaged properties by sale-deeds of the years 1919 and 1922, for more than 12 years, as barred by limitation under art. 134 of the Limitation Act. The Court decreed the suit in respect of the mortgaged portion of R.S. No. 1735, having an area of 16 acres and 21 gunthas, as against defendant No. 3, and R.S. No. 334 against defendant No. 1's heirs. Each party was directed to bear its own costs throughout. From that decision, the defendants preferred a first appeal, being First Appeal No. 361 of 1948, and the plaintiff filed a cross-appeal, being First Appeal No. 363 of 1948, in the High Court of Judicature at Bombay. Both the appeals were heard together along with two other cross-appeals arising out of the other suit mentioned above. The High Court, by its judgment and decree dated October 9, 1950, dismissed the defendants' appeal No. 361 of 1948, and allowed the plaintiff's appeal No. 363 of 1948, with costs, holding that art. 148 and not art. 134 of the Limitation Act, applied to the suit, and that, therefore, it was not barred by limitation. In the result, the plaintiff's suit was decreed in its entirety. Hence, this appeal by the defendants.

A number of questions of fact and law have been raised by the learned counsel for the appellants, but before we proceed to deal with them, it is convenient to dispose of the preliminary points in bar of the suit. At the forefront of his submissions, the learned counsel for the appellants contended that the suit was outside the jurisdiction of the Special Court created under the Sangli State Agriculturists Protection Act I of 1936. With reference to the provisions of that Act, it was contended that the Act authorized the Special Court to take accounts and to re-open closed transactions only up to the year 1915, and that as the transactions which were the subject-matter of the suit, were of the years 1898, 1900 and 1901, the Special Court was not competent to go into those transactions and grant any relief to the agriculturist-plaintiff. In our opinion, there is no substance in this contention. The Sangli Act referred to above, had chosen the year 1915 as the date-line beyond which the Court was not competent to grant any relief to agriculturists, by way of re-opening of closed transactions. But that does not mean that the Court itself was incompetent to grant any other relief in respect of transactions of a date prior to 1915. If the Legislature had intended to limit the jurisdiction of the Special Court, as contended on behalf of the appellants, nothing would have been easier than to say in express terms that the Court's jurisdiction to grant relief was limited to transactions of that year and after, but there are no such words of limitation in any part of the statute. The operative portion of the statute does not contain any such provision. In our opinion, therefore, the Special Court was competent to entertain the suit for redemption, though it would not be competent to re-open those transactions even if any such question of re-opening closed transactions had been raised. But it is manifest that no such question arose out of the pleadings in this case. Hence, those words of limitation are wholly out of the way of the plaintiff. It may be mentioned that no such plea of want of jurisdiction of the trial Court had been raised in the pleadings or in the issues in the Courts below. This ground was raised, for the first time, in the statement of case in this Court. The preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the trial Court is, thus, overruled.

It was next contended that the suit was barred by limitation of one year under art. 12 of the Limitation Act. The point arose in this way. The properties sought to be redeemed were mortgaged, as will presently appear, successively under three bonds of the years 1898, 1900 and 1901, by the plaintiff's father, Gundi (omitting all reference to his brothers). It appears that there was a decree for money of the year 1903, in favour of a third party who is not before us. Gundi had been sued as the original defendant, but after his death, his place was taken by his brother Sadashiv as his heir and legal representative. In execution of the decree, the mortgaged properties were auction-purchased by the mortgagee's son, Fulchand, son of defendant No. 1 as it appears from the sale-certificate, exh. D-56, dated October 31, 1907. On the basis of this auction-purchase, it has been contended on behalf of the mortgagee that unless the sale were set aside, it would bind Gundi and his successor-in-interest, the plaintiff. The High Court has held that art. 12 is out of the way of the plaintiff because neither the plaintiff nor her father was a party to the sale. If Gundi herself were a party to the execution proceedings, the sale as against him, would bind his estate and his successor-in-interest. But it appears that Gundi was substituted by his brother Sadashiv in the execution proceedings. If Sadashiv could not be the representative-in-interest of Gundi, as will presently appear, he could not have represented Gundi's estate, and, therefore, the sale as against him, would be of no effect as against the plaintiff. But it was argued in answer to this contention that the decision of the Privy Council in the case of *Malkarjun Bin Shidramappa v. Narhari Bin Shivappa*¹ is an authority for the proposition that even if the property was sold by substituting a wrong person as the legal representative of the judgment-debtor, the sale would bind the estate of the judgment-debtor as much as if the right legal representative had been brought on the record of the execution proceedings. Assuming that the decision of the Privy Council in Malkarjun's case (supra) is correct, and that it is not subject to the infirmities of an ex parte judgment, as may well be argued, that decision is clearly distinguishable so far as the present case is concerned. In Malkarjun's case, the executing Court had been invited to decide the question as to who was the true legal representative of the judgment-debtor, and the Court, after judicially determining that controversy, had brought on record the person who was adjudged to be the true legal representative. The sale was held to be of the property of the judgment-debtor through his legal representative, after the adjudication by the Court. The Privy Council held that though the decision of the Court on the question as to who was the true legal representative was wrong, it was a decision given in that litigation which affected the judgment-debtor and his true legal representative, unless set aside in due course of law. In the present case, there was no such adjudication. From the scanty evidence that we have on this part of the case, it appears that Gundi, the original defendant, had died and had been, without any controversy, substituted by his brother, Sadashiv. The Court had not been invited to determine any controversy as between Sadashiv and the true legal representative of Gundi deceased. In execution proceedings, the property was sold as that of Sadashiv—the substituted judgment-debtor. It was a money-sale and passed only the right, title and interest of Sadashiv, if it had any effect at all. Malkarjun's case (supra), therefore, is of no assistance to the appellants. The plaintiff, Gundi's daughter, not being affected in any way by the sale aforesaid, it is not necessary for her to sue for setting aside the sale. She was entitled, as she has done, to ignore those execution proceedings, and to proceed on the assumption, justified in law, that the sale had not affected her inheritance. The suit is, therefore, not barred by art. 12 of the Limitation Act.

It was next contended that even if art. 12 was not available to the defendants by way of a bar to the suit, the suit was certainly barred under art. 134 of the Limitation Act. Under art. 134, the plaintiff has to sue to recover possession of immoveable property mortgaged and, afterwards, transferred by the mortgagee for a valuable consideration, within 12 years from the date the "transfer becomes known to the plaintiff." On the other hand, it has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the usual rule of 60 years' limitation under art. 148 of the Limitation Act governs the present case. On this part of the case, the defendants suffer from the initial difficulty that the sale-deeds, relied upon by them in aid of the plea of limitation under art. 134, have not been brought on the record of this case, and, therefore, the Court is not in a position to know the exact terms of the sale-deeds. This difficulty, the appellants sought to overcome by inviting our attention to the statements made in para. 8 of the plaint. But those are bald statements giving the reasons why the defendants other than the original mortgagee were being impleaded as defendants. There is no clear averment in that paragraph of the plaint about the extent of the interest sold by those sale-deeds and other transfers referred to therein. The Court is, therefore, not in a position to find out the true position. Those sale-deeds themselves were the primary evidence of the interest sold. If those sale-deeds which are said to be registered documents were not available for any reasons, certified copies thereof could be adduced as secondary evidence, but no foundation has been laid in the pleadings for the reception of other evidence which must always be of a very weak character in place of registered documents evidencing those transactions. Article 134 of the Limitation Act contemplates a sale by the mortgagee in excess of his interest as such. The Legislature, naturally, treats the possession of such transferees as wrongful, and therefore, adverse to the mortgagor if he is aware of the transaction. Hence, the longer period of 60 years for redemption of the mortgaged property in the hands of the mortgagee or his successor-in-interest, is cut down to the shorter period of 12 years' wrongful possession if the transfer by the mortgagee is in respect of a larger interest than that mortgaged to him. In order, therefore, to attract the operation of art. 134, the defendant has got affirmatively to prove that the mortgagee or his successor-in-interest has transferred a larger interest than justified by the mortgage. If there is no such proof, the shorter period under art. 134 is not available to the defendant in a suit for possession after redemption. A good deal of argument was addressed on the question as to upon whom lay the burden to prove the date of the starting point of limitation under that article. It was argued on behalf of the defendants-appellants that as it is a matter within the special knowledge of the plaintiff, the plaint should disclose the date on which the plaintiff became aware of the transfer. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent that it is for the defendants to plead and prove the facts including the date of the knowledge which would attract the bar of limitation under art. 134. As we are not satisfied, for the reasons given above, that art. 134 is attracted to the present case, it is not necessary to pronounce upon that controversy. It is, thus, clear that if arts. 12 and 134 of the Limitation Act do not stand in the way of the plaintiff's right to recover possession, the only other article which will apply to the suit, is art. 148. It is common ground that if that article is applied, the suit is well within time.

Before dealing with the factual aspects of the case, it is necessary to deal with another plea in bar of the suit raised on behalf of the appellants. It is contended that the suit is bad for defect of parties in so far as the heirs of defendant No. 2 are concerned. It appears from the order dated March 27, 1946, passed by the trial Court during the pendency of the suit after remand, that defendant No. 2 died on April 26, 1943, that is to say, while the appeal before the Bombay High Court was pending in that Court before remand. The then appellant, who was the plaintiff, did not take steps to bring on record the legal representatives of that defendant. An attempt was made by the plaintiff later on to get his heirs substituted on the record, but the Court upheld the defendants' objection and did not allow substitution to be made. It was, thereof, noted that the appeal, which was then pending in the High Court, had abated as against defendant No. 2, and that, the order of remand made after his death and in the absence of his legal representatives, would not affect them. Therefore it was contended that the whole suit would abate, because, in the absence of the heirs of the deceased defendant No. 2, the suit was imperfectly constituted under O. XXXIV, r. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. That rule requires that "all persons having an interest either in the mortgage-security or in the right of redemption shall be joined as parties..." The original mortgagee under the three mortgages was Kasturchand Kaniram. Defendant No. 1 has contested this suit by filing a separate written statement of his own as the successor-in-interest of the original mortgagee. It does not appear from the pleadings that defendant No. 2 was a joint mortgagee with defendant No. 1 or his ancestors. The only statement in the plaint in para. 8 with reference to defendant No. 2 is that the "Lands R.S. No. 1735 has gone to the share of defendant No. 2. Defendant No. 3 looks after all the transactions of defendant No. 2 and the shop running under the name of 'Kaniram Kasturchand' has gone to the share of defendant No. '3'. Thus, it is not a case of defendant No. 1 being joint with the other defendants including defendant No. 2 who is not now represented on the record. If defendant No. 2 had any distinct interest, that, on the plaint, appears to be confined to R.S. No. 1735. In the written statement filed on behalf of defendant No. 3 it is stated in para. 9 that the mortgaged portion of R.S. No. 1735, which, according to the plaint, was the property of defendant No. 2, was really in possession of defendant No. 3 as owner. It would, thus, appear that even in respect of that plot, defendant No. 2 had no subsisting interest. This claim of defendant No. 3 is strengthened by the fact that defendant No. 2 did not file any written statement challenging the statement aforesaid of defendant No. 3 or claiming any interest in that plot or any other part of the mortgaged property. Defendant No. 2 had remained ex parte throughout, apparently because he had no interest in the property to be redeemed. In any view of the matter, his heirs are not parties to this suit, and any determination in this suit will not bind them. But it does appear that defendant No. 2 had no subsisting interest, if he had any at any anterior period, in any portion of the mortgaged property.

It was also contended that the original defendant No. 8 died, and in his place defendants Nos. 8a to 8g were substituted. It appears that of the seven persons substituted on the record as the legal representatives of the original defendant No. 8, only defendants 8e, 8f and 8g were served, and the others, namely 8a, 8b, 8c and 8d, were not served. On those facts, it was contended that the suit for redemption was bad in the absence of all the necessary parties. It was sought, at one stage of the arguments, to be argued that the suit had abated against defendant No. 8, and this argument, in the High Court, was met by the observation that under O. XXII, r. 4, Code of Civil Procedure, it was enough to bring on record only some out of the several legal representatives of a deceased party, on the authority of the judgment of the Bombay High Court in *Mulchand v. Jairamdas*¹. But on the facts stated above, there was no room for the application of r. 4, O. XXII, of the Code. All the legal representatives, at any rate, all those persons who were said to be the legal representatives of the deceased defendant No. 8, had been substituted. Thus, the requirements of O. XXII had been fulfilled. If, subsequently, some of the heirs, thus substituted, are not served, the question is not one of abatement of the suit or of the appeal, but as to whether the suit or the appeal was competent in the absence of those persons. It does not appear that the absent parties were really necessary parties to the suit or the appeal in the sense that they were jointly interested with the others already on the record in any portion of the mortgaged property. In what circumstances they were not served or ordered to be struck off from the record does not clearly appear from the printed record before us. Defendant No. 8a, who happens to be the brother of the original defendant No. 8, has only filed a written statement claiming that he and his vendor, defendant No. 7, had been in possession for more than 12 years, and that the suit was, on that count, barred by limitation. None of the other defendants, who had been brought on the record in place of the original defendant No. 8, has appeared in the suit or in the appeal to contest the claim of defendant No. 8e that he was in possession of that portion of the property, namely, 6 acres and 32 gunthas out of R.S. No. 242 (old survey No. 233). Hence, there was no question of abatement of the suit or the appeal. The only question which may or may not be ultimately found to be material on a proper investigation, may be whether the decree to be passed in this case, would be binding on those who had not been served. For ought we know it may be that they were not interested in the plot sought to be redeemed. On these findings, it must be held that the preliminary objections raised on behalf of the defendants in bar of the suit must be overruled. Hence, the whole suit cannot be held to be incompetent for the reason that the heirs of defendant No. 2 have not been brought on the record.

Having thus disposed of the specific pleas in bar of the suit, we now turn to the contentions bearing on the factual aspects of the controversy. It was contended that the plaintiff, who is admittedly the daughter of Gundi, has not established her title to the mortgaged properties. In this connection, it is convenient to set out the essential facts in relation to the three mortgage-deeds in question. The first mortgage is dated June 4, 1898, in favour of Kasturchand Kaniram, executed by Gundi, son of Appa, for the sum of Rs. 700, the amount borrowed by him, mortgaging 7 survey numbers with an aggregate area of 48 acres and 38 gunthas. It was a mortgage with possession for a period of 4 years, with Gundi's two brothers—Sadashiv and Rama—as sureties for the re-payment of the amount borrowed which was the personal responsibility of Gundi under the terms of the document. But the property mortgaged is admittedly the ancestral land of the three brothers. The second mortgage between the same parties in respect of the same properties bears the date May 25, 1900. It secures a further advance of Rs. 300 to the mortgagor, the payment of which debt is again assured by his two brothers—Sadashiv and Rama—as sureties. The third mortgage-bond is for a further advance of Rs. 200 to the mortgagor Gundi, with his brothers aforesaid again figuring as sureties. It would, thus, appear that all the three mortgages are between the same parties as mortgagor and mortgagee, and the two brothers of the mortgagor join in executing the mortgages as sureties, the property given in mortgage belonging to all the three brothers. The total advance of Rs. 1,200 under those three mortgages was made to the principal debtor, Gundi. It appears that, of the three brothers, Rama died first, and then Gundi, some time in 1903, survived by his two daughters—the plaintiff and defendant No. 18. The plaintiff's case is that the common ancestor, Appa, in his life-time, had effected a partition amongst his three sons aforesaid, giving them each specific portions of his lands, reserving a portion for the maintenance of his wife. Those transactions are exhs. P-43, P-44, P-45 and P-46, all dated August 31 or September 1, 1892, and, apparently, forming parts of the same transaction. These are formal documents giving details of the lands allotted to each one of the three brothers and to their mother by way of maintenance. The common recital in these documents is that the executant of the documents, Appa, had three sons—Gundi, Sadashiv and Rama, in order of seniority—"who cannot pull on together". The document further recites: "Hence, separation having been effected with your consent, (I have) divided in every way and given you the estate, the land, the assets etc., pertaining to the one-third share. The same are as under." Then follow the details of the properties separately allotted to each of them. The plaintiff's case is that ever since 1892—the date of the documents aforesaid—the three branches of the family had become separate in estate, if not also divided in all respects, and that on the death of Rama, Gundi and his brother Sadashiv inherited his one-third share in equal moieties, that is to say, on the death of their mother and their brother, the two brothers became owners of half and half of the ancestral property left by Appa who appears to have died soon after the alleged partition. The plaintiff's case further is that the principal mortgagor in all those three transactions aforesaid was Gundi, and his two brothers had joined only as sureties by way of additional security in favour of the mortgagee. It has been contended on the other hand on behalf of the defendants-appellants that, in the first instance, the documents of 1892, referred to above, do not evidence an actual partition by metes and bounds, but only represent an arrangement by way of convenience for more efficient and peaceful management of the family property, and that, alternatively, if those documents are claimed to have the efficacy of partition deeds, they are inadmissible in evidence for want of registration. The Courts below have held that those documents are inadmissible in evidence as regular deeds of partition which they purport to be in view of the provisions of the Registration Act. But those transactions have been used for the collateral purpose of showing that from that time, the three brothers became separate in estate, and evidencing the clear intention on the part of each one of them to live as separated members, each with one-third share in the paternal estate. In this connection, reliance was placed on behalf of the appellants, upon what was alleged to be the subsequent conduct of the three brothers after 1892, as evidenced by the three mortgage-bonds themselves and the sale-deed—exh. D-54—dated June 17, 1909. By the last named document, Sadashiv purported to sell to Fulchand Kasturchand, son of the original mortgagee, practically the whole of the mortgaged properties, for a sum of Rs. 1,500. The recitals in the sale-deed would certainly make it out that the three brothers were joint in estate, and that the sale-deed was being executed to pay off the personal loans of Gundi and Rama during the years 1900 to 1903, plus the loans taken by the vendor himself. Finally, the deed proceeds to make the following very significant declaration as to the status of the members of the so-called joint family:—

“As I have sold to you my right, title and interest in the abovesaid lands, neither I nor my heirs and executors of my will have any right whatsoever over the said property. As I am the male heir in the joint family by survivorship, nobody except me has any interest in the aforesaid lands. I have sold to you whatever interest I had in the said lands.”

It was further contended that even strangers to the family treated the brothers as joint in estate as shown by the execution proceedings and the sale certificates of the years 1903 to 1907, whereby Sadashiv was substituted as the sole heir and legal representative of the defendant Gundi, in the suit for money which resulted in the auction-sale referred to above, of the year 1907.

If the transaction of the year 1892 is admissible in evidence for the purpose for which the document was used in the Courts below, namely, to prove separation in estate, there is no room for ambiguity, and the position is clear that the three brothers had become separate. Further recitals in those documents that specific portions of the ancestral property had been allotted to the three brothers separately, being in the nature of a partition deed by the father in his life-time, and being unregistered, are inadmissible in evidence to prove such a partition. But the plaintiff's case does not depend upon proof of actual partition by metes and bounds. In the absence of any ambiguity, the later transactions would not be relevant except to show that there was a subsequent re-union amongst the brothers, which is no party's case.

But it was argued on behalf of the appellants that those documents—exhs. D-52, D-53 and D-55—are not admissible in evidence even for the limited purpose of showing separation in estate. The question, therefore, is whether those documents “purport or operate to create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title or interest, whether vested or contingent, of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, to or in immovable property”, within the meaning of s. 17(1)(b) of the Registration Act. No authority has been cited before us in support of this contention. Partition in the Mitakshara sense may be only a severance of the joint status of the members of the coparcenary, that is to say, what was once a joint title, has become a divided title though there has been no division of any properties by metes and bounds. Partition may also mean what ordinarily is understood by partition amongst co-sharers who may not be members of a Hindu coparcenary. For partition in the former sense, it is not necessary that all the members of the joint family should agree, because it is a matter of individual volition. If a coparcener expresses his individual intention in unequivocal language to separate himself from the rest of the family, that effects a partition, so far as he is concerned, from the rest of the family. By this process, what was a joint tenancy, has been converted into a tenancy in common. For partition in the latter sense of allotting specific properties or parcels to individual coparceners, agreement amongst all the coparceners is absolutely necessary. Such a partition may be effected orally, but if the parties reduce the transaction to a formal document which is intended to be the evidence of the partition, it has the effect of declaring the exclusive title of the coparcener to whom a particular property is allotted by partition, and is, thus, within the mischief of s. 17(1)(b), the material portion of which has been quoted above. But partition in the former sense of defining the shares only without specific allotments of property has no reference to immovable property. Such a transaction only affects the status of the member or the members who have separated themselves from the rest of the coparcenary. The change of status from a joint member of a coparcenary to a separated member having a defined share in the ancestral property may be effected orally or it may be brought about by a document. If the document does not evidence any partition by metes and bounds, that is to say, the partition in the latter sense, it does not come within the purview of s. 17(1)(b), because so long as there has been no partition in that sense, the interest of the separated member continues to extend over the whole joint property as before. Such a transaction does not purport or operate to do any of the things referred to in that section. Hence, in so far as the documents referred to above are evidence of partition only in the former sense, they are not compulsorily registrable under s. 17, and would, therefore, not come within the mischief of s. 49 which prohibits the reception into evidence of any document "affecting immovable property." It must, therefore, be held that those documents have rightly been received in evidence for that limited purpose.

Lastly, it was contended that if those documents of the year 1892 are admissible to prove separation amongst the three brothers, then, on the death of one of the three, namely, Rama, and of their mother, the entire ancestral properties including the mortgaged properties, vested in the two brothers in equal shares. Both by the auction-purchase of the year 1906 (D-57-D) and the sale deed (exh. D-54 of the year 1909), Sadashiv's moiety share in the mortgaged property was purchased by Fulchand aforesaid. The plaintiff, therefore, could only claim the other moiety share of her father, Gundi. In our opinion, there is no answer to this contention because it is clear upon a proper construction of the three mortgage-bonds and on the plaintiff's own case that the entire ancestral properties and not only Gundi's share, had been mortgaged. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed to the extent of the half share rightly belonging to Sadashiv, and the decree for possession after redemption will be confined to the other half belonging to the plaintiff's father.

In the result, the appeal is allowed to the extent indicated above. As success between the parties has been divided, they are directed to bear their own costs throughout.

Appeal partly allowed.

Indian Limitation Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 14.—Plaintiff failing to prove affirmatively that previously instituted suit prosecuted by him in good faith and with due diligence—Whether plaintiff entitled to benefit of s. 14—Burden of proof.

When the plaintiff has not satisfied the initial burden which lies upon him to bring his case within s. 14 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, namely, that the previously instituted suit was prosecuted in good faith and with due diligence, the burden would not shift to the defendant to show the contrary.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

In C. A. No. 287 of 1955.

A. V. Viswanatha Sastri, with G. A. Desai and Nawnit Lal, for the appellant and respondent No. 6 in C.A. No. 288 of 1955.

Decided, April 18, 1958. Civil Appeals Nos. 287 and 288 of 1955.*

In C. A. No. 288 of 1955.

H. N. Sanyal, Additional Solicitor-General of India, with K. L. Hathi and R. H. Dhebar, for the appellant and respondent No. 2 in C. A. No. 287 of 1955.

Purshotam Tricumdass, J. B. Dadachanji, S. N. Andley and Rameshwar Nath, for respondent No. 1 in both the appeals.

SINHA J. These two appeals are directed against the judgment and decree dated November 30, 1951, passed by a Division Bench of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay, reversing those of the District Judge at Miraj, dismissing the plaintiff's suit for possession and mesne profits in respect of the suit properties in Civil Suit No. 2 of 1940. Civil Appeal No. 287 of 1955 is on behalf of the added respondent No. 7, and the Civil Appeal No. 288 of 1955 is on behalf of the added respondent No. 6—the State of Bombay which now represents the original defendant No. 1—the Miraj State (now merged in the State of Bombay).

In the view we have taken, as will presently appear, on the question of limitation, it is not necessary to state in any detail the pleadings of the parties or the merits of the decisions of the Courts below. For the purposes of these appeals, it is only necessary to state that the plaintiff-respondent, who was the appellant in the High Court, had instituted a suit on January 31, 1929, the very last day of limitation, in the Munsiff's Court at Miraj. This suit was registered as Original Suit No. 724 of 1930, in that Court. The plaintiff prayed in the plaint for possession and mesne profits in respect of lands at Malgaon and Takli, on the ground that the then State of Miraj had wrongfully resumed those lands in 1910, as part of the State Sheri Khata, which, after inquiry, was ordered on July 31, 1915, to be recorded as such lands, and the usufruct thereof during that period to be appropriated to the Khasgi-Khata of the State. The plaintiff impleaded the State of Miraj as defendant No. 1. Defendants Nos. 2 and 3 are plaintiff's brothers who are said to have relinquished their interest in the suit properties in favour of the plaintiff. Defendants Nos. 4 to 7 belong to the family of Narso who was, until his death in 1910, recorded in respect of the suit properties, but they did not appear and contest the plaintiff's claim. The suit was valued at Rs. 2,065, being 5 times the assessment on the disputed lands for the purposes of court-fee. No valuation was given in the plaint for the purposes of jurisdiction with reference to the value of the properties claimed. A similar suit had been instituted by the plaintiff in the same Court in respect of lands in another village called Tikoni. That had been registered as Original Suit No. 443 of 1928, in the Munsiff's Court at Miraj, and we shall refer to that suit as the 'Tikoni suit'. It appears that the two suits proceeded in that Court in a very leisurely fashion until November 29, 1939, when the Tikoni suit was dismissed. After the dismissal of that suit, the plaintiff made an application on June 21, 1940, drawing the attention of the Court to the fact that the value of the subject-matter of the suit had not been mentioned in the plaint, and that, on a moderate valuation, the disputed land should not be worth "less than a minimum of 8 to 10 thousand rupees", and that, therefore, the Court had no pecuniary jurisdiction to hear the suit. The Court allowed the application and directed the plaint to be returned to be presented to the proper Court, on July 4, 1940. The plaint was accordingly re-presented on that very date to the Court of District Judge at Miraj, and the same was numbered as Suit No. 2 of 1940.

The original defendant No. 1 only contested the suit on a number of grounds, including the plea of limitation. By a petition dated October 27, 1942, the defendant brought it to the notice of the Court that the "plaintiff despite his knowledge that the value of the subject-matter of the suit was far in excess of the amount of jurisdiction of the Munsiff's court filed the suit in the said court. The said act of the plaintiff was not at all 'bona fide'...The facilities as regards limitations etc. which a 'bona fide' suitor would be entitled to cannot, therefore, be afforded to the plaintiff."

After recording evidence and hearing the parties, the learned District Judge, by his judgment and decree dated December 12, 1945, dismissed the suit with costs. On appeal by the defeated plaintiff, during the pendency of the appeal, the State of Bombay was added as respondent No. 6, and the Yuvaraj of Miraj, Madhavrao Narayanrao, son of the Raja Sahib of Miraj, was added as respondent No. 7, as the latter had acquired an interest in the disputed properties by virtue of a grant in his favour. The appeal was ultimately registered as First Appeal No. 104 of 1950, in the High Court of Bombay. A Division Bench of that Court, by its judgment and decree dated November 30, 1951, allowed the appeal and decreed the suit with costs against respondents Nos. 1 and 7. The respondents Nos. 6 and 7 aforesaid applied for and obtained the necessary certificate for coming up in appeal to this Court. Hence, these two appeals.

We have heard the counsel for the parties at a great length on the preliminary issue of limitation. On behalf of the appellants, it was urged with reference to the plea of limitation that in the facts and circumstances of this case, the plaintiff is not entitled to the benefit of s. 14 of the Limitation Act, and that, therefore, the suit as instituted in the Court of the District Judge at Miraj on re-representation of the plaint in that Court on July 4, 1940, was barred by limitation. Alternatively, it was argued that even assuming that the Courts below were right in giving the plaintiff the benefit of that section, the suit was barred by limitation of 12 years under art. 142 of the Limitation Act, whether the cause of action arose in 1910, on the death of Narsu aforesaid, or in 1915, when the final order was passed by the Miraj State treating the resumed property as part of the Khas property of the State, which was the date of the cause of action for the suit as alleged in the plaint. On behalf of the plaintiff-respondent, it was strenuously argued that the Courts below were right in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to a deduction of all the time between January 31, 1929, when the suit had been originally filed in the Court of the Munsiff at Miraj, and July 4, 1940, when the plaint was returned and re-presented as aforesaid. It was also argued that it was common ground that the suit as originally filed on January 31, 1929, was within time though that was the last day of limitation. If the plaintiff is given the benefit of s. 14 of the Limitation Act, ipso facto, the suit on re-representation of the plaint in the District Court at Miraj, would be within time.

In our opinion, the appellants' contentions based on the provisions of s. 14 of the Limitation Act, are well-founded, and the decision of the Courts below, granting the plaintiff-respondent the benefit of that section, must be reversed for the following reasons: Before the promulgation, on January 1, 1926, of the Proclamation by State Karabhari, Miraj State, the law of limitation in that State, it is common ground, was that the plaintiff had the benefit of the period of 20 years as the period during which a suit for possession after dispossession could be instituted. By that Proclamation, the Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908) was made applicable to that State with effect from February 1, 1926, subject to this modification that all suits which would have been in time according to the old law of the State, but would have become barred by limitation as a result of the introduction of the Indian Limitation Act, could be filed upto January 31, 1929, by virtue of certain notifications extending the last date for the institution of such suits. Hence, the suit filed on that date in the Munsiff's Court at Miraj was admittedly within time, and was subject to the law of limitation under the Indian Limitation Act. When the plaint was returned by the Munsiff's Court at Miraj, at the instance of the plaintiff himself on the ground of want of pecuniary jurisdiction, and re-presented to the Court of the District Judge at Miraj on July 4, 1940, it was, on the face of it, barred by limitation, whether the period of limitation started to run in 1910 or 1915, unless the case is brought within s. 14 of the Limitation Act. Sub-section (1) of s. 14 of the Limitation Act, which admittedly governs the present case, is in these terms:

"(1). In computing the period of limitation prescribed for any suit, the time during which the plaintiff has been prosecuting with due diligence another civil proceeding whether in a Court of first instance or in a Court of appeal, against the defendant, shall be excluded, where the proceeding is founded upon the same cause of action and is prosecuted in good faith in a Court which, from defect of jurisdiction, or other cause of a like nature, is unable to entertain it."

In order to bring his case within the section quoted above, the plaintiff has to show affirmatively:

(1) that he had been prosecuting with due diligence the previous suit in the Court of the Munsiff at Miraj,

(2) that the previous suit was founded upon the same cause of action,

(3) that it had been prosecuted in good faith in that Court, and,

(4) that that Court was unable to entertain that suit on account of defect of jurisdiction or other cause of a like nature.

There is no dispute between the parties here that conditions (2) and (4) are satisfied. But the parties differ with reference to the first and the third conditions. It has been argued on behalf of the appellants that the Courts below had misdirected themselves when they observed that there was no proof that the plaintiff had not been diligently prosecuting the previously instituted suit, or that it was not being prosecuted in good faith; that the section requires that the plaintiff must affirmatively show that the previously instituted suit was being prosecuted in good faith and with due diligence; and that, viewed in that light, the plaintiff has failed to satisfy those conditions.

The conclusion of the learned trial Judge on this part of the case is in these words:—

"The plaintiff's mala fides are therefore not established and the period occupied in prosecuting the former suit must be excluded under section 14 of the Limitation Act."

The observations of the High Court are as follows:

"We do not see our way to accuse the plaintiff of want of good faith or any mala fides in the matter of the filing of the suit in the Subordinate Judge's Court at Miraj. There is nothing on the record to show that he was really guilty of want of good faith or non-prosecution of the suit with due diligence in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Miraj."

Both the Courts below have viewed the controversy under s. 14 of the Limitation Act, as if it was for the defendant to show mala fides on the part of the plaintiff when he instituted the previous suit and was carrying on the proceedings in that Court. In our opinion, both the Courts below have misdirected themselves on this question. Though they do not say so in terms, they appear to have applied the definition of "good faith" as contained in the General Clauses Act, to the effect that "A thing shall be deemed to be done in good faith where it is in fact done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not." But the Indian Limitation Act contains its own definition of good faith to the effect that "nothing shall be deemed to be done in good faith which is not done with due care and attention"—[s. 2(7)]. We have, therefore, to see if the institution and prosecution of the suit in the Munsiff's Court at Miraj was done with due care and attention. We know that the plaint in the Tikoni suit filed by the same plaintiff in the same Court did contain a statement as to the value of the subject-matter, but it was conspicuous by its absence in the plaint in the suit as originally filed in the Munsiff's Court at Miraj. All the facts alleged in the plaintiff's petition for the return of the plaint, were known to the plaintiff ever since the institution of the suit. Nothing fresh was discovered in 1940. On the other hand, we know definitely that the Tikoni suit had been dismissed by the trial Court on merits. The suits were of an analogous character in the sense that the controversy was similar in both of them. The appellants' contention that on the dismissal of the plaintiff's Tikoni suit in November, 1939, he, naturally, became apprehensive about the result of the other suit, and then moved the Court for the return of the plaint on the ground of pecuniary jurisdiction, appears to be well-founded. The plaintiff knew all the time that the value of the properties involved in the suit was much more than Rs. 5,000 which was the limit of the pecuniary jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge's Court. Can an omission in the plaint to mention the value of the properties involved in the suit, be brought within the condition of 'due care and attention' according to the meaning of "good faith" as understood in the Limitation Act? It has to be remembered that it is not one of those cases which usually arise upon a revision of the valuation as given in the plaint, on an objection raised by the defendant contesting the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the suit. Curiously enough, the defendant had not raised any objection in his written statement to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the suit. Apparently, the plaintiff was hard put to it to discover reasons for having the case transferred to another Court. The question is not whether the plaintiff did it dishonestly or that his acts or omission in this connection were mala fide. On the other hand, the question is whether, given due care and attention, the plaintiff could have discovered the omission without having to wait for about 10 years or more. The trial Court examined the plaintiff's allegation that the omission was due to his pleader's mistake. As that Court observed "he makes this contention with a view to shield himself behind a wrong legal advice." That Court has answered the plaintiff's contention against him by observing that the plaintiff was not guided by any legal advice in this suit; that the plaint was entirely written by him in both the suits, and that he himself conducted those suits in the trial Court "in a manner worthy of a senior counsel." The Court, therefore, rightly came to the conclusion that the plaintiff himself was responsible for drafting the plaint and for presenting it in Court, and that no pleader had any responsibility in the matter. No reason was adduced why, in these circumstances, the value of the subject-matter of the suit was mentioned in the plaint in the Tikoni suit but not in the plaint in respect of the present suit.

There is another serious difficulty in the way of the plaintiff. He has not brought on the record of this case any evidence to show that he was prosecuting the previously instituted suit with "due diligence" as required by s. 14. He has not adduced in evidence the order-sheet or some equivalent evidence of the proceedings in the Sub-Judge's Court at Miraj, to show that in spite of his due diligence, the suit remained pending for over ten years in that Court, before he thought of having the suit tried by a Court of higher pecuniary jurisdiction. In our opinion, therefore, all the conditions necessary to bring the case within s. 14 have not been satisfied by the plaintiff. There could be no doubt about the legal position that the burden lay on the plaintiff to satisfy those conditions in order that he may entitle himself to the deduction of all that period between January 31, 1929, and July 4, 1940. It is also clear that the Courts below were in error in expecting the contesting defendant to adduce evidence to the contrary. When the plaintiff has not satisfied the initial burden which lay upon him to bring his case within s. 14, the burden would not shift, if it ever shifted, to the defendant to show the contrary. In view of this conclusion, it is not necessary for us to pronounce upon the other contention raised on behalf of the appellants that, even after giving the benefit of s. 14, the suit is still barred under art. 142 of the Limitation Act. This is a serious question which may have to be determined if and when it becomes necessary.

For the aforesaid reasons, it must be held that the suit is barred by limitation. The appeals are, accordingly, allowed and the suit dismissed with costs throughout, one set to be divided equally between the two appeals.

Appeals allowed.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 35, 18A(5)—Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act (XXV of 1953), Secs. 1(2), 13, 3(2), 7(2) 30(2)—Income-tax Officer in order passed before coming into force of Amending Act giving credit to assessee under s. 18A(5) for amount representing interest on tax paid in advance—After coming into force of Amending Act, Income-tax Officer under s. 35 making an order that assessee entitled to interest only on difference between advance payment made and amount assessed to tax—Applicability of s. 35—Whether previous order made by Income-tax Officer disclosed a mistake apparent from the record.

The Income-tax Officer by his assessment order made on October 9, 1952, for the relevant assessment year, assessed a company under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and in the order the company was given credit for a certain amount under s. 18A(5) of the Act as it stood then, as representing interest on tax paid in advance. After coming into force of the Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1953, on May 24, 1953, whereby a proviso was added to s. 18A(5) of the Act, which proviso was deemed to have come into force on April 1, 1952, the Income-tax Officer exercised his power under s. 35 of the Act and purported to rectify the mistake apparent from the record in regard to the credit for the amount allowed by him to the company by making an order that the company was entitled to get interest not on the whole of the advance amount of tax paid by the company, but only on the difference between the payment made and the amount which the company was assessed to tax under s. 23. On the question whether the order made by the Income-tax Officer on October 9, 1952, which was proper and valid when it was made, could be said to disclose a mistake apparent from the record, as the said order would be erroneous in view of the subsequent amendment made by the Amending Act which was intended to operate retrospectively:—

Held, that the subsequently inserted proviso must be read as forming part of s. 18A(5) of the principal Act as from April 1, 1952, that the order passed by the Income-tax Officer on October 9, 1952, was, therefore, inconsistent with the provisions of the proviso and must be deemed to suffer from a mistake apparent from the record, and that, therefore, the Income-tax Officer was justified in exercising his power under s. 35 of the Act.

GAJENDRAGADKAR, J. This is an appeal by the Income-tax Officer, Companies Circle I(1), Bombay, and the Union of India, and it raises a short question about the construction of s. 35 of the Income-tax Act read with s. 1, sub-s. (2) and s. 13 of the Indian Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1953 (XXV of 1953). It arises in this way. The Income-tax Officer, by his assessment order made on October 9, 1952, for the assessment year 1952-53, assessed the respondent, the Bombay Dyeing and Manufacturing Co. Ltd., under the Act.

*Decided, April 28, 1958. Civil Appeal No. L. R. 60.

1 [1952] A.C. 109.

2 [1927] L. R. 54 L. A. 421, s.o. 30 Bom.

3 [1957] 32 I.T.R. 274.

4 [1938] 6 I.T.R. 414, s.c. 40 Bom. L.R. 854.

In the said assessment order the respondent was given credit for Rs. 50,603-15-0 as representing interest at 2 per cent. on tax paid in advance under s. 18A of the Act. This credit was given to the respondent in pursuance of the provisions contained in s. 18A, sub-s. (5) of the Act as it then stood. On May 24, 1953, the Amendment Act came into force. Section 1, sub-s. (2) of the Amendment Act provides that "subject to any special provision made in this behalf in the Amendment Act, it shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April 1952." By s. 13 of the Amendment Act, a proviso was added to s. 18A(5) of the Act. The effect of the amendment made by the insertion of the said proviso to s. 18A(5) was that the assessee was entitled to get interest at 2 per cent. not on the whole of the advance amount of tax paid by him as before, but only on the difference between the payment made and the amount at which the assessee was assessed to tax under the regular assessment under s. 23 of the Act. After the Amendment Act was passed, appellant No. 1 exercised his power under s. 35 of the Act and purported to rectify the mistake apparent from the record in regard to the credit for Rs. 50,603-15-0 allowed by him to the assessee. Appellant No. 1 held that the assessee was really entitled to a credit of only Rs. 21,157-6-0 by way of interest on tax paid in advance as a result of the retrospective operation of the amendment made in s. 18A(5) by the Amendment Act. In accordance with this order a notice of demand under s. 29 of the Act was issued against the assessee for the sum of Rs. 29,446-9-0 on the ground that the assessee had been given credit for this excess amount through mistake. Aggrieved by this notice of demand, the respondent filed a petition in the High Court of Bombay on January 4, 1954, under art. 226 of the Constitution praying for a writ against the appellants inter alia prohibiting them from enforcing the said rectified order and the said notice of demand. It appears that this petition was admitted by Tendolkar J., on January 6, 1954, and a rule issued on it. Thereafter the said petition was referred to a Division Bench by the Hon'ble the Chief Justice for final disposal. Accordingly on March 5, 1954, the petition was heard by Chagla C.J. and Tendolkar J. and a writ was issued against the appellants. The High Court held that s. 35 of the Act had no application to the facts of the case because the mistake apparent from the record contemplated by the said section is not a mistake which is the result of the amendment of the law even though the amending law may be retrospective in operation. In other words, in the opinion of the High Court, the mistake mentioned by s. 35 had to be apparent on the face of the order and it can only be judged in the light of the law as it stood on the day when the order was passed. The appellants then applied for and obtained a certificate from the High Court on October 8, 1954; on their behalf it is urged that the High Court of Bombay has erred in law in taking the view that appellant No. 1 was not entitled to rectify the mistake in question under s. 35 of the Act. Thus the short question which arises before us in the present appeal is whether an order which was proper and valid when it was made can be said to disclose a mistake apparent from the record if the said order would be erroneous in view of a subsequent amendment made by the Amendment Act when the Amendment Act is intended to operate retrospectively?

It is unnecessary to refer to the provisions of s. 18A(5) as well as the provision of the proviso which was subsequently added by s. 13 of the Amendment Act. It is common ground that, in the absence of the subsequently inserted proviso, the assessee would be entitled to obtain a credit for Rs. 50,603-15-0. It is also common ground that, if the subsequently inserted proviso covered the assessee's case, he would be entitled to a credit only of Rs. 21,156-9-0. It is thus obvious that the order giving the relevant credit to the assessee was valid when it was made and that it would be erroneous under the subsequent amendment. Under these circumstances, was appellant No. 1 justified in exercising his power of rectification under s. 35 of the Act?

In deciding this question it would be necessary to determine the true legal effect of the retrospective operation of the Amendment Act. Section 1, sub-

s. (2) of the Amendment Act expressly provides that subject to the special provisions made in the said Act it shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April 1952. The result of this provision is that the amendment made in the Act by s. 13 of the Amendment Act must, by legal fiction, be deemed to have been included in the principal Act as from the first of April, 1952, and this inevitably means that, at the time when the Income-tax Officer passed his original order on October 9, 1952, allowing to the respondent credit for Rs. 50,603-15-0, the proviso added by s. 13 of the Amendment Act must be deemed to have been inserted in the Act. As observed by Lord Asquith of Bishopstone in *East End Dwellings Co. Ltd. v. Finsbury Borough Council*¹.

"If you are bidden to treat an imaginary state of affairs as real, you must surely, unless prohibited from doing so, also imagine as real the consequences and incidents which, if the putative state of affairs had in fact existed, must inevitably have flowed from or accompanied it. One of those in this case is emancipation from the 1939 level of rents. The statute says that you must imagine a certain state of affairs; it does not say that having done so, you must cause or permit your imagination to boggle when it comes to the inevitable corollaries of that state of affairs."

Thus, there can be no doubt that the effect of the retrospective operation of the Amendment Act is that the proviso inserted by the said section in s. 18A(5) of the Act would, for all legal purposes, have to be deemed to have been included in the Act as from April 1, 1952.

But it is urged for the respondent that the retrospective operation of the relevant provision is not intended to affect completed assessments. It is conceded that, if any assessment proceedings in respect of the assessee's income for a period subsequent to the first of April 1952 were pending at the time when the Amendment Act was passed, the proviso inserted by s. 13 would govern the decision in such assessment proceedings; but where an assessment proceeding has been completed and an assessment order has been passed by the Income-tax Officer against the assessee, such a completed assessment would not be affected and cannot be re-opened under s. 35 by virtue of the retrospective operation of the Amendment Act. In support of this contention, reliance is placed on the observations of the Privy Council in *Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co. v. Income-tax Commissioner, Delhi*². Lord Blanesburg, who delivered the judgment of the Board, referred to the Board's earlier decision in the *Colonial Sugar Refining Company v. Irving*³ where it was in effect laid down that, while provisions of a statute dealing merely with matters of procedure may properly, unless that construction be textually inadmissible, have retrospective effect attributed to them, provisions which touch a right in existence at the passing of the statute are not to be applied retrospectively in the absence of express enactment or necessary intendment. The learned Judge then added that (p. 425):

"...Their Lordships can have no doubt that provisions which, if applied retrospectively, would deprive of their existing finality orders which, when that statute came into force, were final, are provisions which touch existing rights."

The argument for the respondent is that the assessee has obtained a right under the order passed by the Income-tax Officer to claim credit for the specified amount under s. 18A(5) and the said right cannot be taken away by the retrospective operation of s. 13 of the Amendment Act. The same argument is put in another form by contending that the finality of the order passed by the Income-tax Officer cannot be impaired by the retrospective operation of the relevant provision. In our opinion, this argument does not really help the respondent's case because the order passed by the Income-tax Officer under s. 18A(5) cannot be said to be final in the literal sense of the word. This order was and continued to be liable to be modified under s. 35 of the Act. What the Income-tax Officer has purported to do in the present case is not to revise his order in the light of the retrospective amendment made by s. 13 of the Amendment Act alone, but to exercise his power under s. 35 of the Act; and so the question which falls to be considered in the present appeal centres round the construction of the expression "mistake apparent from the record" used in s. 35. That is why we think the principle of the finality of the orders or the sanctity of the existing rights cannot be effectively invoked by the respondent in the present case.

The respondent then urged that the Amendment Act should not be given greater retrospective operation than its language and its general scheme render necessary. This contention is based on the provisions of s. 3, sub-s. (2), s. 7, sub-s. (2) and s. 30, sub-s. (2) of the Amendment Act. Where the Amendment Act intended that its provisions should affect even concluded orders of assessment it is expressly so provided. Since s. 13 does not specifically authorise the re-opening of concluded assessments, it should be held that its retrospective operation is not intended to cover such concluded assessments. That in brief is the argument. We are, however, not satisfied that this argument is well-founded. Let us examine the three provisions of the Amendment Act on which the argument rests. Section 3, sub-s. (1) of the Amendment Act makes several additions and modifications in s. 4 of the principal Act. Section 3, sub-s. (2) then provides that the amendments made by sub-cl. (3) of cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) shall be deemed to be operative in relation to all assessments for any year whether such assessments have or have not been concluded before the commencement of the Amendment Act of 1953. It would be noticed that the main object of this sub-section is to extend the retrospective operation of the relevant provisions of the Amendment Act beyond the first of April 1952 mentioned by s. 1, sub-s. (2) of the Amendment Act. Since it was intended to provide for such further retrospective operation of the relevant provision the Legislature thought it advisable to clarify the position by saying that the said extended retrospective operation would cover all assessments whether they had been completed or not before the commencement of the Amendment Act. Section 7, sub-s. (1) adds two provisos to s. 9 of the principal Act by cls. (a) and (b). Sub-section (2) of s. 7 then lays down that the amendments made in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) shall be deemed to be operative for any assessment for the year-ending the 31st day of March, 1952, whether made before or after the commencement of this Act and, where any such assessment has been made before such commencement, the Income-tax Officer concerned shall revise it whenever necessary to give effect to this amendment. The position under s. 30, sub-s. (2) of the Amendment Act is substantially similar. By sub-s. (1) of this section certain additions and amendments are made in the schedule to the principal Act by cls. (a), (b), (c) and (d). Sub-section (2) then provides for the retrospective operation of the amendment made by sub-s. (1) in terms similar to those used in s. 7, sub-s. (2). It is clear that the provisions in ss. 7 and 30 are intended for the benefit of the assesses and so the Legislature may have thought it necessary to confer on the Income-tax Officer specific and express power to revise his orders in respect of the relevant assessments wherever necessary to give effect to the amendments in question. The effect of this provision is to make it obligatory on the Income-tax Officer to revise his original orders in the light of the amendments and also to confer on the assessee right to claim such revision. It may be conceded that in respect of the other retrospective provisions of the Amendment Act such a power to revise the earlier orders cannot be claimed or exercised by the Income-tax Officer. In other words, a distinction can be drawn between these two provisions of the Amendment Act and the rest in respect of the power which the Income-tax Officer can purport to exercise to give effect to the amendments made by the Amendment Act. Whereas, in respect of the amendments made by s. 7 and s. 30 of the Amendment Act, the Income-tax Officer can and must revise his earlier orders covered by s. 7, sub-s. (2) and s. 30, sub-s. (2), such a power of revision has not been conferred on him in the matter of giving effect to the other amendments made in the Amendment Act. Even so, we do not think it would be legitimate or reasonable to hold that the provisions of s. 7(2) and s. 30(2) lead to the inference that the retrospective operation of the other provisions of the Amendment Act is not intended to affect concluded assessments in any manner whatever. In this connection, it would be pertinent to remember that the power to revise, which has been conferred on the Income-tax Officer by s. 7(2) and s. 30(2) of the Amendment Act, is distinct and independent of the power to rectify mistakes which the Income-tax Officer can exercise under s. 35 of the Act.

It is in the light of this position that the extent of the Income-tax Officer's power under s. 35 to rectify mistakes apparent from the record must be determined; and in doing so, the scope and effect of the expression "mistake apparent from the record" has to be ascertained. At the time when the Income-tax Officer applied his mind to the question of rectifying the alleged mistake, there can be no doubt that he had to read the principal Act as containing the inserted proviso as from April 1, 1952. If that be the true position then the order which he made giving credit to the respondent for Rs. 50,603-15-0 is plainly and obviously inconsistent with a specific and clear provision of the statute and that must inevitably be treated as a mistake of law apparent from the record. If a mistake of fact apparent from the record of the assessment order can be rectified under s. 35, we see no reason why a mistake of law which is glaring and obvious cannot be similarly rectified. Prima facie it may appear somewhat strange that an order which was good and valid when it was made should be treated as patently invalid and wrong by virtue of the retrospective operation of the Amendment Act. But such a result is necessarily involved in the legal fiction about the retrospective operation of the Amendment Act. If, as a result of the said fiction we must read the subsequently inserted proviso as forming part of s. 18A(5) of the principal Act as from April 1, 1952, the conclusion is inescapable that the order in question is inconsistent with the provisions of the said proviso and must be deemed to suffer from a mistake apparent from the record. That is why we think that the Income-tax Officer was justified in the present case in exercising his power under s. 35 and rectifying the said mistakes. Incidentally we may mention that in Meka Venkatappaiah v. Addl. Inc.-Tax Officer,⁴ the High Court of Andhra has taken the same view.

In this connection it would be useful to refer to the decision of the Privy Council in the *Comr. of Inc.-Tax, Bom. & Aden v. Khemchand Ramdas*⁵. In Khemchand's case, the assessee was registered as a firm and they were assessed under s. 23(4) on an income of Rs. 1,25,000 at the maximum rate. Being a registered firm no super-tax was levied. A notice of demand was also made before March 1927. On February 13, 1928, the Commissioner, in exercise of his powers under s. 33, cancelled the order registering the assessee as a firm and directed the Income-tax Officer to take necessary action. The Income-tax Officer accordingly assessed the firm to super-tax on May 4, 1929. The Privy Council held that the assessment made on January 17, 1927, was final both in respect of the income-tax and super-tax. The fresh action taken by the Income-tax Officer on May 4, 1929, was out of time though it had been taken in pursuance of the directions of the Commissioner and that the order of May 4, 1929, was one which the Income-tax Officer had no power to make. One of the points raised before the Privy Council was whether, under the relevant circumstances the Income-tax Officer had power to make the impugned order in view of the provisions of ss. 34 and 35 of the Act. The Privy Council dealt with this question on the footing that the Commissioner's order cancelling the registration had been properly made. On this basis their Lordships thought that it was unnecessary to consider whether the case would attract the provisions of s. 34 "inasmuch as in their Lordships' opinion the case clearly would have fallen within the provisions of s. 35 had the Income-tax Officer exercised his powers under the section within one year from the date on which the earlier demand was served upon the respondents". The judgment shows that their Lordships took the view that "looking at the record of the assessments made upon the respondents as it stood after the cancellation of the respondents' registration and the order effecting the cancellation would have formed part of the record—it would be apparent that a mistake had been made in stating that no super-tax was leviable." This decision clearly shows that the subsequent cancellation of the assessee's registration was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council to form part of the record retrospectively in the light of the said subsequent event, and the order was deemed to suffer from a mistake apparent from the record so as to justify the exercise of the rectification powers under s. 35 of the Act. It is because their Lordships thought that s. 35 would have been clearly applicable that they did not decide the question as to whether s. 34 could also have been invoked. This decision lends considerable support to the view which we are disposed to take about the true meaning and scope of the expression "the mistake apparent from the record" occurring in s. 35.

We must accordingly hold that the High Court of Bombay was in error in coming to the conclusion that the notice issued by the Income-tax Officer calling upon the respondent to pay the sum of Rs. 29,446-9-0 was not warranted by law. The result is the order passed by the High Court issuing a writ against the appellant is set aside and the appeal is allowed with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY v. M/S. AMRITLAL BHOGILAL & CO.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 33B, 26A, 23(5)(a) & (b), 30(1), 31, 33A—Income-tax Officer granting registration to assessee firm and passing assessment order in respect of firm—Appeal by assessee against assessment made by Income-tax Officer disposed of by Appellate Assistant Commissioner—Whether Commissioner can under s. 33B(1) set aside order of registration made by Income-tax Officer—Order of registration whether merges in appellate order—Exercise of Commissioner's power under s. 33B(1) to set aside registration of assessee firm where assessee's appeal against assessment pending before Appellate Assistant Commissioner.

An order passed by the Income-tax Officer granting registration to an assessee firm continues to be an order passed by the Income-tax Officer even after the assessee's appeal against the assessment made by the Income-tax Officer on the basis that the assessee was a registered firm has been disposed of by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. Such an order of registration passed by the Income-tax Officer does not merge in the appellate order and the Commissioner can, under s. 33B(1) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, exercise his revisional powers in respect of it.

*Shapurji v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay*¹ and Rex v. Special Commissioner of Income-tax (Ex parte Elmhorst),² referred to.

An order of registration of an assessee firm made by the Income-tax Officer in respect of a particular assessment year can be made the subject-matter of the exercise of the Commissioner's revisional power under s. 33B(1) of the Act even though the assessee's appeal against the assessment for the said year is pending before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner at the material time.

GAJENDRAGADKAR J. This is an appeal by the Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, by special leave and it raises a short question of law under s. 33B of the Income-tax Act. The respondent assessee had been registered as a firm under s. 26A of the Act for the year 1946-47. For the assessment years 1947-48, 1948-49 and 1949-50, the Income-tax Officer made the assessment on the respondent on June 7, 1949, June 7, 1949 and September 23, 1949, respectively, under s. 23(3) of the Act. The Income-tax Officer made an estimate about the profits of the respondent under the proviso to s. 13 and computed the total income of the respondent at Rs. 95,053, Rs. 93,430 and Rs. 83,752 for the said years respectively. The respondent had applied for and obtained renewal of registration of the firm. The Income-tax Officer had also passed an order under s. 23(6) of the Act and allocated the shares of the various parties.

Against the said assessment orders the respondent preferred an appeal to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. On November 4, 1950, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner reduced the respondent's estimated profit by Rs. 28,250 in the assessment year 1947-48 and by Rs. 19,000 in the assessment year 1948-49. The respondent's appeal in regard to the assessment year 1949-50 was pending before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner.

Meanwhile it had come to the notice of the Commissioner of Income-tax that the respondent firm which had been granted renewal of registration by the Income-tax Officer was not a firm which could be registered under the Act as one of the partners of the firm was a minor. The Commissioner then took action under s. 33B(1) of the Act and issued notice to the respondent to show cause why the assessments made under s. 23(3) of the Act and the registration granted under s. 26A should not be cancelled. After hearing the parties, the Commissioner passed an order under s. 33B(1) on June 5, 1952, by which he cancelled the registration of the firm under s. 26A and directed the Income-tax Officer to make fresh assessments against the respondent as an unregistered firm for all the three years. As a result of this revisional order passed by the Commissioner of Income-tax, the Income-tax Officer passed fresh orders.

The respondent preferred five appeals to the tribunal; two of these were against the orders passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner under s. 31 and related to the assessment years 1947-48 and 1948-49; while the remaining three challenged the orders passed by the Commissioner of Income-tax under s. 33B(1) of the Act and related to the assessment years 1947-48, 1948-49 and 1949-50. In these three appeals, with which we are concerned, the respondent had urged that the Commissioner was not competent in law to pass an order setting aside an assessment which had been confirmed or modified by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner; that the orders passed by the Commissioner under s. 33B(1) were bad in law as they directed the Income-tax Officer to pass an order in a particular manner and that the orders passed by the Income-tax Officer subsequent to the cancellation of the respondent's registration were bad in law as they were passed without giving notice to, or hearing, the respondent. On January 2, 1952, the Tribunal upheld the contentions raised by the respondent and allowed the appeals.

The appellant then moved the tribunal under s. 66(1) of the Act for referring the questions specified in its application for the opinion of the High Court. The tribunal accordingly framed the following three questions and referred them to the High Court of Bombay:

"1. Whether on the facts and circumstances of the case the Commissioner of Income-tax acting under s. 33B(1) can set aside the orders passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, for the assessment years 1947-48 and 1948-49?

2. Whether on the facts and circumstances of the case the order passed by the Commissioner of Income-Tax dated 5th June 1951, is bad in law as it directs the Income-Tax Officer to pass an order in a particular manner?

3. Whether on the facts and circumstances of the case orders passed by the Income-Tax Officer dated 21-8-52 are bad in law, as fresh notices as required by Sections 22 and 23 of the Income-Tax Act were not given by the Income-Tax Officer to the assessee?"

This matter was heard by the High Court on March 5, 1953. In regard to the assessments made for the years 1947-48 and 1948-49 the High Court held that the question raised by the appellant was concluded by the judgment already delivered by it in the *Commr. of Inc.-Tax v. Tejaji Parasram Khara-wala*¹. In Tejaji's case the High Court had held that when an appeal is provided from a decision of the tribunal and the appeal Court, after hearing the appeal, passes an order, the order of the original Court ceases to exist and is merged in the order of the appeal Court; and although the appeal Court may merely confirm the order of the trial Court, the order that stands and is operative is not the order of the trial Court but the order of the appeal Court. In that view of the matter, since the Income-tax Officer's order granting registration to the respondent was assumed to have merged in the appellate order, the revisional power of the Commissioner could not be exercised in respect of it. The same view has been taken in the majority decision of the Patna High Court in *Durgabati & Narmadabala Gupta v. Commr. of Inc.-Tax*². In respect of the Income-tax Officer's order renewing registration to the respondent for the year 1949-50, the High Court took the view that the revisional power of the Commissioner could not be exercised even in respect of this order because the propriety or the correctness of this order was open to consideration by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner in the respondent's appeal then pending before him (*Commr. I.T. v. Amritlal*³). In respect of this order the High Court had framed an additional question. It was in these terms (p. 813):

"Whether the order of the Commissioner acting under s. 33B(1) setting aside the order of the Income-Tax Officer while an appeal from that order was pending before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was valid?"

The High Court answered this additional question also in favour of the assessee. In the result the High Court held that the Commissioner's order cancelling the respondent's registration for all the three years in question was invalid. That is why the High Court did not think it necessary to answer the remaining two questions framed by the tribunal.

The application subsequently made by the appellant to the High Court for a certificate under s. 66A(2) was rejected by the High Court. Thereupon the appellant applied for and obtained special leave from this Court on March 22, 1954. The appellant's contention is that the view taken by the High Court that the Commissioner of Income-tax could not have exercised his revisional power in respect of the Income-tax Officer's order granting registration to the respondent with regard to all the three years in question is based on a misconstruction of the relevant provisions of s. 33B of the Act.

Section 33B(1), which confers revisional power on the Commissioner, provides that the Commissioner may call for and examine the record of any proceeding under the Act, and if he considers that any order passed therein by the Income-tax Officer is erroneous in so far as it is prejudicial to the interests of the revenue, he may, after giving the assessee an opportunity of being heard and, after making and causing to be made such enquiry as he deems necessary, pass such order thereon as the circumstances of the case justify including an order enhancing or modifying the assessment or cancelling the assessment or directing a fresh assessment. Sub-section (2) provides that orders of re-assessment made under s. 34 cannot be revised under s. 33B(1) and adds that the said revisional power cannot be exercised after the lapse of two years from the date of the order sought to be revised. Sub-section (3) gives the assessee the right to prefer an appeal to the appellate tribunal against the Commissioner's revisional order within the prescribed period; and sub-s. (4) provides for the procedure for filing such an appeal.

In the present appeal two short questions fall to be decided under s. 33B(1). Does the order passed by the Income-tax Officer granting registration to the assessee firm continue to be an order passed by the Income-tax Officer even after the assessee's appeal against the assessment made by the Income-tax Officer on the basis that the assessee was a registered firm has been disposed of by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner? In other words, where the appeal preferred by an assessee against his assessment has been considered and decided by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, does the order of registration along with the subsequent order of assessment merge in the appellate order? If, in law, the order of registration can be said to merge in the final appellate order, then clearly the Commissioner's revisional power cannot be exercised in respect of it. This question arises in respect of the registration order in regard to the two assessment years 1947-48 and 1948-49. The other question which also falls to be decided is whether the order of registration in respect of the assessment year 1949-50 can be made the subject-matter of the exercise of the Commissioner's revisional power even though the assessee's appeal against the assessment for the said year is pending before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner at the material time.

There can be no doubt that, if an appeal is provided against an order passed by a tribunal, the decision of the appellate authority is the operative decision in law. If the appellate authority modifies or reverses the decision of the tribunal, it is obvious that it is the appellate decision that is effective and can be enforced. In law the position would be just the same even if the appellate decision merely confirms the decision of the tribunal. As a result of the confirmation or affirmance of the decision of the tribunal by the appellate authority the original decision merges in the appellate decision and it is the appellate decision alone which subsists and is operative and capable of enforcement; but the question is whether this principle can apply to the Income-tax Officer's order granting registration to the respondent.

In dealing with this question it would be necessary first to refer to the relevant provisions of the Act in regard to the granting of registration. Section 26A of the Act lays down the procedure for the registration of firms. An application has to be made by the firm in that behalf specifying the particulars prescribed by the said section and by the material rules framed under the Act. If registration is granted by the Income-tax Officer it enables the Income-tax Officer to adopt the procedure prescribed by s. 23(5)(a) for making assessment orders in respect of the registered firm. If a firm is not registered the Income-tax Officer is required to follow the procedure prescribed by s. 23(5)(b) in making assessment orders in respect of unregistered firms. A firm is an assessee under s. 2(2) whether it is registered under s. 26A or not. The Act does not impose an obligation on firms to apply for and obtain registration. The Act in terms does not purport to define the effect of registration nor does it enumerate the rights of parties on registration of firms. Section 23(5)(a) and (b) provide for the machinery for collecting or recovering the tax and in no sense can they be treated as charging sections. Broadly stated, even if a firm is registered in pursuance of an application made under s. 26A, no difference arises in the liability of the firm or its individual partners to be taxed for the total income as may be determined by the Income-tax Officer under ss. 3 and 4 of the Act. The computation of taxable income is not at all affected by the machinery provided by s. 23(5). The decision in *Shapurji v. Commissioner of Income-Tax, Bombay*⁴ on which Mr. Ayyangar himself relied clearly brings out and emphasizes this position. It is true that the Income-tax Officer is empowered to follow the two methods specified in s. 23(5)(a) and (b) in determining the tax payable by registered and unregistered firms respectively and making the demand for the tax so found due; but this does not affect the computation of taxable income. It is important to bear in mind that the order granting registration to an assessee firm is an independent and separate order and it merely affects or governs the procedure to be adopted in collecting or recovering the tax found due. It is not disputed that the registration granted by the Income-tax Officer to an assessee firm can be cancelled by him either under s. 23(4) or under r. 6B. It is also clear that the Income-tax Officer's order granting registration can be cancelled by the Commissioner under s. 33B(1). The argument for the respondent, however, is that, as a result of the decision of the appeal preferred by him against the Income-tax Officer's order of assessment, the order of registration passed by the Income-tax Officer in favour of the respondent has ceased to be the order passed by the Income-tax Officer as such.

It is, therefore, necessary to inquire whether the order of registration passed by the Income-tax Officer can be challenged by the department before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner where the assessee firm has preferred an appeal against the order of assessment. The decision of this question would obviously depend upon the relevant provisions of the Act in respect of appeals to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and the powers of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. Section 30(1) gives the assessee the right to prefer appeals against the orders specified in the said section. The assessee firm can, for instance, object to the amount of income assessed under s. 23 or s. 27. The assessee firm can also object to the order passed by the Income-tax Officer refusing to register it under s. 23(4) or s. 26A. It can likewise object to the cancellation by the Income-tax Officer of its registration under s. 23(4). It is significant that, whereas an appeal is provided against orders passed by the Income-tax Officer under s. 23(4) or s. 26A either refusing to register the firm or cancelling registration of the firm, no appeal can be filed by the department against the order granting registration. Indeed it is patent that the scheme of the Act in respect of appeals to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner is that it is only the assessee who is given a right to make an appeal and not the department. Thus there can be no doubt that the Income-tax Officer's order granting registration to a firm cannot become the subject-matter of an appeal before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner.

The next question which must be considered is whether the Income-tax Officer's order granting registration to a firm can be challenged by the department during the hearing of the firm's appeal against the final order of assessment made by the Income-tax Officer? The powers of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner are to be found in s. 31 of the Act. Section 31(3)(a) authorises the Appellate Assistant Commissioner to confirm, reduce, enhance or annul the assessment under appeal. Under s. 31(3)(b), wide powers are given to the appellate authority to set aside the assessment or direct the Income-tax Officer to make fresh assessment after making such further enquiry as the Income-tax Officer may think fit or as the Appellate Assistant Commissioner may direct. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner is also given the authority, in the case of an order cancelling the registration of the firm under sub-s. (4) of s. 23 or refusing to register a firm under sub-s. (4) of s. 23 or s. 26A or to make a fresh assessment under s. 27, to confirm such order or cancel it and direct the Income-tax Officer to register the firm or to make a fresh assessment as the case may be. This section further lays down that, at the hearing of an appeal against the order of an Income-tax Officer, the Income-tax Officer shall have the right to be heard either in person or by his representative. It is thus clear that wide powers have been conferred on the Appellate Assistant Commissioner under s. 31. It is also clear that, before the appellate authority exercises his powers, he is bound to hear the Income-tax Officer or his representative. It has been urged before us by Mr. Ayyangar on behalf of the respondent that these provisions indicate that, in exercise of his wide powers the Appellate Assistant Commissioner can, in a proper case, after hearing the Income-tax Officer or his representative, set aside the order of registration passed by the Income-tax Officer. We are not prepared to accept this argument. The powers of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, however wide, have, we think, to be exercised in respect of the matters which are specifically made appealable under s. 30(1) of the Act. If any order has been deliberately left out from the jurisdiction of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner it would not be open to the appellate authority to entertain a plea about the correctness, propriety or validity of such an order. Indeed, if the respondent's contention is accepted, it would virtually give the department a right of appeal against the order in question and there can be no doubt that the scheme of the Act is not to give the department a right of appeal to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner against any orders passed by the Income-tax Officer. The order granting registration can be cancelled by the Income-tax Officer himself either under r. 6B or under s. 23(4). It may be cancelled by the Commissioner in exercise of his revisional power under s. 33B; but it cannot be cancelled by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner in exercise of his appellate jurisdiction under s. 31 of the Act. It is true that, in dealing with the assessee's appeal against the order of assessment, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner may modify the assessment, reverse it or send it back for further enquiry; but any order that the Appellate Assistant Commissioner may make in respect of any of the matters brought before him in appeal will not and cannot affect the order of registration made by the Income-tax Officer. If that be the true position, the order of registration passed by the Income-tax Officer stands outside the jurisdiction of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and does not strictly form part of the proceedings before the appellate authority. Even after the appeal is decided and in consequence the appellate order is the only order which is valid and enforceable in law, what merges in the appellate order is the Income-tax Officer's order under appeal and not his order of registration which was not and could never become the subject-matter of an appeal before the appellate authority. The theory that the order of the tribunal merges in the order of the appellate authority cannot, therefore, apply to the order of registration passed by the Income-tax Officer in the present case.

In this connection we may refer to the argument which Mr. Ayyangar, for the respondent, seriously pressed before us. He contended that, when the Appellate Assistant Commissioner hears the assessee's appeal, he is himself computing the total taxable income of the assessee and, in discharging his obligation in that behalf, he may be entitled to consider all relevant and incidental questions. In support of this argument Mr. Ayyangar referred us to the decision in Rex v. Special Commissioner of Income Tax (Ex parte Elmhirst).⁵ The point which arose before the King's Bench Division in this case was whether, when a notice of appeal has been given, it was open to the assessee to withdraw his appeal and the Court held that once notice of appeal is given the appellate authority was entitled and indeed bound to see that a true assessment of the amount of the taxpayer's liability was arrived at. We are unable to see how this decision can really help the respondent in the present case. When an appeal is taken before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner undoubtedly he is bound to examine the case afresh, but that cannot bring within the purview of his appellate jurisdiction matters which are deliberately left out by the Act. If s. 30(1) does not provide for an appeal against a particular order, Legislature obviously intends that the correctness of the said order cannot be impeached before the appellate authority. The jurisdiction and powers of the appellate authority must inevitably be determined by the specific and relevant provisions of the Act.

In this connection it may be useful to compare the relevant and material features of the revisional powers conferred on the Commissioner by ss. 33A and 33B respectively. The Commissioner's revisional power under s. 33A cannot be exercised to the prejudice of the assessee in any case. It can be exercised in respect of orders passed by any authority subordinate to the Commissioner; but in no case can the revisional order prejudicially affect the assessee. It is significant that the explanation to s. 33A expressly provides that the Appellate Assistant Commissioner shall be deemed to be an authority subordinate to the Commissioner. In other words, in exercise of this revisional power the Commissioner may modify or reverse in favour of the assessee even the orders passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. The position under s. 33B, however, is different. The Commissioner's revisional power under s. 33B can be exercised only in respect of orders passed by the Income-tax Officer. The appellate orders are outside the purview of s. 33B. That is one important distinction between the two revisional powers. The other important distinction is that, whereas under s. 33A the revisional jurisdiction cannot be exercised to the prejudice of the assessee, under s. 33B the Commissioner can, in exercise of his revisional power, make orders to the prejudice of the assessee. It is not disputed that under s. 33B erroneous orders passed by the Income-tax Officer which are prejudicial to the revenue can be revised by the Commissioner. Now, the Income-tax Officer's order registering the firm is not appealable and so it cannot become the subject-matter of an appeal before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. Such an order can, therefore, be revised by the Commissioner under s. 33B whenever he considers that it has been erroneously passed. In the present case there is no doubt that the respondent firm cannot be validly registered in view of the fact that one of its partners is a minor and so, on the merits, the Commissioner's order is clearly right. We must accordingly hold that the High Court was in error in taking the view that the Commissioner had no authority to set aside the registration order passed by the Income-tax Officer granting registration to the respondent for the years 1947-48 and 1948-49.

The case in regard to the subsequent year 1949-50 presents no difficulty. The appeal preferred by the respondent against the Income-tax Officer's assessment order in respect of this year was pending at the material time before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner; and so no question of merger arose in respect of the order granting renewal of registration for this period. There can be no doubt that even on the theory of merger the pendency of an appeal may put the order under appeal in jeopardy but until the appeal is finally disposed of the said order subsists and is effective in law. It cannot be urged that the mere pendency of an appeal has the effect of suspending the operation of the order under appeal. The High Court, however, appears to have taken the view that the revisional power is an extraordinary power and can be exercised only for unusual and extraordinary reasons. It was also assumed by the High Court that, in the pending appeal, the department would have an alternative remedy because, according to the High Court, the department could have challenged the validity or the propriety of the respondent's registration and could have asked the Appellate Assistant Commissioner to cancel it. As we have already pointed out, the department could not challenge the validity of the registration order in the assessee's appeal before the appellate authority and so the argument that the department had an alternative remedy is not correct. It is clear from the judgment of the High Court that it is the assumption that the department had an alternative remedy which weighed with the learned Judges in reaching their final conclusion. Then the argument that the extraordinary revisional power must be exercised only for extraordinary reasons is really not very material. Whether or not the revisional power can be exercised in a given case must be determined solely by reference to the terms of s. 33B itself. Courts would not be justified in imposing additional limitations on the exercise of the said power on hypothetical considerations of policy or the extraordinary nature of the power. We must, therefore, hold that the High Court was also in error in holding that the Commissioner was not authorised in cancelling the order of the respondent's registration for the year 1949-50. The result is that the view taken by the High Court must be reversed and the first question framed by the tribunal as well as the additional question framed by the High Court must be answered in favour of the appellant.

Then there remain two other questions which were framed by the tribunal but have not been considered by the High Court. The learned counsel appearing for both the parties agree that we need not remit these two questions to the High Court with the direction that the High Court should deal with them in accordance with law; it has been conceded before us that, if the principal question about the Commissioner's power under s. 33B(1) to cancel the respondent's registration is answered in favour of the appellant, then the two remaining questions would become academic and answers to them would also have to be in favour of the appellant. It is true, by his order the Commissioner purported to set aside the assessment orders made under s. 23(3) and s. 55 and directed the Income-tax Officer to make fresh assessments according to law for each of the years in question. If this part of the order is literally construed it would clearly be open to the objection raised by the respondent. The assessment orders passed by the Income-tax Officer for the years 1947-48 and 1948-49 had been modified by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and in that sense they had ceased to be the orders of assessment passed by the Income-tax Officer himself and so the Commissioner could not have exercised his revisional power under s. 33B(1) in respect of the said appellate orders, but we are inclined to think that the Commissioner did not intend to set aside the assessments in this sense. It is clear from the order read as a whole that, having cancelled the respondent's registration, the Commissioner wanted to direct the Income-tax Officer to make suitable consequential amendment in regard to the machinery or procedure to be adopted to recover the tax payable by the respondent. In fact it is conceded that, in his subsequent order, the Income-tax Officer has accepted the figure of the taxable income of the respondent as determined by the appellate authority for the relevant years and has proceeded to act under s. 23(5)(b) on the basis that the respondent is an unregistered firm. Therefore we cannot hold that the order passed by the Commissioner is bad in law on the ground that "he directed the Income-tax Officer to pass the order in a particular manner". The answer to question No. 2 would accordingly be in the negative. Then as regards question No. 3, it is difficult to understand how this question can be said to arise from the proceedings before the tribunal. This question challenges the validity of the procedure adopted by the Income-tax Officer in passing fresh orders against the respondent. This proceeding is clearly subsequent to the impugned order of the Commissioner under s. 33B(1), and so we are unable to see how the tribunal allowed the respondent to raise this contention in appeals which had been filed by the respondent against the Commissioner's order under s. 33B(1). Besides, it has been fairly conceded by Mr. Ayyangar before us that, when the Income-tax Officer merely proceeded to adopt a different machinery to recover the tax due from the respondent in consequence of the cancellation of the respondent's registration, there was no occasion or need to issue another notice against the respondent. We must, accordingly, answer question No. 3 also in the negative.

In the result all the questions framed in this case are answered in favour of the appellant. The order passed by the High Court is set aside and the appeal is allowed with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), Sec. 108—Lessees contracting to hand over building erected on demised land to lessors without compensation on expiry of lease—Whether by reason of such contract lessors become owner of building during subsistence of lease.

Under section 108 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, there is nothing to prevent the lessees contracting to hand over any building or structure erected on the demised land by them to the lessors at the end of the lease without receiving any compensation. Such a contract, however, does not transfer the ownership in the building to the lessors while the lease subsists.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

A. V. Viswanatha Sastri, with Naunit Lal, for the appellants.

L. K. Jha, with Bameshwar Nath, S. N. Andley and P. L. Vohra, for the respondents.

Decided, April 28, 1958. Civil Appeal No. 192 of 1954.*

IMAM J. The appellants, as trustees, of the Mankeshwar Temple Trust had filed suit No. 2325 of 1948 in the High Court of Bombay in its Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction, for a declaration that they were entitled to the building in suit and were entitled to claim possession of the same and to recover the rents and profits thereof. The appellants further prayed that the defendants may be ordered and decreed to obtain a letter of attornment from the tenants of the said property attorning to the appellants, that defendant No. 1 may be ordered to render accounts of the rents received by him from the tenants of the said property from May 23, 1948, and that pending the hearing of the suit a Receiver may be appointed of the property in suit. The appellants had obtained leave of the High Court under O. II, r. 2, of the Civil Procedure Code, reserving to them liberty to file a separate suit with respect to the land on which the building was situated. The learned Judge who heard the suit decreed it in part in favour of the appellants. He also passed an order of injunction restraining defendant Nos. 1, 2 and 5, their agents and servants, from interfering with the exercise of the rights of the appellants in obtaining possession of the building or otherwise effectuating their possession consistently with the provisions of law. He further directed defendant No. 1 to account for the rents recovered by him from and after May 23, 1948, till the date of the decree. He refused to grant the prayer that the defendants be directed to obtain letters of attornment from the tenants of the building in favour of the appellants. Against this decision the defendants appealed and a Division Bench of the High Court allowed the appeal, reversed the decision of the trial Judge and dismissed the suit with costs.

On May 23, 1927, Krishnarao Ganpatrao and Shamrao Ganpatrao, as trustees of the Mankeshwar Temple, executed a registered lease, exh. A, in favour of Moreswar Kashinath and Radhabai, wife of Ramkrishna Bhai Thakore, whereby they demised a parcel of land specified in the Schedule to the document. The lease was for twenty-one years. The area of land was about 213.66 square yards and the rent reserved was Rs. 50 per month. Under the terms of the lease the lessee had to construct within six months from the date of the lease a double storeyed building consisting of shops on the ground floor and residential rooms on the upper floor. The cost of construction was to be not less than Rs. 10,000. The construction had to be to the satisfaction of the lessors' engineers. There were certain restrictive covenants in the lease. The building had to be insured for at least Rs. 12,000 in the joint names of the lessors and the lessees with an insurance firm approved by the lessors. If the building was damaged or destroyed it had to be repaired or restored by the use of the insurance money received from the insurance company. On the termination of the lease either at the end of twenty-one years or earlier, the lessees were to surrender and yield up the demised premises including the building with its fixtures and appurtenances to the lessors without any compensation for the same. On May 14, 1948, shortly before the lease was to expire, the appellants who were then the trustees of the temple gave notice to the respondents to deliver possession of the demised premises and the building on the expiry of the lease, that is to say, on May 22, 1948. On May 19, 1948, the respondents replied that they were entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, hereinafter referred to as the Act, and that the appellants were not to interfere with their possession. All that they could get was the rent under the lease from the respondents. On July 23, 1948, the appellants gave the respondents notice to quit the building only as in their opinion the Act did not apply to it. On July 27, 1948, the respondents replied asserting that the Act did apply to it. The appellants, accordingly, filed the present suit in the High Court on September 1, 1948.

The period of the lease under exh. A having expired and the respondents having been given notice to quit, they were bound to vacate the demised premises unless they were protected by the provisions of the Act. Land used for non-agricultural purposes is "premises" under the Act. Although the period of the lease had expired the respondents continued to remain in possession without the assent of the lessors. Under the Act they would, therefore, be tenants of the land within the meaning of that expression as defined in the Act. There can be no question that so far as the land demised by the lease is concerned the respondents could not be evicted so long as they complied with the provisions of the Act and the lessors, as landlords, were unable to resort to any of the provisions of s. 13 of the Act to evict the respondents from the land. Indeed, the appellants did not claim in the plaint that they were entitled to evict the respondents from the demised land. The plaint, as drafted, confined the reliefs claimed by the appellants only to the building constructed on the land.

The substantial question in issue in this appeal is whether on a proper construction of the lease, exh. A, it can be held that not only the land but also the building to be constructed on it had been demised under it. Other questions had also been raised in the course of the arguments: It was argued on behalf of the respondents that the appellants could not get possession of the building until the lease had been determined. The lease could not be determined as under the law they could not be compelled to give up possession of the land demised under the lease as they were tenants of the land within the meaning of the Act. A further submission made was that even if the lease did not purport to demise the building which was to be constructed on the land demised under that document, the appellants were not entitled to get a declaration to the effect that they were entitled to the rents and profits from the building which had been let out to several persons by the respondents and the respondents could not be restrained from interfering with the collection of the rents and profits from the building by the appellants so long as the respondents were in possession of the land demised. It was also urged that the suit must at any rate fail on the ground that defendant No. 4 having died before the institution of the suit and her name being struck off from the category of defendants and her legal heirs and representatives not having been brought on to the record the suit was bad on account of non-joinder of necessary parties.

A perusal of the Schedule to the lease shows that what was demised thereunder was a parcel of land of an area of about 213 square yards with New Survey No. 1/2600 cadastral survey No. 96. The Schedule leaves no room for doubt as to what was demised. Under the terms of the lease the rent payable for this land was Rs. 50 per month. The terms of the lease show that the land was demised for the purpose of constructing a building thereon by the lessees. Clause 1 of the lease may be quoted as the respondents have strongly relied upon this clause in support of their contention that what was demised under the lease was not only the land but also the building to be erected thereon. This clause runs as follows:

"In consideration of the expenses to be incurred by the Lessees in and about the erection and completion of the building hereinafter mentioned and the rents hereinafter reserved and the Lessee's covenants hereinafter contained the lessors do hereby demise UNTO the lessees ALL that piece or parcel of land situated at Supari Baug Road, more particularly described in the schedule hereto and delineated in the plan thereof hereto annexed and marked "A" and therein bounded by a red line TO HOLD the premises unto the LESSEES for the term of 21 (twenty-one) years to be computed from the date of these presents yielding and paying therefor on the 10th day of each and every Calendar month the first of such payments to be made on 10th of June next, upon the terms and subject to the covenants and conditions hereafter contained:—"

Another clause upon which reliance had been placed was cl. 6 which provides for the building to be erected to be insured in the joint names of the lessors and the lessees with an insurance company approved by the lessors. It was pointed out that the building was to be handed over to the lessors at the end of the lease without compensation to the lessees.

We have examined the various clauses of the lease and find that in none of them has it been positively stated that the building to be erected on the demised land would be in the ownership of the lessors and that the building would be deemed to have been leased to the lessees along with the demised land. Under the law there was no impediment in the way of the parties to have had a clause, in a positive form, to that effect. In the absence of such a clause the various clauses of the lease, as they exist, will have to be construed in order to ascertain whether on a proper construction thereof it can be said that there had also been a demise of the building. The Schedule to the lease, as already stated, specifically mentions that the land had been demised and there is no mention therein that the building when constructed thereon would also form part of the demised property. In 1927 when the lease was executed the Act was not in existence and it may reasonably be said that none of the parties had ever in contemplation that the Act or anything akin thereto would become law in the future affecting the rights of the parties under the lease. The various clauses of the lease are consistent with the ownership in the building being with the lessees in which the lessors had no right while the lease subsisted. In the case of *Narayan Das Khettry v. Jatindra Nath Roy Chowdhury*¹ the Privy Council approved the observations of Sir Barnes Peacock in the case of *Thakoor Chunder Poramanick v. Bamdhone Bhuttacharjee*² to the following effect (p. 228):

"We have not been able to find in the laws or customs of this country any traces of the existence of an absolute rule of law that whatever is affixed or built on the soil becomes a part of it, and is subjected to the same rights of property as the soil itself." In the case of *Vallabhdas Naranji v. Development Officer, Bandra*³ the Privy Council once again referred to Sir Barnes Peacock's observations as stated above. The Privy Council also quoted the following observation of Couch C.J., in the case of *Narayanbin Raghoji v. Bholagir Guru Mangir*⁴ (p. 85):

"...We cannot, however, apply to cases arising in India the doctrine of the English law as to buildings, viz., that they should belong to the owner of the land. The only doctrine which we can apply is the doctrine established in India that the party so building on another's land should be allowed to remove the materials."

Normally, under s. 108 of the Transfer of Property Act, before the expiry of the lease, a lessee can remove all structures and buildings erected by him on the demised land. All that was necessary for him to do was to give back the land to the lessor, on the termination of the lease, in the same condition as he found it. The ownership, therefore, of the building in this case was not with the lessors but was with the lessees. Under s. 108 of the Transfer of Property Act there was nothing to prevent the lessees contracting to hand over any building or structure erected on the land by them to the lessors without receiving any compensation. In other words, although under s. 108 the lessees had the right to remove the building, by the contract they had agreed to hand over the same to the lessors without the right to receive compensation at the end of the lease, the matter being entirely one of contract between the parties. Such a contract, however, did not transfer the ownership in the building to the lessors while the lease subsisted.

The various clauses of the lease in the present case make a clear distinction between the demised premises and the building by using the words "demised premises including the building to be erected thereon". It was, however, urged on behalf of the respondents that cl. 1 of the lease indicated that what was demised by the lease was not only the land but also the building to be constructed thereon, because the opening words of cl. 1 make it clear that in consideration of the expenses to be incurred by the lessees in erection and completion of the building and the rent reserved the lessors demised to the lessees the land mentioned in the Schedule. The important words in this clause were "to hold the premises" and not to hold the demised premises. The word "premises" covered both the land and the building to be erected thereon. The intention of the parties was that the premises would be held at a moderate rent of Rs. 50 per month as the lessees were going to incur the expenses of erecting the building, maintaining it in proper repair and paying all taxes in connection therewith. In the course of 21 years the lessees would have not only received back the money invested by them in the erection of the building but would have also enjoyed a large margin of profit. Under cl. 5, at the end of the lease, the premises held by the lessees, would be handed over to the lessors, that is to say, the land and the building erected on it without the lessors paying any compensation for the building. Under cl. 6 the building was to be insured in the joint names of the lessors and the lessees. In cl. 9 of the lease the expression "the said demised premises" appears and this clause guaranteed to the lessees enjoyment of peaceful possession of the premises. This clause came after all the clauses referring to the building to be erected on the land. If cls. 1, 5, 6 and 9 were read together and properly construed, it would appear that the intention of the parties was that not only the land demised but also the building which was to be constructed on it was the subject of the lease, as that was the only purpose for which the land was given on lease. These clauses do not necessarily lead to the conclusion suggested. If the ownership in the building was intended to be with the lessors, there was no occasion for providing that the lessees would get no compensation when the building was handed over. This provision rather suggests that the ownership in the building was with the lessees. On behalf of the respondents much reliance was placed on the decision of this Court in the case of Bhatia Co-operative Housing Society Ltd. v. D. C. Patel.⁵ Many of the terms of the lease in the case cited were similar to the terms to be found in the lease in the present case. There was, however, cl. 18 of the lease in the case referred to, which expressly stated that immediately after the completion of the building within the time specified in cl. 7, the lessors of the land would grant to the lessees a lease of the land with the building thereon for a term of 999 years from the date of the auction at a yearly rent calculated in accordance with the accepted bid for the plot. There could be no question, as a matter of interpretation, in the case cited, that a lease would be granted not only of the land but also of the building on it for a term of 999 years from the date of the auction. There is no such clause in the lease in the present case. The decision upon which reliance had been placed does not support the case of the respondents, because in the present case none of the clauses of the lease even remotely suggests that on the completion of the building on the land demised the lease in favour of the lessees would be both of the land and the building erected thereon.

On behalf of the appellants, on the other hand, it was submitted that what was demised was actually the land and the expression "to hold the premises" in cl. 1 meant nothing more than to hold the demised premises. The ownership in the building to be constructed did not pass on to the lessors under the lease. During the subsistence of the lease the ownership of the building remained with the lessees. The lessees contracted to hand over the building without compensation at the end of the lease and in consideration for this the lessees were being demised the land at a small rental of Rs. 50 per month. We have examined the various clauses of the lease and are satisfied that not one of them, if properly construed, indicates that there was any contract between the parties to the effect that the building to be erected on the land would be in the ownership of the lessors and that the same would be deemed to have been demised to the lessees along with the land.

It was next urged that even if there had been no demise of the building to be erected on the land possession of it could not be given to the appellants until the lease had been determined, which in law, could not be determined so long as the respondents could not be evicted from the demised land of which they were tenants within the meaning of the Act. This contention is without force as the provisions of the Act do not provide for the continuation of a lease beyond the specified period stated therein. All that the Act does is to give to the person who continues to remain in possession of the land, although the period of the lease had come to an end, the status of a statutory tenant. That is to say, although the lease had come to an end but the lessee continued to remain in possession without the consent of the lessor, he would nonetheless be a tenant of the land and could not be evicted save as provided by the Act.

It was then submitted that the appellants could not get the declaration to the effect that they were entitled to the rents and profits from the building which had been let out to several persons by the respondents because they could not realise the same without entering upon the land on which the building had been constructed. The appellants could not enter upon the land for the purpose of collecting the rents without the consent of the respondents as the latter were the tenants of the land. They could only enter upon the land as provided for by the Act. The declaration which the appellants seek, however, does not ask for a declaration that they are entitled to enter upon the land. All that it seeks is that they are entitled to the rents and profits of the building which had been let out to several persons by the respondents. The appellants merely seek a declaration of their right to collect the rents and profits from the building. As to how they collect the same was their concern. There seems, therefore, to be no valid objection in law to granting the relief sought by the appellants.

The original lessees were Moreswar Kashinath and Radhabai, wife of Ramakrishna Bhai Thakore. Apparently, these persons were dead and the suit was filed against defendants Nos. 1 to 3 as heirs and legal representatives of Radhabai and defendants Nos. 4 and 5 as heirs and legal representatives of Moreswar Kashinath Thakore. After the suit was filed it was discovered that defendant No. 4 could not be served with a copy of the plaint as she had died before the institution of the suit. Her name was accordingly struck off as a defendant in the suit. It was conceded on behalf of the defendants at the trial that the suit filed against the defendants on a cause of action could not be dismissed merely because of the non-joinder of the legal representatives of defendant No. 4 who was already dead at the institution of the suit. In appeal, the learned Judges were of the opinion that it was not necessary to decide this question because, in their opinion, the suit was bound to fail on other grounds. Whatever other consequences may arise on account of the failure of the appellants to implead the heirs and legal representatives of defendant No. 4, it was conceded on behalf of the respondents at the trial that the suit could not be dismissed merely because of this. It would have been better if the heirs and legal representatives of defendant No. 4 had been brought on to the record as defendants. It seems to us, however, that the suit cannot be dismissed merely on this ground, because the nature of the declaration which the appellants sought could be granted even in the absence of the heirs and representatives of defendant No. 4 being on the record. Though the plaintiffs impleaded 5 persons as defendants in the suit, the plaintiffs claimed a decree against defendant No. 1 only in respect of the rents received by him from the tenants in the building in question. There is no claim against the other defendants for accounts in respect of the usufruct of the property. The correspondence disclosed in the suit, which passed between the plaintiffs and defendant No. 1, showed that it was only he who was in effective control of the building. The suit was contested only by the first three defendants who appear to be brothers and who claim to have continued in possession of the building after the crucial date, i.e., May 22, 1948. It is they who claimed protection under the Act. Defendants Nos. 4 and 5, who were purported to be sued as representatives of one of the joint lessees, do not appear to have taken any interest in the building. After the suit, defendant No. 5 has remained ex parte throughout. After the decree of the trial Court, it is only the first three defendants who preferred an appeal to the High Court. From all these considerations, it appears that defendant No. 4 or her heirs or legal representatives were not necessary parties to the suit. The Court could, therefore, proceed with the suit in their absence.

The appeal, accordingly, is allowed with costs throughout and the decision of the High Court in appeal is set aside. The appellants are entitled to a declaration that the building constructed on the land demised under the lease, exh. A, belongs to the Mankeshwar Temple Trust and the said trust is entitled to recover all the rents and profits from the same and the respondents have no right, title and interest therein since the expiration of the said lease. Respondent No. 1 is directed to render an account of the rents received by him from the tenants of the building from May 23, 1948, and to pay to the appellants the amount found due, after accounting, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from May 23, 1948, until payment. There will be an order of injunction restraining the respondents, their agents and servants from interfering with the collection of rents and profits by the appellants from the tenants of the afore-said building.

Appeal allowed.

MAZAGAON DOCK LTD. v. THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX AND EXCESS PROFITS TAX.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 42(2)—Assessee company incorporated in India and doing business as ship repairers—Share capital of assessee company beneficially owned by non-resident shipping companies—Assessee company under agreement with non-resident companies repairing ships of these companies at cost and without charging profits—Whether assessee company chargeable to tax under s. 42(2).

The assessee was a private limited company incorporated under the Indian Companies Act and was carrying on business as marine engineers and ship repairers. Its registered office was in Bombay and it was resident and ordinarily resident in India. Its entire share capital was beneficially owned by two British companies whose business consisted in plying ships for hire. Under an agreement entered into with the two non-resident companies, the assessee repaired their ships at cost and charged no profits. On the question whether on these facts the assessee was chargeable to tax under s. 42(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, it was contended by the assessee (1) that s. 42(2) of the Act imposes a charge only on a business carried on by a non-resident, and that, therefore, no tax could be imposed under that provision on the business of the assessee who was a resident; and (2) that it is a condition for the levy of a charge under s. 42(2) that the non-resident must carry on business with the resident, and that in the instant case that condition was not satisfied:—

Held, that the business which is the subject-matter of taxation under s. 42(2) is that of the resident and not of a non-resident, that having regard to the course of dealings between the non-resident companies and the assessee it could be said of the former that they carried on business with the latter within the meaning of s. 42(2), and that, therefore, the assessee was chargeable to tax under s. 42(2).

A non-resident must be held to carry on business with a resident within s. 42(2) of the Act, if the dealings between them form concerted and organised activities of a business character.

VENKATARAMA AIYAR J. This is an appeal against the judgment of the High Court of Bombay in a reference under s. 66(1) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, hereinafter referred to as the Act.

The appellant is a private limited company incorporated under the Indian Companies Act, and is carrying on business as marine engineers and ship repairers. Its registered office is in Bombay and it is resident and ordinarily resident in India. Its entire share capital is beneficially owned by two British Companies, the P. & O. Steam Navigation Co. Ltd., and the British Indian Steam Navigation Co. Ltd., whose business consists in plying ships for hire. Under an agreement entered into with the two companies aforesaid, which will be referred to hereinafter as the non-resident companies, the appellant repairs their ships at cost, and charges no profits. Now, the point for determination is whether, on these facts, the appellant is chargeable to tax under s. 42(2) of the Act. That sub-section runs as follows:

"Where a person not resident or not ordinarily resident in the taxable territories carries on business with a person resident in the taxable territories, and it appears to the Income-tax Officer that owing to the close connection between such persons the course of business is so arranged that the business done by the resident person with the person not resident or not ordinarily resident produces to the resident either no profits or less than the ordinary profits which might be expected to arise in that business, the profits derived therefrom, or which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived therefrom, shall be chargeable to income-tax in the name of the resident person who shall be deemed to be, for all the purposes of this Act, the assessee in respect of such income-tax."

The Income-tax Officer, Bombay, who dealt with the matter took the view that the appellant company had so arranged its business with the non-resident companies that it did not produce any profits to it, and that was because it was those companies that really owned its share capital, and that therefore the profits which it could ordinarily have made but for their close financial connection were liable to be taxed under s. 42(2), and he computed the same at Rs. 6,80,000 for the account year 1943-1944, at Rs. 4,67,559 for the account year 1944-1945 and at Rs. 1,68,963 for the account year 1945-1946. On the basis of the above findings, orders of assessment of income-tax were made for the account years 1944-1945 and 1945-1946 and of excess profits tax for the account years 1943-1944, 1944-1945 and 1945-1946. Against these five orders, the appellant preferred appeals to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, who by his order dated July 3, 1952, confirmed the same. Then there was a further appeal by the appellant to the Appellate Tribunal, and the Bench which heard the same having been divided in its opinion, the matters came up for hearing before the President, who by his order dated March 19, 1954, held that s. 42(2) was inapplicable and he accordingly set aside the orders of assessment of income-tax and excess profits tax made on the appellant. On the application of the Department, the Tribunal referred the following question for the opinion of the High Court of Bombay:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case any income falls to be included in the appellant's assessment under s. 42(2)."

The reference was heard by Chagla C.J. and Tendolkar J., who by their judgment dated February 24, 1955, held that, on the facts found, s. 42(2) was applicable and that the appellant was liable to be assessed to income-tax and excess profits tax under that section. The appellant applied under s. 66(4) for leave to appeal against this judgment to this Court, and that application was dismissed. The appellant thereafter applied for and obtained leave to appeal to this Court under art. 136, and hence this appeal.

It must be mentioned that on December 31, 1948, an order of assessment had been made in respect of the income-tax payable by the appellant for the account year 1943-1944, and therein, the profits chargeable under s. 42(2) had not been included. But subsequently, the Income-tax Officer took action under s. 34 of the Act, and on May 29, 1953, made an order assessing the appellant to tax for that year on the profits deemed to have been made by it under s. 42(2), and against that order, an appeal is pending before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner. That order is not the subject-matter of the present proceedings, which are concerned only with the assessment of income-tax for the account years 1944-1945 and 1945-1946 and of excess profits tax for the account years 1943-1944, 1944-1945 and 1945-1946.

Now, the sole point for determination in this appeal is whether on the facts found the appellant is chargeable to tax under s. 42(2) of the Act. Mr Palkhivala, learned counsel for the appellant, contends that it is not, and urges two grounds in support of his contention: (1) that s. 42(2) imposes a charge only on a business carried on by a non-resident, and that, therefore, no tax could be imposed under that provision on the business of the appellant who is a resident; and (2) that it is a condition for the levy of a charge under s. 42(2) that the non-resident must carry on business with the resident, and that in the instant case it is not satisfied. The first ground does not appear to have been put forward in the Court below, but before us it has been presented with great elaboration and pressed with considerable insistence. The argument in support of it may thus be stated: s. 42(2) imposes a charge on profits of a business, actual or notional, when the conditions specified therein are satisfied; but the section does not, in terms, say who the person is whose business is liable to be taxed, but that that can only be the non-resident is clear from other parts of the section. Thus, the tax is imposed under s. 42(2) on profits "derived" from business, which must mean profits actually made therein. Ex hypothesi, the resident has so arranged his business that it produces little or no profits to him. If it has produced some profits, then they are taxable in his hands even apart from this provision, and if he has made no profits, the word "derived" would be inapplicable to his business. Therefore, the profits "derived" and taxable under the section can have reference only to the business of a non-resident. Then again, the profits are chargeable under this section in the name of the resident. If the profits chargeable under s. 42(2) accrue from a business of the resident, he would be the person who would, even apart from the section, be liable for the tax, and in that situation, the expression "in the name of the resident" would be inappropriate. It would make sense if, in fact, the profits accrued in a business carried on by a person other than the resident, and the Legislature sought to tax them in his hands. The true intention behind the legislation, it is said, is that the profits of the non-resident should be taxed, but that the tax should fall on the resident by reason of his close connection with the non-resident. Support for this contention is sought in the provision in s. 42(2) that the resident shall be deemed to be the assessee for all purposes of the Act. The word "deemed" imports, it is argued, a legal fiction, and if it was the business of the resident that was intended to be taxed, then he is, in fact, the assessee, and it would be inconsistent with that position that he should be treated as an assessee by a legal fiction. It is also urged that sub-ss. (1) and (3) of s. 42 deal with the profits of a non-resident and prescribe the conditions under which and the manner in which the tax could be imposed and collected, and s. 42(2) must, in this setting, be construed as referring to the business of the non-resident.

There would have been considerable force in this argument, had there been any ambiguity or uncertainty in the wording of s. 42(2) as to whether it is the business of the resident that is sought to be taxed or that of the non-resident.

But that is not so. The language of the enactment imposing the charge is too plain to admit of any doubt. Now, s. 42(2) is, it may be noted, in two parts. The first part commencing with the opening words "Where a person not resident" and ending with the words "which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived therefrom" prescribes the conditions on which the charge arises. It does not of itself impose the charge. That is done by the second part, which provides that "the profits derived therefrom or which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived therefrom shall be chargeable to income-tax." The word "therefrom" is very important for the purpose of the present discussion. In the context, it can refer only to the business of the resident, and it is this business therefore that is the subject of the charge under s. 42(2). It was suggested for the appellant that the word "therefrom" has reference to the arrangement between the non-resident and the resident, but apart from the fact that such a construction would, on the grammar of it, be untenable, it is impossible to conceive how an arrangement relating to the conduct of business can, as such, be the subject-matter of income-tax, apart from the business in which profits or gains are made. The language of the section is clear beyond all reasonable doubts as to what it is that is sought to be taxed under this section. That is only the business of the resident and not that of the non-resident. In this view, it is only necessary to consider whether there is anything in the wording of the other parts of s. 42(2) relied on for the appellant, which precludes us from giving effect to the plain import of the word "therefrom".

It is on the expression "profits derived" in the charging part of the enactment that the appellant leans heavily in support of his position that it is the business of the non-resident that is really intended to be taxed. But then, those words do not stand alone. They are associated with the words "or which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived", and this association has its origin in the preceding clause "produces to the resident either no profits or less than the ordinary profits which might be expected to arise in that business". This clause contemplates two classes of cases, one where the business of the resident produces no profits and the other where it produces less than the normal profits. The charge is imposed on both these classes of cases, and the word "derived" has reference to the latter, while the words "profits which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived" relate to the former. That both these clauses relate to the business of the resident is clear from the words "to the resident" occurring therein. The word "derived" in s. 42(2) must, therefore, be interpreted as referring to the business of the resident.

The respondent sought further support for this conclusion in the words "which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived" in s. 42(2), and contended that those words could apply only to a business which does not yield profits, and that will fit in, in the context, only with the business of the resident and not of the non-resident. The answer of the appellant to this contention is that the words in question should be construed as meaning not notional profits but such proportion of the actual profits of the non-resident as could reasonably be apportioned to the business in India. Reliance was placed in support of this contention on rr. 33 and 34 of the Indian Income-tax Rules, 1922. Rule 33 provides for the determination of the profits of a non-resident in cases falling within s. 42(1), and one of the modes prescribed for such determination is to fix an amount which bears the same proportion to the total profits of the non-resident as the Indian receipts bear to the total receipts in the business. Rule 34 then provides that "the profits derived from any business carried on in the manner referred to in section 42(2) may be determined for the purposes of assessment to income-tax according to the preceding rule". Now, the argument of Mr. Palkhivala is that the interpretation put on s. 42(2) by the rule-making authorities as manifest in r. 34 is that the business chargeable under s. 42(2) is that of the non-resident, and that the words "which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived therefrom" had reference to the apportionment of the Indian, out of the total profits. We see no force in this contention. There is nothing in r. 34 to justify the assumption that the rule-making authorities considered either that s. 42(2) applied to the business of a non-resident or that the words "which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived therefrom" meant apportionment of the Indian out of the world profits of the non-resident. And even if those be the assumptions on which the rule is based, that can have no effect on the true interpretation of s. 42(2). And whatever doubts one might have had as to the meaning to be given to the words "derived therefrom or which may reasonably be deemed to have been derived therefrom" if they had to be construed in isolation, in the context of the section and read in conjunction with the words "to the resident" and "therefrom", there cannot be any doubt that they have reference to the business of the resident and not that of the non-resident.

The word "or" in the clause would appear to be rather inappropriate, as it is susceptible of the interpretation that when some profits are made but they are less than the normal profits, tax could only be imposed either on the one or on the other, and that accordingly a tax on the actual profits earned would bar the imposition of tax on profits which might have been received. Obviously, that could not have been intended, and the word "or" would have to be read in the context as meaning "and". Vide Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes, Tenth Ed, pp. 238-239. But that, however, does not affect the present question which is whether the word "derived" indubitably points to the business of the non-resident as the one taxable under s. 42(2), and for the reasons already given, the answer must be in the negative.

The appellant also relied on the clauses in s. 42(2) that 'the profits shall be chargeable to tax in the name of the resident' and that 'he shall be deemed to be the assessee for all purposes of the Act' as indicating that it is not the business of the resident that is really sought to be taxed. But these clauses are explainable with reference to the fact that the profits taxed are not actual profits but what are deemed to be profits. It was argued that if it was the intention of the Legislature that what was not profits should be deemed to be profits, that should have been independently provided for before the tax is imposed, and that in the absence of such a provision, the word "deemed" must be construed as referring not to notional profits being treated as actual profits, but to a person who is not, in fact, an assessee, being treated as an assessee. We see no substance in this argument. There is no reason why an enactment should not both declare notional profits as taxable profits and at the same time impose a charge on the resident in respect of those profits, and that, quite clearly, is what s. 42(2) has done. It may be that its language is not felicitous. But there can, however, be no mistaking its sense that it is the resident that is to be dealt with as assessee in respect of profits which he had not, in fact, made. Nor do we see much force in the argument that s. 42, sub-ss. (1) and (3), relate to income of the non-resident and that s. 42(2) which is wedged in between them should therefore be interpreted as having reference to the profits of the non-resident. If the language of s. 42(2) is clear that it is the resident who is chargeable to tax, it is of no consequence that under s. 42, sub-ss. (1) and (3) it is the non-resident that is taxed. It should be remembered that s. 42 occurs in Chapter V headed "Liability in Special Cases", and s. 42(2) is a liability which is out of the ordinary run, and it is not inappropriate to deal with it in s. 42, because while s. 42(1) seeks to bring within the ambit of taxation the profits of a non-resident which accrue in India, s. 42(2) seeks to tax the resident in respect of profits which he would have normally made but for his business association with a non-resident. On the other hand, on the construction contended for by the appellant s. 42(2) would become practically useless because a non-resident whose profits could be taxed under s. 42(2) could also be taxed under s. 42(1), as also the resident if he were the agent. None of the considerations put forward by the appellant is of sufficient weight to displace the conclusion to be drawn from the words "to the resident" and "therefrom" in s. 42(2), and we must hold that the business which is the subject-matter of taxation under that provision is that of the resident and not of a non-resident. This contention must accordingly be found against the appellant.

We shall next consider the second ground urged in support of the appeal that it is a condition for the levy of a charge under s. 42(2) that a non-resident should carry on business with the resident, and that, on the facts found, that condition is not satisfied, and that therefore the tax is unauthorised. It is argued that the business of the non-resident companies is to ply ships for hire, and that the appellant has no concern with that; that the business of the appellant is to repair ships and that the non-resident companies have no connection with that business; and that all that the non-resident companies do is to get their ships repaired by the appellant, and that does not amount to carrying on any business with the appellant. A person who regularly purchases his goods from a particular dealer does not, it is said, carry on business with that dealer, and on the same analogy, in getting their ships repaired by the appellant the non-resident companies cannot be said to carry on business with them in the real sense of that word.

We are unable to agree with this contention. The word "business" is, as has often been said, one of wide import, and in fiscal statutes it must be construed in a broad rather than a restricted sense. Discussing the connotation of the word "trade", Scott, L. J., observed in Smith Barry v. Cordy (H. M. Inspector of Taxes):

"The history of judicial decisions has been similar, showing a strong tendency not to restrict the scope of Schedule D; a tendency which was, we think, in sympathy with the general social and economic outlook of the country. There is hardly any activity for gaining a livelihood and not covered by the other Schedules, which does not seem to us to be swept into the fiscal net by the Schedule D."

"The word 'business' connotes", it was observed by this Court in *Narain Swadeshi Weaving Mills v. The Commissioner of Excess Profits Tax*², "some real, substantial and systematic or organised course of activity or conduct with a set purpose." Now, it may be conceded that when a person purchases his requirements from a particular dealer, he cannot without more be said to carry on business with him. But here there is much more. The non-resident companies send their ships for repair to the appellant, not as they might to any other repairer but under a special agreement that repairs should be done at cost. And further unlike customers who purchase goods for their own consumption or use, the non-resident companies get their ships repaired for use in what is admittedly their business. These are clearly trading activities, organised and continuous in their character and it will be difficult to escape the conclusion that they constitute business. We are not even concerned in this appeal with the larger question whether the activities of the non-resident companies in connection with the repair of the ships amount to carrying on of business. What we have to decide is whether having regard to the course of dealings between the non-resident companies and the appellant it can be said of the former that they carry on business with the latter within the meaning of s. 42(2). Now, it should be observed that s. 42 speaks not of the non-residents carrying on business in the abstract but of their carrying on business with the resident, and in the context, it must include all activities between them having relationship to their business. That is the view taken by the learned Judges in the Court below, and we are in agreement with it.

In this connection, reference may be made to s. 42(1) under which a charge is imposed on income, profits or gains accruing to a non-resident through any business connection in the taxable territories. In *Commr. of Inc. Tax v. Currimbhoy Ebrahim & Sons*³, it was observed by the Privy Council that business connection in s. 42(1) is different from business as defined in s. 4(2) of the Act. "The phrase 'business connection'," observed Sir George Rankin, "is different from, though not unrelated to, the word 'business' of which there is a definition in the Act". And in *Anglo-French Textile Co., Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras*⁴, this Court has observed that "when there is a continuity of business relationship between the person in British India who helps to make the profits and the person outside British India who receives or realises his profits, such relationship does constitute a business connection". Vide also the observations in *Bangalore W., C. & S. Mills v. Commr. of Inc.-Tax*⁵. The words "where a person not resident in the taxable territories carries on business with a person resident" in s. 42(2) must be similarly interpreted, and a non-resident should be held to carry on business with a resident, if the dealings between them form concerted and organised activities of a business character. We are accordingly of opinion that, on the facts found, the non-resident companies must be held to have carried on business with the appellant as provided in s. 42(2).

It was argued that the result of this arrangement was only to reduce the repairing charges and enable the non-resident companies to thereby make a saving; that that was not profit or gains of a business liable to be taxed under the Act, and the decisions in *Tennant v. Smith*⁶ and *Major A. U. John In re*⁷ were cited in support of this position. But, as already held by us, the subject-matter of the tax under s. 42(2) is the business of the resident and not that of the non-resident, and what we have to decide is not whether the non-resident companies made profits in their dealings with the appellant but whether what they did was business, and for that purpose it is immaterial that the business was carried on by them in such manner that no profits could accrue to them therefrom. Vide the observations of Coleridge C.J., at p. 113 in *Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting*⁸. The fact therefore that the non-resident companies could derive no profits from the dealings with the appellant would not detract from their character as business with the appellant. This contention must, therefore, be rejected.

It was finally contended that the profits chargeable under s. 42(2) must be separately assessed and not added on to the other profits or income of the appellant. This contention is based on the assumption that s. 42(2) imposes on the appellant, a vicarious liability, the charge being in reality on the profits of the non-resident. On our finding that the charge is on the business of the appellant and not of the non-resident companies, this contention does not survive.

In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

validity of any adoption made by her widowed mother and its binding character in so far as it affects her legal status as the heir of her mother inasmuch as, by virtue of the adoption, the adopted boy would be introduced as an heir to the mother, in respect of property held by her, if she were to die intestate.

The effect of the provisions of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, on the legal rights of a Hindu female possessed of property and those of the reversionary heirs of the last male holder, is that—

(1) a female Hindu would now become the full owner of the property of which she is possessed, whether she acquired the property before or after the commencement of the Act;

(2) as she would now hold the property of the last male holder as a full and not a limited owner, the other heirs of the last male holder can no longer be called reversionary heirs;

(3) the provisions of s. 14 of the Act being retrospective in operation would affect suits filed before the commencement of the Act, i.e. June 17, 1956, so that any such suit in which the reversionary heir claims a declaration about his or her reversionary right regarding the property of the last male holder or any relief that would, in any manner, be inconsistent with the full proprietary rights conferred on the female Hindu by s. 14 of the Act, would become incompetent by reason of the fact that the heir has ceased to be a reversionary heir.

V. B. Raje, for the appellants.

S. G. Patwardhan, for respondent No. 1.

GOKHALE J. This is an appeal by original defendants Nos. 1 and 2 against the decree passed by the Court of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, at Sholapur, in favour of the plaintiff and defendant No. 3, who are the respondents in this appeal, declaring that the adoption of appellant No. 2 (defendant No. 2) was invalid and not binding on the respondents. The present suit came to be filed by plaintiff Sundrabai in the following circumstances:—

Plaintiff's father Shivram died in 1918 leaving behind his widow Sugandhabai (defendant No. 1) and two daughters Nagarbai (defendant No. 3) and Sundrabai (plaintiff). Defendant No. 1 adopted to her husband one Bhanudas on April 25, 1937, Bhanudas being the nephew of Shivram. According to plaintiff, Bhanudas died in 1949, leaving his widow Girjabai and it appears that a few months after Bhanudas's death Girjabai remarried. On July 20, 1950, Sugandhabai (defendant No. 1) adopted appellant No. 2 Keshav and executed and got registered an adoption deed in that behalf. It is the plaintiff's case that inasmuch as Bhanudas was survived by his widow Girjabai, defendant No. 1's right to adopt was extinguished and the same could not be revived despite Girjabai's re-marriage. It is, therefore, the plaintiff's case that she and her sister defendant No. 3 are the reversionary heirs to their father Shivram and their right is subject only to defendant No. 1's interest in the property left by her father. That was why plaintiff filed the present suit on November 18, 1952, asking for a declaration that the adoption of defendant No. 2 Keshav was invalid and not binding on plaintiff and defendant No. 3.

The suit was resisted by defendant Nos. 1 and 2 on the basis that there was no marriage between Bhanudas and Girjabai and, therefore, Bhanudas was not survived by any widow. On that ground it was contended that defendant No. 2's adoption was good. This was the principal ground on which the suit came to be resisted.

The trial Court held that plaintiff was entitled to file a suit for a declaration as claimed by her. It also held that Bhanudas had married Girjabai and Girjabai survived Bhanudas as his legal heir and consequently defendant No. 1's right to adopt was extinguished. It appears that plaintiff had originally denied even the factum of adoption of defendant No. 2, but that was admitted by her during the hearing by a purshis (exh. 48). She only challenged the validity of defendant No. 2's adoption on the ground that defendant No. 1 was not competent to adopt, as her power to adopt had been extinguished. The trial Court, therefore, came to the conclusion that the factum of adoption was proved, but the adoption was not valid because defendant No. 1 had no right to adopt defendant No. 2, since her right had been extinguished as alleged by the plaintiff. That is why the declaration prayed for by plaintiff was granted by the trial Court. Against this decree defendants Nos. 1 and 2 have filed the present appeal.

Mr. Rege, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the appellants, has raised two points. He says in the first instance that the trial Court's view that Girjabai was Bhanudas's wife and survived him as his widow is not correct on the basis of the evidence on the record. Now, on this point it has to be remembered that defendant No. 1 Sugandhabai, who herself adopted Bhanudas and should have known whether Bhanudas had married or not, has not cared to give any evidence. She has not stepped into the witness-box and Keshav, who is adopted by her, has denied knowledge as to whether Bhanudas was married. He has stated that he had never heard about Bhanudas marrying Girjabai or any other woman. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that defendant No. 2 is the step-brother of defendant No. 1. Plaintiff Sundrabai has stated in her evidence that Girjabai is Bhanudas' widow and she is alive, that 8 or 9 months after Bhanudas' death Girja contracted re-marriage with a man from Shidbache Wadgaon and that man's name was Manohar. She deposed to the fact that she had attended Bhanudas's marriage with Girja and partook of the marriage dinner. According to her, Bhanudas was married to Girja 7 or 8 years after his adoption, which would mean that the marriage took place some time in 1945. She stated that Girja's mother was one Parwati and she admitted that Parwati was her cousin-sister. She further stated that both Parwati and her husband were dead. She also deposed that Bhanudas died 4 years after his marriage and that Girja was 10 years old at the time of her marriage with Bhanudas and that she got no child by Bhanudas. Girja was also examined on behalf of plaintiff. She stated that she was married to Bhanudas 9 years ago and she was 18 years of age at that time. After her marriage, she said, she lived with Bhanudas. She denied that Bhanudas died unmarried. The evidence of these two witnesses has been believed by the learned trial Judge.

Mr. Rege, however, contends that Girja is a relative of the plaintiff and was interested in supporting plaintiff. He also contends that according to plaintiff's evidence Girja was only 10 years old at the time of her marriage and, therefore, her marriage with Bhanudas would contravene the provisions of the Child Marriage Restraint Act, 1929. We are not impressed by this argument. Girja herself has stated that she was 13 when she married Bhanudas, and even if the marriage was in contravention of the Child Marriage Restraint Act, the marriage could not be invalid. In our opinion, the evidence led on behalf of plaintiff, which has been accepted by the learned trial Judge, shows that Bhanudas died leaving Girja his widow and a few months after Bhanudas's death Girja re-married and therefore became civilly dead so far as Bhanudas' family is concerned. Though on Girja's re-marriage Sugandha would inherit Bhanudas' property as the mother of Bhanudas, Sugandha would not be competent to adopt a son to her husband because her right to do so would be extinguished, her son having himself left a widow competent to continue his line by adoption. See *Gurunath v. Kamlabai Kanchangauda*¹.

Mr. Rege has not disputed this legal position.

But then Mr. Rege has raised a new point of law on the basis of the provisions of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, which came into force on June 17, 1956. Mr. Rege contends that plaintiff claimed a declaration that defendant No. 2 was not validly adopted by defendant No. 1 on the ground that she and defendant No. 3 were the next reversionary heirs of Bhanudas and Mr. Rege argues that under s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act the property which has been inherited by Bhanudas would be held by defendant No. 1 Sugandha as full owner and not as a limited owner. If that be so, then, according to Mr. Rege, there is no question of there being any reversionary heirs of Bhanudas. Mr. Rege concedes that on the date that the suit was filed, that is to say, on November 18, 1952, both plaintiff Sundrabai and defendant No. 3 Nagarbai would be the next reversionary heirs, if defendant No. 2's adoption was invalid. But, according to Mr. Rege, s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act has been made expressly retrospective and therefore pending suits would be also affected. Now, Mr. Rege, in our opinion, is right in his contention that s. 14 is retrospective. In *Kamla Devi v. Bachulal Gupta*² it has been held that by reason of the use of the expression "whether acquired before or after the commencement of this Act", s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act is undoubtedly retrospective, though in that case their Lordships of the Supreme Court did not consider the question of the effect of that section in the circumstances of the case. Mr. Rege contends that an appellate Court is entitled to take into consideration subsequent changes in legislation with a view to moulding its decree in the light of the changed circumstances. That undoubtedly is so and the question in this case is whether we should accede to Mr. Rege's contention that plaintiff's suit should be dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff claimed a declaration about the invalidity of the adoption of defendant No. 2 when plaintiff was a reversionary heir under the Hindu law as it was then prevailing but is no longer a reversionary heir by virtue of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act.

In support of his argument, Mr. Rege has referred us to some decisions. In *B. A. Missir v. Raghunath*³ it was held that the effect of ss. 14 and 15 of the Hindu Succession Act was that a reversioner recognised as such under the Hindu law was no more a reversioner as any property possessed by a female Hindu, whether acquired before or after the commencement of the Act, is not a limited estate but an absolute one; after the coming into force of the Act, there is neither a right of reversion nor any kind of spes successionis. In that case, a widow had executed a sale-deed in favour of the father of some of the defendants. These properties were subsequently mortgaged in favour of her daughter. The plaintiff as a reversioner brought a suit for a declaration that the sale-deed executed by the widow was without consideration and without legal necessity and was not binding on him. All the lower Courts had decreed the plaintiff's claim and the matter was pending in an appeal under the Letters Patent before the Patna High Court when the Hindu Succession Act came into force, and it was held by that Court that in view of the change in law brought about by the Hindu Succession Act the plaintiff lost his right as reversioner in respect of the property held by the widow and, therefore, plaintiff's suit must be dismissed as not maintainable; and in doing so the Patna High Court followed the well-established rule that an appellate Court was entitled to take into consideration legislative changes which have supervened since the decision under appeal was given. Now, that case is distinguishable from the present case, because there an alienation by a widow in respect of property was challenged by the reversioner and it was held that his right to do so no longer survived he himself having ceased to be a reversioner because of the coming into force of the Hindu Succession Act. In the Patna case the learned Judges do not seem to have considered the question as to whether a property that was alienated by a widow by a sale could be said to be property possessed by her and could be said to be held by her as a full owner and not as a limited owner.

That question was considered in a decision of the Allahabad High Court to which our attention was invited by Mr. Rege, Hanuman Prasad v. Indrawati,⁴ where it was held that if a widow had alienated the property without legal necessity, the alienation that was invalid according to the customary Hindu law remained invalid and its invalidity was not affected at all by the provisions of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act; but, though the alienation made by a Hindu widow before the passing of the Act was vulnerable and challengeable on the ground of want of legal necessity as if the Act had not been passed, the widow continues to be estopped from challenging the validity on the ground of want of legal necessity and since the reversioners have completely disappeared by virtue of the provisions of the Hindu Succession Act, nobody can get a decree as a reversioner; and even those persons who could have obtained a decree before the passing of the Act that an alienation made before the passing of the Act was invalid, cannot now get a declaration to that effect because they have lost the status by virtue of which they could have got it. That case again was the case of an alienation and the reversioners had asked for a declaration that the said alienation made by the widow was void beyond her lifetime and was not binding against the reversioners who claimed to be entitled after the death of the widow to the possession of the property of her deceased husband.

Mr. Rege has then relied on a ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Bhabani Prasad v. Sm. Sarat Sundari,⁵ in which it was held that s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act made no reservation in favour of pending litigations. In that case a reversioner had filed a suit claiming a declaration that the widow was entitled to enjoy the husband's property during her lifetime only and a further declaration that the plaintiff was a reversioner in respect of the said property and the widow was bound and liable to invest in Government securities the money that would be payable by the Government on account of an award made by the Collector fixing Rs. 75,000 as compensation for properties acquired by Government for extension of the Dum Dum Air Field. It was held in that case that the suit must fail because by virtue of the provisions of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, the widow had become the full and absolute owner of her husband's property. That case again is a case where the reversioner wanted a declaration of his right as a reversioner and certain directions in respect of the property which was in the possession of the widow so as to limit her right of enjoyment of that property during her lifetime alone, and such a declaration, it was held by the Calcutta High Court, could not be granted in view of the change of law on account of the enactment of the Hindu Succession Act. Mr. Rege has also relied on a decision of the Orissa High Court in Laxmi Debi v. Surendra Kumar,⁶ where it was held that the right of a reversioner as one of the heirs under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act is limited to the question of preserving the estate of a limited owner for the benefit of the entire body of reversioners, but as against a full owner the reversioner has no such right at all. There the suit was brought by a sister of the last male holder and the property was in the possession of his widows and it was held that the sister of the last male holder has got, under the Hindu Succession Act, neither any legal character nor any interest in presenti as she was included in the second class of heirs and was completely excluded by the widow who comes in as heir in class 1 in the Schedule to the Act. The result is that after the Hindu Succession Act, when the property of the last male holder is in possession of his widows, a suit by a full sister of the last male holder for a mere declaration of her reversionary right was not maintainable. In that case, the plaintiff had also challenged the validity of adoption made by the widow; and Mr. Rege strongly relies on this case in support of his argument that the present suit has become incompetent by virtue of the provisions of the Hindu Succession Act. That case again is distinguishable on the ground that there the declaration that was asked for by the plaintiff, the sister of the last male holder, was of her reversionary right in respect of the property left by her deceased brother, and as she had ceased to have the status of a reversioner, declaration of her right as a reversionary heir could not have been granted.

In the present case, it is undoubtedly true that the plaintiff has referred to the fact that she and her sister, defendant No. 3, are reversionary heirs; but the declaration that she claims is a declaration not about her reversionary right or about the property of the deceased Bhanudas but a declaration that defendant No. 2 is not the validly adopted son of defendant No. 1 and that his adoption was not binding on the plaintiff and defendant No. 3. Under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act, in so far as it is material, any person entitled to any legal character, or to any right as to any property, may institute a suit against any person denying, or interested to deny, his title to such character or right, and the Court may in its discretion make therein a declaration that he is so entitled. Now, Mr. Rege says that by virtue of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act the plaintiff has no right to Bhanudas's property because the mother Sugandha has now become the full owner of his property, with the result that there are now no reversionary heirs of Bhanudas. Mr. Rege further contends that plaintiff has no legal character which defendants Nos. 1 and 2 are denying or are interested to deny, and on this ground Mr. Rege says that a suit under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act would not also lie. Mr. Patwardhan, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the respondent-plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that this is a new point which Mr. Rege has taken and he has no objection if the declaration granted by the trial Court is modified so as to delete the description of plaintiff and defendant No. 3 as reversionary heirs. Now, the adoption of defendant No. 2 is undoubtedly invalid in law and that is not disputed by Mr. Rege. Under s. 15 of the Hindu Succession Act, both plaintiff as well as defendant No. 3, the daughters of defendant No. 1, would be her heirs and to that extent they would be interested in asserting that they alone would be the heirs of Sugandha, in case she dies intestate, and not defendant No. 2 who would also be entitled to rank as an heir along with them, in case his adoption is a valid adoption. Therefore, it cannot be denied that plaintiff and defendant No. 3 are interested in asserting their legal character as sole heirs of defendant No. 1, whereas defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 2 are interested in denying that character. The matter may also be looked at from another point of view. Under s. 15(1)(d) of the Hindu Succession Act, until the status of defendant No. 2 as an adopted son is dislodged, he himself would be entitled to be one of the heirs of plaintiff herself. It is, therefore, contended, and with some force, that though plaintiff and defendant No. 3 have ceased to be reversionary heirs of Bhanudas and though Sugandha would be the absolute owner of Bhanudas's property by virtue of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, plaintiff's right of suit to challenge the validity of the adoption of defendant No. 2 cannot be said to have come to an end.

The effect of the provisions of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, on the legal rights of a Hindu female possessed of property and those of the reversionary heirs of the last male holder may be stated thus:

(1) A female Hindu would now become the full owner of the property of which she is possessed, whether she acquired the property before or after the commencement of the Act.

(2) As she would now hold the property of the last male holder as a full and not a limited owner, the other heirs of the last male holder can no longer be called reversionary heirs.

(3) The provisions of s. 14 of the Act being retrospective in operation would affect suits filed before the commencement of the Act, i.e., June 17, 1956, so that any such suit in which the reversionary heir claims a declaration about his or her reversionary right regarding the property of the last male holder or any relief that would, in any manner, be inconsistent with the full proprietary rights conferred on the female Hindu by s. 14 of the Act, would become incompetent by reason of the fact that the heir has ceased to be a reversionary heir.

In the present case, however, the plaintiff has not claimed any relief with regard to the property left by Bhanudas, her brother, but she claims a declaration that the adoption of defendant No. 2 is invalid under Hindu law and is not binding on her and her sister, defendant No. 3. The competence of such a suit must be judged by the provisions of s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act. The Hindu Succession Act prescribes how the property of a female dying intestate is to be inherited, and under s. 15(1)(a) read with s. 16 of this Act, the sons and daughters (including the children of a deceased son or daughter) and the husband would be entitled to inherit her property simultaneously. In our view, therefore, a daughter would be entitled to challenge the validity of any adoption made by her widowed mother and its binding character in so far as it affects her legal status as the heir of her mother inasmuch as, by virtue of the adoption, the adopted boy would be introduced as an heir to the mother, in respect of property held by her, if she were to die intestate.

But Mr. Rege has further contended that the plaintiff filed the present suit as a reversionary heir and claimed a declaration that the adoption of defendant No. 2 by defendant No. 1 was invalid and not binding on her and defendant No. 3 on that basis. Since she has ceased to be a reversionary heir by virtue of the Hindu Succession Act, Mr. Rege says, this Court cannot grant her relief on a different basis without an amendment of the plaint. We are not prepared to accept this argument. Mr. Rege's client now seeks to defeat plaintiff's suit by reason of the provisions of the Hindu Succession Act. But, while the Court is entitled to take into consideration these provisions, it cannot ignore also the rights which have been conferred on the plaintiff by the same Act. The present suit was filed on November 12, 1952, and decided by the trial Court on August 7, 1954, and this appeal was admitted and notice ordered to issue on February 24, 1955. Even after the coming into force of the Hindu Succession Act on June 17, 1956, no attempt was made by the defendants-appellants to get the hearing of this appeal expedited. In our judgment, therefore, it would not be fair to refuse plaintiff the relief claimed by her in the suit on the ground that she would not be entitled to it unless she amends the plaint deleting all references to her own and defendant No. 3's status as reversionary heirs.

The result is that this appeal fails, but paragraph 1 of the decretal order passed by the trial Court will be modified by deleting the words "who are the reversionary heirs". Subject to this modification, the rest of the decree of the trial Court will be confirmed. The appellants will pay the costs of the respondents.

Order accordingly.

partners permit him to have some other person to discharge his duty by the firm or to deputise for him, the remuneration paid to that person will be an admissible deduction under s. 10 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

Shri Ratilal B. Daftari v. The Commissioner of Income-tax¹ and Shantil Kumar Narotam Morarji v. Commr., I.-T.,² referred to.

One of the two partners of a firm executed certain writings under which he made a gift of certain sums to his daughter-in-law and his grandchildren out of the amount standing to his credit in the partnership account. Entries were accordingly made in the firm's books with the knowledge and consent of the partners whereby out of the moneys which stood to the credit of the partner the amount of the gift was debited to his account with such consent and credited to the account of the donees with the intention of making them creditors of the firm. The donees accepted the transaction of gift, the firm accepted the transaction and not only paid interest on the amount accepted as due to the donees but also allowed the donees to withdraw moneys from time to time. Held, that in the circumstances of the case a completed and legally valid gift of the aforesaid sums was made by the partner in favour of his daughter-in-law and grandchildren.

Chimanbhai Lalbhai v. Commr. of Inc.-tax,³ referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, for the Commissioner of Income-tax.

N. A. Palkhivala, with S. P. Mehta and B. M. Parekh, for the assessee.

S. T. DESAI J. In this reference made at the instance of the Commissioner of Income-tax, Ahmedabad, every thing has been said that could possibly have been said on behalf of the Revenue. The assessee is a registered firm of two partners Vithaldas Dhanjibhai and his son Harjivandas Vithaldas carrying on business at Jamnagar in Saurashtra. The relevant assessment year is 1952-53, the accounting year being S.Y. 2007 ending on October 30, 1951. A writing was executed on February 2, 1946, by Vithaldas, the father, in which he declared his intention in writing in order to allay the fears of his son that he might re-marry. He stated in that writing that out of his $\frac{1}{2}$ share in the profits he would give $\frac{1}{4}$ th share to the wife of his son and another $\frac{1}{4}$ th share to Manu, his grand-son, meaning thereby that he would keep to himself only $\frac{1}{4}$ of his 8 annas share in the profits of the partnership. The account of the partners at the end of S.Y. 2003 showed this. To the credit of the two partners stood two sums of Rs. 8,83,070. These sums represented their share of the capital and their accumulation of profits upto the end of S.Y. 2003. On Aso Vad 30, S.Y. 2003 (November 12, 1947) entries were passed in the firm's books debiting the account of Vithaldas with a sum of Rs. 8,83,070 by making corresponding credit entries as we shall immediately state. The whole amount was debited to the account of Vithaldas and on the credit side one item of Rs. 2,25,000 was then entered in his name. It represented the capital amount which was to continue to the credit of Vithaldas so that really Vithaldas was parting with the sum of Rs. 8,83,070 minus Rs. 2,25,000. The other credit entries are:—

- Rs. 1,00,000 credited to Narendrakumar Harjivandas (minor) (son of Harjivandas).
- „ 25,000 credited to Manjula Harjivandas (minor) (daughter of Harjivandas).
- „ 25,000 credited to Pushpa Harjivandas (minor) (another daughter of Harjivandas).
- „ 58,070 credited to Harjivandas Vithaldas (trust a/c).
- „ 2,25,000 credited to Mansukhlal Harjivandas (minor) (another son of Harjivandas).
- „ 2,25,000 credited to the account of Lilavati, daughter-in-law of Vithaldas.

1 (1958) Income-tax Reference No. 9 of 1958, decided by S.T. Desai and K.T. Desai JJ., on September 30, 1958 (Unrep.).

2 (1954) 57 Bom. L.R. 121.

3 (1958) 34 I.T.R. 259.

Now, one of the principal questions, which we have to decide on this reference is whether a completed and legally valid gift of these amounts was made by Vithaldas in favour of his daughter-in-law and his grandchildren. The case for the revenue is that mere book entries cannot result in a gift or a trust. It is an elementary proposition and cannot be disputed by anybody, but in this case we have to see whether there are any other facts which go to show that these gifts were legally valid and binding, as has been concluded by the Tribunal. As we shall presently point out, there is in this case other material which has been considered by the Tribunal. On April 15, 1948, Vithaldas executed another writing on stamp paper in which he expressed his intention not to marry again and confirmed the transfers which had been made in the firm's books at the end of S.Y. 2003. There was yet another document executed by Vithaldas on April 17, 1948. That writing which is on stamp paper has been strongly relied on by the assessee in this case and it will be convenient to refer to the same at this stage. It is in Gujarati language and is addressed to Lilavati, the daughter-in-law. It refers to the various gifts which had been made by Vithaldas in favour of his daughter-in-law and his grandchildren. The writing as translated is as under:—

It will be seen that in this writing Vithaldas reaffirms the gifts. He also states that entries were made in the books of account debiting the amounts to his account and giving credit to the various donees. The reason for the gift is also stated in the writing. He swears solemnly and says that it was not his intention to try to get back a pie out of all he had already gifted to the donees. He also states in the writing that the donees have full title and every right to the gifts made in their favour. The writing as already mentioned is addressed to the daughter-in-law Lilavati. Then at the foot of that writing there is an endorsement made by Lilavati in which she says that she has accepted the gifts on behalf of herself and her children. It is essential to observe at this stage that the genuineness of none of these gifts nor of the entries to which we have referred has been challenged by the Department and we have to examine this case on the footing that the transaction was genuine and bona fide. It may also be mentioned that this writing and the entries were made at a time when there was no income-tax law in Saurashtra though that is a factor which has bearing only on the question of the genuineness or otherwise of the gifts. The donees, after the gifts were made, maintained separate books of account in which the amounts gifted to them were debited to the firm and interest earned was credited. The donees have been assessed every year since 1949-50 to 1955-56 on the interest earned by them on the amount of these gifts, which, as a result of the agreement evidenced by the writing and the book entries was a tripartite transaction between the two partners and the donees.

Now, let us see what was the position in the matter of the assessment of the firm itself. In the assessment year 1949-50 deduction was claimed by the firm in respect of interest paid on the amount of these gifts and that was allowed by the Department. In respect of the next assessment year 1950-51, the Income-tax Officer disallowed the amount of interest claimed as a deduction, but in appeal the Appellate Assistant Commissioner allowed the deduction and the contention that was raised before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner was mainly on the question of validity of the gifts and not that the gifts were not genuine. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that the gifts had been duly accepted by Lilavati on her own behalf and on behalf of her children. He also held that the documents were all executed prior to the introduction of income-tax in Saurashtra. The Department accepted that position also for the subsequent year 1951-52. So that in the first year, the Department did not take any objection to this deduction; in the second year the objection that it took was about the validity of the gifts which was turned down and in the third year it did not take any objection. However, for the assessment year 1952-53 when the assessee first claimed a deduction in respect of interest amounting to Rs. 15,947, an objection was raised in computing the profits of the assessee under s. 10. The Department carried the matter in appeal to the Tribunal against the orders which were made against it, mainly on the question of validity of the gifts, and in that appeal it raised two contentions. One contention was that in the account books of the firm, the amount shown to the credit of the donees was not strictly in the proportion set out in the writing dated February 2, 1946, and the other contention was that there was no sufficient cash balance with the assessee firm on Aso Vad 30, S.Y. 2003 which could have enabled the donor to make valid and effective gifts by delivery thereof to the donees. In substance, the suggestion was that they were only book entries in the account books of the firm. The Tribunal negatived both the contentions. The Tribunal found that all the gifts had been accepted by Lilavati, the daughter-in-law of Vithaldas, on behalf of herself and on behalf of her minor children and the firm had accepted the transfer by making suitable entries in its books of account. The Tribunal considered the tripartite nature of the transaction contended for by the assessee. It also took into consideration the facts that the donees had maintained separate books of account showing the firm as their debtor and had filed returns and had been assessed for tax on the amount of interest earned by them. It also found that the donees had withdrawn part of the amounts standing to their credit and had built immoveable properties from the income received from the assessee firm.

There was another contention of the assessee in the matter of the assessment of the firm for the relevant year. The assessee firm was a partner in another partnership firm of Messrs. Halar Salt & Chemical Works in which it was represented by Harjivandas Vithaldas. Harjivandas representing the assessee firm had a 20 per cent. share in the business of the Halar Salt & Chemical Works. There were four other partners in that business. An agreement was executed on April 20, 1948, in which it is stated by Harjivandas that as it was not possible for him to attend to the business of the Salt and Chemical Works in which he was a partner, he had employed Bachubhai and Balkrishna to supervise the general management of that firm and to attend to the correspondence of that firm on his behalf and they were to be paid remuneration at the rate of 42½ per cent. and 7½ per cent. respectively out of the 20 per cent. share of Harjivandas in the partnership firm of Halar Salt & Chemical Works. That agreement states that the remuneration of the two employees was to be paid out of the profits made by the parent firm, and in case that firm made a loss, the share of the loss was to be carried forward to the next year and the remuneration was to be paid to the two employees only out of profits. In the relevant assessment year, the amount of remuneration of the two employees worked out at Rs. 24,706 and Rs. 4,360 respectively. After disallowing this remuneration, the assessable income of the assessee firm from the parent firm was computed at Rs. 70,832. The Income-tax Officer took the view that this was not a permissible deduction but was tantamount to an appropriation of profits as in his opinion it was not necessary for Harjivandas to employ any outsider to represent him in the parent firm. In appeal, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner took the contrary view. He reached the conclusion that it was expedient from the commercial point of view for Harjivandas to employ those two persons to look after his interest. He also found that they were not in any way related to him and that the whole arrangement was genuine. According to him, it was an expenditure wholly laid out for the purpose of earning an income and as such it was an allowable deduction in computing the real income of the assessee firm. The Tribunal also took the same view. On both the questions, the Commissioner of Income-tax has come before us on this reference.

The two questions which we are called upon to answer are:

"(1) Whether, in computing its income under Section 10, the assessee firm is entitled to claim deduction under Section 10(2)(44) of Rs. 15,947 on account of interest paid on moneys transferred by Vithaldas to Narendrakumar, Lilavati, Mansukhlal, Manjula and Pushpa?

(2) Whether the amounts of Rs. 24,706 and Rs. 4,360 are admissible deductions under Section 10(2)(xx) against the share of income falling to its lot from the firm of Messrs. Halar Salt & Chemical Works?"

It has been argued by Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, that mere entries in the books of account of the assessee firm are insufficient to constitute a valid gift. On principle we agree that one cannot create rights and liabilities simply and solely by making book entries. A good deal of the argument urged before us really went to question the genuineness of the gifts; but, as we have already observed, that is not the question before us. The question is of the validity of the transactions of gift and not their genuineness.

We have here entries made with the knowledge and consent of the two partners whereby a large part of the moneys which stood to the credit of one of the partners are debited to his account with such consent and credited to the account of the donees with the intention of making them the creditors of the firm. Had the matter rested at that, different considerations might have arisen but such is not the position. The writings executed by Vithaldas, to which we have already made reference and particularly the document of April 17, 1948—once accepted as genuine—clinch the whole matter. The donees accepted the transaction of gift, the firm accepted the transaction and not only paid interest on the amounts accepted as due to the donees but also allowed the donees to withdraw moneys from time to time. In case of any gift of such a nature, the Court has to satisfy itself that there is substitution of some other obligation for the original one and that there is the animus novandi. There is, in our opinion, ample material which satisfies the legal requirements of a completed and valid gift. The rights of the donees were defined and ascertained; they became creditors of the firm and received interest as such and withdrew part of the moneys accepted and agreed as due to them by the firm as a result of what was a tripartite arrangement. Once you accept the genuineness of the facts relating to the transaction, there is little scope, in the facts and circumstances of this case, for suggesting that what was done was inchoate or incomplete or invalid in law.

Before we proceed to consider another argument of Mr. Joshi, we may observe that two elements were stressed by Mr. Joshi. It was said that when the entries were made in the books of account of the assessee firm there was no sufficient cash in hand, and therefore, there could not, in law, be delivery of the moneys to the donees. The ingredient and question of delivery has its importance in case of gift, but in the context of the transaction before us, actual physical delivery is not the sine qua non of the matter. Delivery can be symbolical. This Court had occasion to deal with a similar question in Chimanbhai Lalbhai v. Commr. of Inc.-tax,¹ and in view of what this Court there decided, it is not necessary to dwell any more on the subject.

It was next argued by Mr. Joshi that if we look at the question as formulated, we have to determine whether the requirements of s. 10(2)(iii) are satisfied. The suggestion was that there was nothing on the record to show that the amounts shown as due to the donees in the books of account of the assessee were "capital borrowed for the purpose of the business" of the assessee. Now, we do not think Mr. Joshi is entitled to raise this contention on this reference. Even so, we have fully heard him on this point. Let us see what happened before the Tribunal. The order of the Tribunal shows that an attempt was made to contend before it that the moneys had not been borrowed for the purpose of the business and therefore did not fall to be allowed under s. 10(2)(iii). This is what the Tribunal has stated in repelling that contention:

"As regards section 10(2)(iii) the Department does not seem to have challenged that the money had been borrowed for the purpose of the business but the disallowance was made on the short ground that it was an interest payment to a partner. In view of our finding herein above on the first point, this objection of the department no longer survives."

We are in agreement with the view taken by the Tribunal. In surveying the facts, we have already mentioned that in the assessment year 1949-50, the deduction for interest paid was allowed to the assessee firm. In 1950-51 it was disallowed by the Income-tax Officer, but on appeal to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, the assessee was successful and the interest paid on those amounts was allowed in the assessment of the firm. It was held that the gifts had been accepted by the daughter-in-law on her own behalf and on behalf of her minor children and that the instruments relating to the gifts executed on February 2, 1946, April 15, 1946, and April 17, 1948, were all executed prior to the introduction of the Income-tax Act in Saurashtra. The Department did not carry the matter any further in respect of the assessment for that year. In respect of the subsequent assessment year 1951-52 also no objection was taken to the deduction being claimed. It was only for the assessment year 1952-53, which is the subject-matter of this reference, that an objection was taken. No objection, however, was taken by the Income-tax Officer on the ground that the sums shown to the credit of the donees did not amount to "capital borrowed for the purpose of the business" of the assessee; nor does it appear that any such contention was raised before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner; and when such attempt was made before the Tribunal, it was bound to be discountenanced. Therefore, the present argument must fail.

To turn to the second question which arises on this reference. In our survey of facts we have already referred to the circumstances which give rise to this question. Here also it may be observed that the genuineness of the payments to the two persons Bachubhai and Balkrishna has not been doubted by the Department, the sole question being whether these payments were allowable deduction. The Tribunal has dealt with this contention in the following manner:

"The only other contention is in respect of the deduction of Rs. 24,707 and Rs. 4,360 paid to Bachubhai and Balkrishna respectively out of the share of the assessee standing in the name of Harjivandas from Messrs. Halar Salt & Chemical Works. Harjivandas's share was 20 per cent. and as he was unable to give any personal attention to this business, an agreement dated 20-4-1948 was entered into with Bachubhai and Balkrishna to remunerate them for the work done on behalf of the assessee at the rate of 42½ per cent. and 7½ per cent. respectively, i.e. these two between them were to receive 50 per cent. of the share of Harjivandas. According to the Department this arrangement is tantamount to an appropriation of profits. There is no force in this contention. These two persons are not in any way related to the partners of the assessee firm and it is not denied that they had rendered services. We agree with the A.A.C. that the agreement was a genuine agreement and the impugned sums are admissible deductions."

Learned counsel for the Department has argued that the order of the Tribunal gives no reasoning. We are unable to agree that such is the position. What the Tribunal has done is to state its reasons very briefly in view of the opinion formed by it that there was no force in the contention. Mr. Joshi has drawn our attention to the agreement and argued that it was incumbent on Harjivandas to attend to the business of Halar Salt & Chemical Works. The argument proceeded that under s. 12 of the Partnership Act, it was the duty of Harjivandas to attend personally to the management and affairs of the partnership firm. The argument was that if it was his duty to attend personally to the management and affairs of the partnership firm, he had no right to appoint any representatives, and even if he did so and the other partners permitted him to do so, he could not claim, as legitimate expenses, what he paid them. The short question that we have to consider is whether in a case where it is incumbent on a partner to attend to the management and affairs of the partnership business and he finds he is unable or disabled to do so and if the other partners permit him to have some other person to discharge his duty by the firm or so to say deputise for him, can he or can he not say that the remuneration paid to that person is a legitimate expenditure? Can it be said in such a case that the agreed payments he may bona fide make to such person are no more than appropriation of profits? We see no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that in such a case the payments that would be made would be legitimate deductions under s. 10. Only recently in *Ratilal B. Daftari v. The Commissioner of Income tax*², we had occasion to consider a somewhat similar matter and in *Shantikumar Narottam Morarji v. Comr., I.T.*³ somewhat similar considerations arose before this Court. The question here is not of wiredrawn technicalities or any refined distinction but what is the real income of the partner. The matter has to be approached bearing in mind the commercial aspects of the same. Therefore, in our opinion, the Tribunal was right in the conclusion reached by it that these two sums were legitimate deductions.

It was lastly urged by Mr. Joshi that in the question as formulated reference is only made to s. 10 (2) (xv) and what we have to decide is the question whether the deductions are permissible under s. 10(2) (xv). It is not necessary to deal with this argument in any detail. It is open to the assessee before us to rely also on any other provision in s. 10. Moreover, there is nothing in the judgment of the Tribunal that the decision was under s. 10(2) (xv). In view of what we have observed it is necessary to re-formulate the second question which should be as under :

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case the amounts of Rs. 24,708 and Rs. 4,360 are admissible deductions against the share of income falling to its lot from the firm of Messrs. Halar Salt & Chemical Works?"

Our answer to the first question is in the affirmative.

BHOR INDUSTRIES LIMITED v. THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY CITY I, BOMBAY.*

Taxation Laws (Extension to Merged States and Amendments) Act (LXVII of 1949), Secs. 3, 6—Merged States (Taxation Concessions) Order, 1949; Paras. 12, 4—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 60A, 23A, 18A(8)—Assessee company, a non-resident, incorporated in former Indian State—After merger of State, Extension Act bringing into force Indian Income-tax Act in merged State from April 1, 1949—Income-tax Officer making order against assessee under s. 23A in respect of assessment years 1947-48 and 1948-49—Whether assessee could claim benefit of exemption granted by para. 12 of Taxation Concessions Order, 1949—Interest added to tax under s. 18A(8) whether tax for purpose of computation under s. 23A.

The assessee was a private limited company incorporated in a former Indian State. On August 1, 1949, the State was merged in the Province of Bombay and on December 31, 1949, the Taxation Laws (Extension to Merged States and Amendment) Act, 1949, came into operation and under it the provisions of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and the Indian Finance Act, 1949, were brought into force in all the merged States on April 1, 1949. The Income-tax Officer held the assessee to be non-resident for the assessment years 1947-48 and 1948-49 (accounting years 1946 and 1947), and made an order under s. 23A of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, against the assessee in respect of these years. The assessee contended that it was entitled to claim the benefit of the exemptions granted by para. 12 of the Merged States (Taxation Concessions) Order, 1949, made under s. 60A of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and the Income-tax Officer was not entitled to make any order against the assessee under s. 23A in respect of its profits and gains of the previous years ended December 31, 1946, and December 31, 1947:—

Held, that incomes which were not touched by the Taxation Laws (Extension to Merged States and Amendment) Act, 1949, could not benefit by the exemption and that as the Merged States (Taxation Concessions) Order, 1949, could not embrace incomes which were not within the ambit of s. 60A, the Income-tax Officer was not precluded from making the impugned order.

The amount of interest added to tax as provided in s. 18A(8) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, does not become tax for the purpose of computation envisaged by s. 23A of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. T. DESAI J. This reference under s. 66(1) made at the instance of the assessee, one of whom is Bhore Industries Ltd. Bombay and five others who are shareholders, raises certain interesting questions. The assessment years so far as the company is concerned are 1947-48 and 1948-49. The assessment year in respect of the shareholders is 1949-50. The Bhore Industries Ltd. was at all material times a private company limited by shares and incorporated in the erstwhile Indian State of Bhore. Its registered office was situated at Bhore and it carried on business of dyeing, printing and bleaching cloth, proofing etc. For both the years 1946 and 1947 it was held to be "non-resident" in the then British India. It will be convenient to use the expression "British India" for taxable territories in our judgment. Holding that the company was non-resident in British India in either of the two years, the Income-tax Officer had to determine its total income and its total world income. The general meetings of the company were held in respect of those years at Bhore and the only dividends that were declared at those meetings aggregated to Rs. 2,580 and Rs. 1,140 for the two years respectively. In this judgment we shall refer to some facts only to serve as an illustration in appreciating the legal contentions raised before us. In 1946 the total income of the company was Rs. 4,32,542. The income arising in the Indian State of Bhore was Rs. 2,24,542, and its total world income which would be the sum of those two items was Rs. 6,57,084 and the only amount that it paid out as dividend was Rs. 2,580. In substance and in effect the profits were kept undistributed and the shareholders of that private limited company were content with that position. The company was one in which the public were not substantially interested within the meaning of the Explanation to s. 23A. The Income-tax Officer, therefore, invoked and brought into operation the provisions of s. 23A and made an order under s. 23A in respect of both the years. The dispute before the Income-tax Officer related to the contents of the order including proportionate quantum that could be included in the total income of the shareholders concerned for the purpose of their assessment for the year 1949-50. It will be convenient to go back to the illustration with which we started. In respect of the year 1946, the position regarding the income of the company was this. The total income, as already mentioned, was Rs. 4,32,542. The income that accrued in the Indian State of Bhore was Rs. 2,24,542 and the income-tax and super-tax payable on the income of the company came to Rs. 1,89,237. The amount available for distribution had to be ascertained as required by s. 23A and that worked out at Rs. 2,43,305 by deducting the amount of income-tax and super-tax from the total income. The dividend declared by the company was only Rs. 2,580. Therefore, the undistributed portion which was deemed to have been distributed under s. 23A amongst the shareholders worked out at Rs. 2,40,725 by deducting Rs. 2,580 from Rs. 2,43,305. The position in respect of the year 1947 was slightly different, but it is not material to go into that for the purpose of this reference. Consequently, the facts for the purpose of this reference in respect of both the years can be taken as the same in view of the nature of the arguments urged before us. At this stage, we are, as already mentioned, referring to the income of the company. Some time after the end of the previous year 1947, the State of Bhore was merged in the then Province of Bombay in consequence of the States Merger (Governor's Provinces) Order, 1949. That order came into operation on August 1, 1949. On December 31, 1949, came into operation the Taxation Laws (Extension to Merged States and Amendment) Act, 1949. By s. 3 of the latter enactment the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, as also the Indian Finance Act, 1949, were extended to all the merged States. That section specifically provides that the two Acts "shall operate as if they had been extended to, and brought into force in, all the merged States on the first day of April 1949". The effect of this was that, although the State of Bhore became merged in the then Province of Bombay as from August 1, 1949, that being the date on which the assent of the Governor General was given, the effect of s. 3(2) was that the provisions of the Income-tax Act and the relevant Indian Finance Act, 1949, were brought into force in that State some months earlier, that is on April 1, 1949. Section 60A was added to the Indian Income-tax Act to bring the law in harmony and by s. 6 of the Taxation Laws (Extension to Merged States and Amendment) Act, 1949, the Central Government was empowered to make any exemption, reduction in rate or other modification in respect of income-tax in certain cases to avoid hardship and difficulties. We shall presently state the relevant provisions of the enactments of which we have made some mention. In exercise of the powers conferred by s. 60A, the Central Government made an order intituled "The Merged States (Taxation Concessions) Order, 1949," and it is on the applicability, scope and the effect of para. 12 of that Order that the principal arguments before us have evolved. It is not necessary to set out in this judgment the relevant provisions of the States Merger (Governor's Province) Order, 1949, or the Taxation Laws (Extension to Merged States and Amendment) Act, 1949, or any provision of the Indian Finance Act. The relevant part of s. 60A is as under:—

"If the Central Government considers it necessary or expedient so to do for avoiding any hardship or anomaly, or removing any difficulty, that may arise as a result of the extension of this Act to the merged territories or to the territories which immediately before the 1st November, 1956, were comprised in any Part B State or to Chandernagore, the Central Government may, by general or special order, make an exemption, reduction in rate or other modification in respect of income-tax in favour of any class of income, or in regard to the whole or any part of the income of any person or class of persons."

It will be seen that income and classes of income and income of any person or classes of persons prior to April 1, 1949, was not being touched by the Indian Income-tax law when it was brought into the scheme of the taxation prevalent in the whole country. That, therefore, was bound to result in certain hardships and difficulties and likely to give rise to anomalous situations. To obviate that, and to give relief or exemptions where it was fit and reasonable to grant exemptions, the Legislature empowered the Central Government to pass requisite orders. It may here be mentioned that the Order was to be the creature of the provisions of s. 60A and nothing more. It could not operate beyond the ambit or matrix of s. 60A and was not intended to do so. We make this observation at this stage because the whole brunt of the argument of Mr. Palkhivala is to the contrary. The provision of the Merged States (Taxation Concessions) Order, 1949, which is very strongly relied on by Mr. Palkhivala is para. 12 of the same. In the course of the arguments before us as also in the judgment of the Tribunal reference has been made to certain other paragraphs of that Order. It will be convenient to quote those paragraphs:

"4. The provisions of paragraphs 5, 6, 9, 10 and 11 of this Order shall apply to only so much of the income, profits and gains included in the total income of an assessee as would, had he been resident in the taxable territories, have been exempt under clause (c) of sub-section (2) of section 14 of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, if the Act had not been passed.

5. (1) The income, profits and gains of any previous year ending after the 31st day of March 1948, which is a previous year—

(i) for the merged State assessment year 1948-49, or

(ii) for the merged State assessment year 1949-50, shall be assessed under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, if, and only if, such income, profits and gains have not, before the 1st day of August, 1949 been assessed under the State law.

(2) Where the income, profits and gains referred to in sub-paragraph (1) have not been assessed under the State law, they shall be assessed under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and the tax payable thereon shall be determined as hereunder:

(i) the tax on the amount of such income, profits and gains included in the total income shall be computed at the Indian rate of tax;

(ii) the amount of such income, profits and gains shall be computed under the State law and the tax thereon computed at the merged States rate of tax;

(iii) the amount, if any, by which the tax computed under clause (i) exceeds the tax computed under clause (ii) shall be allowed as rebate from the first mentioned tax, and the amount of the first mentioned tax as so reduced shall be the tax payable....

6. (1) The income, profits and gains of any previous year ending after the 31st day of March, 1948, which does not fall within paragraph 5 of this Order or of any previous year commencing after the previous year referred to in the said paragraph shall be assessed under the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, but the tax payable on so much of the income as pertains to the period ending before the 1st day of August, 1949, shall be determined as hereunder—

(1) the tax on so much of such income included in the total income shall be computed (a) at the Indian rate of tax and (b) at the rate of tax in force in the merged State immediately before the 1st day of August, 1949;...

12. The provisions of section 23A of the Indian Income-tax Act shall not be applied in respect of the profits and gains of any previous year ending before the 1st day of August 1949, unless the State law contains a provision corresponding thereto."

Section 23A of the Income-tax Act features prominently in this reference and we shall set out here the relevant part of that section, as it stood before the section was recast by the Finance Act of 1955 (we are concerned with the section before the amendment):

"23A. (1) Where the Income-tax Officer is satisfied that in respect of any previous year the profits and gains distributed as dividends by any company upto the end of the sixth month after its accounts for that previous year are laid before the company in general meeting are less than sixty per cent. of the assessable income of the company of that previous year, as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof he shall, unless he is satisfied that having regard to losses incurred by the company in earlier years or to the smallness of the profit made, the payment of a dividend or a larger dividend than that declared would be unreasonable, make with the previous approval of the Inspecting Assistant Commissioner an order in writing that the undistributed portion of the assessable income of the company of that previous year as computed for income-tax purposes and reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof shall be deemed to have been distributed as dividends amongst the shareholders as at the date of the general meeting aforesaid, and thereupon the proportionate share thereof of each shareholder shall be included in the total income of such shareholder for the purpose of assessing his total income:

Provided that when the reserves representing accumulations of past profits which have not been the subject of an order under this sub-section exceed the paid up capital of the company, together with any loan capital which is the property of the shareholders, or the actual cost of the fixed assets of the company whichever of these is greater, this section shall apply as if instead of the words "sixty per cent" the words "one hundred per cent" were substituted:

Provided further that no order under this sub-section shall be made where the company has distributed not less than fifty-five per cent of the assessable income of the company as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof, unless the company, on receipt of a notice from the Income-tax Officer that he proposes to make such an order, fails to make within three months of the receipt of such notice a further distribution of its profits and gains so that the total distribution made is not less than sixty per cent of the assessable income of the company of the previous year concerned as reduced by the amount of income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof:

Provided further that this sub-section shall not apply to any company in which the public are substantially interested or to a subsidiary company of such a company if the whole of the share capital of such subsidiary company is held by the parent company or by the nominees thereof.

Explanation.—For the purpose of this sub-section,— a company shall be deemed to be a company in which the public are substantially interested if shares of the company (not being shares entitled to a fixed rate of dividend, whether with or without a further right to participate in profits) carrying not less than twenty-five per cent. of the voting power have been allotted unconditionally to, or acquired unconditionally by, and are at the end of the previous year beneficially held by the public (not including a company to which the provisions of this sub-section apply), and if any such shares have in the course of such previous year been the subject of dealings in any stock exchange in the taxable territories or are in fact freely transferable by the holders to other members of the public.

(2) The Inspecting Assistant Commissioner shall not give his approval to any order proposed to be passed by the Income-tax Officer under this section until he has given the company concerned an opportunity of being heard.

(3) (i) ...

(ii) Where the proportionate share of any member of a company in the undistributed profits and gains of the company has been included in his total income under the provisions of sub-section (1) the tax payable in respect thereof shall be recoverable from the company, if it cannot be recovered from such member.

(iii) Where a tax is recoverable from a company under this sub-section, a notice of demand shall be served upon it in the prescribed form showing the sum so payable, and such company shall be deemed to be the assessee in respect of such sum, for the purposes of Chapter VI.

(4) Where tax has been paid in respect of any undistributed profits and gains of a company under this section, and such profits and gains are subsequently distributed in any year, the proportionate share therein of any member of the company shall be excluded in computing his total income of that year.

(5) When a company is a shareholder deemed under sub-section (1) to have received a dividend, the amount of the dividend thus deemed to have been paid to it shall be deemed to be part of its total income for the purpose also of the application of that sub-section to distributions of profits by that company."

The assessee carried the matter in appeal to the Tribunal and the Tribunal decided against them practically on all the points. The primary contention of the assessee company before the Departmental authorities and the Tribunal was that it was entitled to claim benefit of the exemptions granted by para. 12 and the Income-tax Officer was not entitled to make any order against the company under s. 23A in respect of any of the two years. Another contention related to interest which the company was compelled to pay by reason of the fact that no advance payment of income-tax had been made as required by s. 18A of the Indian Income-tax Act. Here, the submission was that the company was not bound to pay any advance tax, and not being bound to pay any advance tax, there could be no question of penalty. The argument was that in any event the interest which it had been compelled to pay would, by the language of s. 18A, be equated with tax and that the amount of that interest had to be taken into consideration in computing the assessable income of the company under s. 23A.

The contention of the shareholder-assessee was that they also were entitled to the benefit of the exemption granted by para. 12 and it was also their contention that they were entitled to the benefit of the provisions of s. 14(2)(c) under which in respect of income arising within any Indian State no tax was payable as laid down in that section.

Three questions have been referred to us by the Tribunal on this reference:

"1. Whether Paragraph 12 of the Merged States (Taxation Concessions) Order, 1949, precluded the Income-tax Officer from making any order under section 23A in the case of the assessee company in respect of its profits and gains of the previous year ended 31st December, 1946?

31st December, 1947?

2. Whether in making an order under section 23A in respect of the profits and gains of the year 1946/1947 the assessable income of that previous year is to be reduced not only by the amount of Income-tax and super-tax payable by the company in respect thereof but also by the amount of interest charged to it in accordance with the provisions of Section 18A?

3. Having regard to the order passed by the Income-tax Officer under section 23A in respect of the company's profits of the year 1947 and having apportioned the sum of Rs. 17,641/- to the shareholder, Pushpakumar, as his proportionate share in the distribution made by the Income-tax Officer under section 23A and having regard to the provisions of section 14(2)(c), whether the said sum of Rs. 17,641/- has been properly included in his total income for the purpose of charging it to tax?"

Questions 1 and 2 relate to the assessment of the company for the two years 1946 and 1947. Question 3 relates to the assessment of the shareholders-assessee for the assessment year 1949-50.

It has been argued before us by Mr. Palkhivala that the effect of para. 12 of the Merged States (Taxation Concessions) Order, 1949, to which we shall refer as "the Concessions Order of 1949" which was promulgated under s. 60A of the Income-tax Act, 1922, was that the company became exempt from the operation of s. 23A of the Income-tax Act notwithstanding the extension of the Income-tax Act to Bhor State. If one confines the matter to the language of para. 12 alone, the argument at first blush seems attractive, but para. 12 cannot be read in isolation. It has to be read in its proper setting and particularly bearing in mind the provisions of s. 60A of the Indian Income-tax Act. The argument founded on the phrasing of para. 12 needs to be stated very briefly and it is that the provisions of s. 23A could not be applied by the Income-tax Officer to the income of this company for the assessment years 1947-48 and 1948-49 (accounting years 1946 and 1947) because those were profits and gains of previous years ending before August 1, 1949, and there was nothing in the law of the Bhor State which contained any provision corresponding to the provision enacted in s. 23A whereby a fiction of law was raised and income which was not distributed amongst shareholders was to be deemed to have been actually distributed amongst them. The object of s. 23A and the sound principle underlying it are obvious and it is not necessary for us to discuss the same. Now the question is not of the object of that enactment or the principle underlying it but of its applicability or otherwise to the assessee company before us. The argument of counsel touches every element mentioned in para. 12 but it ignores the most material consideration, the consideration which goes to the root of the matter, and that consideration is that para. 12 applies to any assessee in respect of any assessment year. The application and scope of para. 12, as we already mentioned in passing, has to be gathered from the language of s. 60A. Therefore, it is necessary for us to examine the language of s. 60A. That section, as we have already mentioned, authorises the Central Government to grant exemption and reduction in respect of any income or classes of income or in regard to the income of any person or classes of persons. The crucial words of the section, it will be seen, are that the exemption or reduction which the Central Government is authorised to grant is in respect of a situation which may arise as a result of the extension of the Act to merged territories, which could only be after the date of the Extension Act, unless there was anything in the enactment itself to give it retroactive operation or it was required that it should have effect ex post facto. We have already mentioned that the Income-tax Act and the Finance Act were to be applied from April 1, 1949, but that will have bearing on certain other questions.

The argument of Mr. Palkhivala is that s. 60A contemplates removal of hardships as a result of the extension of the Act to merged States and it was to counteract the hardships that may arise not in respect of assessment years 1949-50 or subsequent years but even in respect of earlier years. It is urged by learned counsel that the words which appear after the word "exemption"—in favour of any class of income, or in regard to the whole or any part of the income of any person or class of persons—were unqualified and not restricted to income-tax on income assessable for the year 1949-50 and subsequent years and the measure therefore applied to any income and the tax payable on that income for earlier years and such relief was in fact calculated to counteract the impact of the extension of the Act to the merged States.

Now, at the very outset, it is necessary to be clear in one's mind as to what was the result of the extension of the Income-tax law of British India to the Merged States. It was that any income not within the purview of the Act, income of persons or class of persons unaffected or untouched by the British Indian Act, became taxable and what is essential to note is that it became taxable for and/or after the assessment years 1949-50. The exemption was to be for the benefit and relief of those who were hit by the Extension Act. Its object was that incomes which were otherwise not liable to tax but, by the Extension Act made so liable, were to be given partial relief or even exemption.

But says Mr. Palkhivala, that is not the object of the Extension Act and that is not the effect of s. 60A. Now, it will be seen from the facts which we have already stated that even before the enactment of s. 60A the assessee company was liable to pay tax in respect of its income in British India (taxable territories). The inevitable starting point must be—Is the exemption claimed in respect of income for the assessment year 1949-50 or any subsequent year? If not, s. 60A has not legislated for it and no question can arise of considering the operation of the Order. In our judgment, this must be so because the Order cannot embrace incomes which were not within the ambit of s. 60A itself. To put it differently, incomes which were not touched by the Extension Act were not to benefit by the exemption. What was legislated for was income for the assessment year 1949-50 and subsequent years. That, to our mind, is the plain meaning of this important provision of the Extension Act.

What we have already mentioned is sufficient to dispose of the first question. But another argument has been advanced before us by Mr. Palkhivala and that is quod the income of the assessee-shareholders. The question as formulated relates to the case of the assessee company in respect of its profits and gains of the previous years 1946 and 1947. There is no specific question before us in respect of the income of the assessee-shareholders relating to the applicability and effect of para. 12 of the Concessions Order. But it is clear from the statement of the case itself that the assessee-shareholders also had asked the Tribunal, on this s. 66(1) application, to raise that question of law and it seems but only right that question No. 1 should be reframed by us and answered. We shall reframe question No. 1 by dividing it in two parts. The first part will be as the first question reads at present and the second part of that will be:

It has been urged by Mr. Palkhivala that even on the construction we are inclined to put on s. 60A and the view we are inclined to take of the application and effect of para. 12 of the Concessions Order, the assessee-shareholders have been taxed in respect of the assessment year 1949-50 and would be within the ambit of the section itself and the Order. In a broad general sense we agree with Mr. Palkhivala. It is said by Mr. Palkhivala that the shareholders were hit by the s. 23A order although it was made in respect of the company's income for the years 1946 and 1947 which corresponded with two assessment years prior to August 1, 1949, because here the shareholders were being taxed for the assessment year 1949-50. The next step of the argument is that a shareholder whether resident or non-resident could claim benefit of para. 12 and ask for exemption in respect of the assessment year 1949-50 and the sequitor, it is said, of this premise is that s. 23A could not be applied to the case of these assessee. The primary liability under s. 23A, it is said, was of the shareholders. The profit was the profit of the company and the State law did not contain any provisions analogous to that contained in s. 23A and it stood to reason, so the argument has run, that the shareholders in any event should have the benefit of the exemption. Here also at first blush, the argument sounds somewhat attractive but in substance it amounts to this that we must look only at the Order and read para. 12 in the context of the relevant provisions of the Order but not in the light of s. 60A of the Indian Income-tax Act and the meaning and scope of s. 23A of the Income-tax Act. Section 60A, as we have already observed, is the very foundation of the Order of 1949 including para. 12 of the same and before we look at para. 12, we have to remember that the scope and ambit of the exemption granted by para. 12 has already been determined by s. 60A. Therefore, even when applying para. 12 to the case of an assessee-shareholder in respect of any ‘income of any person or class of persons’ taxed by operation of the Extension Act, we have to go back to the application and effect of that section itself and in the present context, the provisions of that section and s. 23A of the Income-tax Act have to be read together. Paragraph 12 itself states that the provisions of s. 23A of the Income-tax Act would not be applied in respect of the profits and gains of any previous year ending before August 1, 1949. Mr. Palkhivala rightly agrees that the profits and gains of any previous year here must mean the profits and gains of the company and not profits and gains of the assessee-shareholders. The starting point of invoking the operation of s. 23A is the profits and gains of a company, which profits and gains, it is to be ascertained, were or were not properly distributed as required by law. It necessarily follows that the profits and gains of the company must be profits and gains which are brought within the operation of the Extension Act, and para. 12 cannot be read in isolation or divorced from its setting. It is, however, argued that even if para. 12 has to be read in the light of s. 60A and the context of that section, when it came to making a concession to an assessee-shareholder for the assessment year 1949-50 or any subsequent year, it was open to the Government to extend the relief and grant the exemption to all or part of any income of the assessee. To the difficulty raised by the language of s. 60A, the answer of learned counsel is that to restrict it would be adding words in para. 12. Reference has been made in support of this argument to para. 4 of the Order and it is said that where the Government wanted the operation of the Order to be limited, it has specifically so provided. This part of the argument, in our judgment, is not well-founded. To read para. 12 in the context of s. 60A would not be adding anything to the language of the paragraph. It has of necessity to be read and given effect to only within the ambit of s. 60A. There is another aspect of the same matter. It can be said that in a sense the shareholder does not come into the picture when para. 12 mentions profits and gains of any previous year ending before August 1, 1949, because these profits and gains can only be profits and gains of the company, and the profits and gains of the company, which can give rise to any exemption or any relief are the profits and gains for the year 1949-50 and subsequent years. This is not to suggest that para. 12 has no applicability to the case of any assessee-shareholder. We are merely pointing out that this is another facet of the same question. Of course para. 12 does apply to an assessee-shareholder but it can only apply to an assessee-shareholder within the ambit and scope of s. 60A and not outside it. The result, as we see, is that the assessee-shareholder, although he became entitled to claim relief or exemption by operation of the Order made under s. 60A in respect of the assessment year 1949-50, the effect of para. 12 read with s. 60A and s. 23A of the Income-tax Act is that it was the undistributed profit of a company for the year 1949-50 and subsequent years only to which the exemption can relate.

The second question before us on this reference raises a very short contention and we have already indicated what that contention is. The argument is founded on the language of s. 18A(8) which is as under:

"Where, on making the regular assessment, the Income-tax Officer finds that no payment of tax has been made in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this section, interest calculated in the manner laid down in sub-section (6) shall be added to the tax as determined on the basis of the regular assessment."

This section, relates to advance payment of tax. Learned counsel has relied on the words "shall be added to the tax as determined on the basis of the regular assessment." The brief argument is that by adding this amount to the tax, the amount became tax for the purpose of computation envisaged by s. 23A. There is nothing in the language of s. 23A which permits of any such artificial meaning being given to penalty interest nor is there anything which permits of any equivalence being established between the payment of penalty interest and tax and super-tax contemplated by s. 23A. We may add that s. 29 deals with the question of tax, penalty and interest as separate concepts.

The third question, which, according to learned counsel, is also an important question on this reference, relates to the contention of the assessee-shareholders that they have always been and have continued to be entitled to the exemption given by s. 14(3)(c) which at the material time was as under:

"The tax shall not be payable by an assessee...

(c) in respect of any income, profits or gains accruing or arising to him within an Indian State, unless such income, profits or gains are received or deemed to be received in or are brought into (British India) in the previous year by or on behalf of the assessee, or are assessable under section 12B or section 42."

We are not concerned here on this reference with s. 12B or s. 42. We have already mentioned that the operation of the Income-tax Act and the Finance Act, 1949, was retroactive from April 1, 1949. Now, relying on s. 14(2)(c) the argument urged on behalf of the assessee-shareholders is that the effect of the Extension Act and the Order was not to deprive them of the benefit of s. 14(2)(c) in any manner. It is said that the income which they derived as dividends could not be charged in their hands unless it was shown that it accrued in British India or is deemed to have accrued in British India or was brought into British India in the previous year. The argument proceeded that this is a case of a fiction of law created by s. 23A. Dividend which may have been distributed could only be at the office of the company in Bhore State, and since the income was to be deemed to have been distributed in the Bhore State, it was exempt from tax under s. 14(2)(c), even though the assessee-shareholders were residents within British India. Though included in their total income, it was to be exempt from taxation and the shareholders would not have to pay tax on it by operation of s. 14(2)(c). It has been urged that the shareholder would be justified in saying that he should be put in the same position in which he would have been if 60 per cent. of the profits of the company had been declared as dividend. The shareholder would not have to pay tax in respect of the income in British India by operation of s. 14(2)(c). Reference has also been made to s. 16(1)(a) and it is said that it relates only to rates and not to assessments. The argument here has centred round one point and that point is that what was to be regarded was not the law in force on August 1, 1949, but the law in force in Bhore State on April 1, 1949, and if that was the position, the application of s. 14(2)(c) survived. Now, we have already pointed out that although the extension of the Income-tax Act to the merged States was by virtue of the provisions of the Extension Act, 1949, retrospective effect was given to the provisions of the Income-tax Act and the Finance Act, 1949, as from April 1, 1949. Therefore, this argument does not survive. Learned counsel has also relied on what he had already submitted in the context of the first question before us. It is not necessary for us to deal with the same over again.

On the other hand, it has been argued by Mr. Joshi learned counsel for the Revenue, that so far as undistributed profits are deemed to be distributed by virtue of an order made under s. 23A, there is no question of accrual. The deemed income is to be included in the total income and the point of exemption is not material in this context because the inclusion is by virtue of s. 23A itself. Then, it is said that even assuming that the place of accrual was of relevance, it became immaterial because Bhore State had become part of British India (taxable territory) for the purpose of application of the Income-tax Act as from April 1, 1949. It is not necessary for us to deal with the first argument of Mr. Joshi. The second argument meets the case. In our opinion, it is not permissible to the assessee-shareholders, in view of the relevant provisions of the legislation to which we have already referred, to claim that they were entitled to the benefit of s. 14(2)(c).

We have so far not referred to one argument of Mr. Palkhivala and that argument is, if we may so describe it, de hors the Extension Act. It turns on the construction to be put on para. 4 of the Order of 1949. Succinctly stated, the argument has been that the paragraph gave benefit of the relevant exemptions both to assesseees who were non-residents in the taxable territories and those who were residents in the taxable territories. The identical point was raised before this Court in Mrs. Kusumben D. Mahadevia v. The Commissioner of

*Income-tax*¹ in a matter, which, we are informed, has been carried to the Supreme Court. In that case, this very contention was negatived and we are bound by that decision. It is not necessary for us to examine this argument of Mr. Palkhivala.

JADAVJI NARSIDAS & COMPANY v. THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY CITY II, BOMBAY.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 23(5), 24—Unregistered firm not assessed—Partner in firm whether can claim to set-off his share of losses of such firm against his other income from business.

An assessee, whether an individual or a registered firm, can, as against the profits of his business, claim to set-off his share of loss of a firm in which he is a partner although the partnership firm is unregistered if the Department does not assess the unregistered firm and determine the loss incurred by such firm.

J. C. Thakkar v. Comr. I. T.¹ and Jannadas Daga v. Commr. I.-Tax,² referred to.

The facts appear in the judgment.

E. J. Kolah, for the assessee.

G. N. Joshi, with E. J. Joshi, for the Commissioner of Income-tax.

S. T. DESAI J. A question of some importance arises on this Reference and that question is whether an assessee can, as against the profits of his business, claim to set-off his share of the loss of a firm in which he is a partner although the partnership firm is unregistered and is not assessed as a firm. The assessee is a registered firm of four partners. The assessment year is 1946-47 and the accounting year is S. Y. 2001 (October 18, 1944 to November 4, 1945). The assessee firm carries on speculative business in various commodities. In the year of account it claimed a sum of Rs. 1,05,641 as loss arising to it in a joint venture with Damji Laxmidas. In the statement of the case it is mentioned that the assessee firm had done such transactions with Damji Laxmidas in earlier years and also in subsequent years. The profits and losses arising from such transactions of the nature of the joint venture with Damji Laxmidas in the earlier years and the subsequent years have been taken into account while making up the assessment of the assessee firm for those years. The loss arising from the joint venture with Damji Laxmidas in the accounting year has been disallowed. The assessee produced a deed of partnership, dated November 14, 1944, which is on requisite stamp paper and that agreement states that the parties had agreed to do forward business in partnership in various markets. Damji Laxmidas filed a statement at the instance of the assessee in which he confirmed the case of the assessee that there was such partnership between them. He stated that the procedure followed was that the accounts of the transactions were maintained in the books of the assessee firm and the Ankaḍas in respect of the speculative business were issued in the name of Damji Laxmidas. In the partnership agreement the shares of the four partners are stated and they aggregate to As. 10 and Damji's share is shown as six annas in a rupee. The loss claimed by the assessee was on the footing of 8 annas share in the partnership with Damji Laxmidas. The Income-tax Officer disallowed the loss and we shall presently examine the data on which he did so and the reasons given by him for the same. The Income-tax Officer has observed in his order:

"To my mind it looks as though the firm has purchased the losses from Damji Laxmidas to escape taxation to that extent."

The Appellate Assistant Commissioner dismissed the assessee's appeal. The matter was carried to the Tribunal and the Tribunal also agreed with the finding given by the Income-tax authorities. The Tribunal, it is mentioned in the statement of the case, took the view that even if the business transactions were genuine, it was the business of Damji Laxmidas. The Accountant Member agreed with the finding recorded by the Judicial Member. But he expressed the view that the loss could not in any case be allowed to the assessee as it was a loss of an unregistered firm. According to the Accountant Member, in the case of an unregistered firm, the loss can only be carried forward in the account of the firm as provided under the Income-tax Act. The assessee had also relied upon an order of the Tribunal made on September 11, 1952, in the matter of the assessment made on Damji Laxmidas for the same preceding year. Damji Laxmidas had claimed his share of the loss in his own assessment. The Tribunal disallowed the loss claimed by Damji Laxmidas on the ground that the loss arising from an unregistered firm could not be taken into account in the individual assessment of the partner. The question, it seems, was decided only on that short issue and the Tribunal did not go into the question of the genuineness of the loss claimed by Damji Laxmidas. One more fact that needs to be stated is that the assessee had entered into joint venture transactions of the same nature also with other persons and in the assessment of the assessee firm the Department has accepted those transactions of the nature of a joint venture with parties other than Damji Laxmidas. The assessee has come before us on this reference directed to be made by this Court under s. 66(2) of the Act.

The questions which we have to determine are:

"(1) Whether there was any legal admissible evidence to justify the Tribunal's finding that the transaction in question was not the transaction of the assessee?

(2) If not, whether the assessee can claim the set-off of such loss, although it is the loss of an unregistered partnership?"

It has been argued before us by Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the assessee, that the Tribunal has failed to appreciate the correct position and has decided the matter without there being any evidence to sustain the finding recorded by it on the first question relating to the genuineness of the transactions and the alleged joint venture. The Tribunal had to consider four items, but on this reference we are only concerned with the item of Rs. 1,05,641 which was disallowed by the Income-tax authorities as well as the Tribunal. This is what the Judicial Member has stated in respect of this item:

"We are not satisfied that really the loss of Rs. 1,05,641/- was the loss of the assessee. It is admitted by the assessee that the Ankdas are in the name of Damji Laxmidas. By no evidence we are satisfied that really the assessee did business in the joint account. Consequently, this claim of the assessee is disallowed."

The Accountant Member agreed with the Judicial Member and added:—

"It is not even the assessee's case that loss of Rs. 1,05,641/- was suffered by it. According to the assessee it did some joint venture transactions with Damji Laxmidas. Damji Laxmidas came in appeal to the Tribunal in respect of his share of the loss. It was held that the loss arising to a person in a joint venture cannot be allowed in his personal assessment as the loss is suffered by an unregistered partnership. It can only be carried forward in the account of the unregistered firm."

The argument of counsel is that the mere fact that Ankdas relating to the speculative transactions are in the name of one of the partners in the firm is not evidence on which the conclusion of the Tribunal could be sustained. The further argument of learned counsel is that there is material on the record including the account books of the assessee firm which has not been taken into consideration by the Tribunal. It is true that there is no reference to the account books of the assessee firm in the order passed by the learned members of the Tribunal. Regarding this item of Rs. 1,05,641 the Income-tax Officer has stated that on referring to the case of Damji Laxmidas he found that Damji Laxmidas had not given any idea in the statement filed by him about the extent of his share of loss in the joint venture and had stated that the loss was approximately Rs. 75,000. On being questioned, the partnership deed dated November 14, 1944, had been produced. In his order the Income-tax Officer refers to the factum of the Ankdas being in the name of Damji Laxmidas and stresses that they were "not in the name of the company". We understand that by "the company" he meant the assessee firm. It will be convenient here to observe that the partnership agreement recites the names of all the four partners in the firm of Messrs. Jadavji Narsidas, the assessee firm before us, and then refers to Damji Laxmidas as the party of the 5th part. There is no firm name given to the partnership brought into existence by that deed between the four partners in the firm of Messrs. Jadavji Narsidas on the one hand and Damji Laxmidas on the other. Therefore, the partnership business could be done either in the name of the group of the four partners or in the name of Damji Laxmidas. We mention this at this stage because the principal argument on behalf of the Revenue on this question has rested on the fact of the Ankdas being in the name of Damji Laxmidas and not in the name of the assessee firm. The Income-tax Officer has also relied upon the fact that the assessee firm had claimed loss on the footing of 8 annas share and not 10 annas share as mentioned in the partnership deed. This is what he has stated:

"It is not also clear in my mind how Messrs. Jadavji Narsidas and Co., one of the biggest brokers in the line, had placed such implicit faith in the ability of Mr. Damji Laxmidas to the extent of losing about four lakhs of rupees."

Then he has observed that the firm had purchased the losses from Damji Laxmidas to escape taxation to that extent. The Income-tax Officer held that the losses claimed by the assessee firm were not losses genuinely incurred in any business and that the transaction as a whole was no more than purchase of losses from Damji Laxmidas. Now, purchase of losses can evidently be after they have been incurred by some party. A statement prepared from the entries in the books of account of the assessee firm showing numerous transactions in various commodities resulting both in profits as well as losses was filed before the Income-tax authorities and is part of the record before us. A cursory perusal of that statement would show that the transactions could not be of the nature of purchase of losses by the assessee firm as found by the Income-tax Officer. We may observe at this stage that learned counsel for the Revenue has not argued before us that this is a case of bogus purchase of losses. We shall presently examine the case as now presented before us on behalf of the Revenue.

Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, has laid stress on the fact that the Ankdas were in the name of Damji Laxmidas, but the way learned counsel has put the case before us is that the business was not the business of the assessee firm, but was the business of Damji Laxmidas and half of the loss had been taken over by the assessee. Learned counsel has stated that he is not supporting the conclusion of the Tribunal that this was a case of bogus purchases of losses. To us it seems that there is little difference between the conclusion of the Tribunal and the way in which Mr. Joshi has now tried to support what seems unsupportable. There is no evidence at all nor is there any finding or inference that the books of account of the assessee firm did not reflect the true position. There is no evidence on the record nor any circumstance why the statement of Damji Laxmidas should not have been accepted. Therefore, the sole factor that could weigh and could be stressed before us was the one which the Tribunal has mentioned in its order viz. the fact of the Ankdas being in the name of Damji Laxmidas. We have already observed that in this case the Ankdas could be in the name of either the assessee or Damji Laxmidas. It is not possible to suggest in this case that the Ankdas are not in the name of the partnership firm because no firm name appears to have been given to the partnership of the group of four partners and Damji Laxmidas. On this state of the record, we can only reach the conclusion that there was no legal evidence before the Tribunal to sustain the finding that the transactions in question were not the transactions of the assessee.

There remains for consideration the question whether a partner in an unregistered firm can claim to set-off his share of the losses of such firm against his other income from business when the unregistered firm has not been assessed. It has been argued before us by Mr. Kolah that there is no provision in the Income-tax Act which lays down that a person who carries on his own business and is also a partner in an unregistered firm cannot in any case claim to set-off his share of the loss of that firm against his other income from business. Learned counsel for the other side has not been able to point out to us any provision which makes it mandatory that an unregistered firm must be assessed before any claim for set-off in respect of its losses can arise though, as we shall point out later on, some reliance has been placed by him on the second proviso to s. 24. The matter has been argued before us by Mr. Kolah on general principles underlying s. 10 and he has also referred to s. 23(5) and s. 24 and relied on two decisions of this Court to which we shall turn a little later in our judgment. The question is res integra and does not appear to have arisen for decision in its present form.

Now, the argument of learned counsel for the assessee is that the Act lays down certain provisions as to when the loss of a partner in an unregistered firm cannot be set-off against his other income from business and he has urged that the case of the assessee does not fall under any of those provisions. Reference was made in this context to ss. 10, 23(5) and 24. The principal argument is that there is authority for the proposition that in case of an individual or a registered firm who is an assessee, if he or it enters into partnership with another and the firm so constituted is not registered, it is still competent to the taxing authority to add the share of the profits of such individual or registered firm (which joined in partnership with another person) in the business of the unregistered firm, to his or its other income even though the unregistered firm has not been assessed to tax. The argument has proceeded that there is no reason why the same principle should not apply to the case of set-off if instead of profit the business of the unregistered firm has resulted in loss simply because it has not been assessed to tax.

It is necessary to examine the scheme of the Income-tax Act on the question of assessment of an unregistered firm and the position of the partners in the firm vis-a-vis the unregistered firm and the Department in the matter of tax. Section 3 speaks of the charge of Income-tax on the total income of every individual, Hindu undivided family, company and local authority, and of every firm or the partners of the firm individually. Section 4 rules that the total income of any person includes all income, profits and gains from whatever source derived. Section 6 states the heads of income chargeable to income-tax, and the sections immediately following deal with the various heads of income. Section 10 deals with the tax payable by an assessee under the head "Profits and gains of business..." in respect of the profits or gains of any business carried on by him. The word 'profit' it is well-established "is to be understood in its natural and proper sense—in a sense which no commercial man would misunderstand" and profits must be ascertained on ordinary principles of commercial trading. It is not necessary that the assessee should personally carry on the business. He may carry on one business or numerous businesses. He is assessable under this section in respect of business carried on by himself as also in respect of his share of the profits of business of a firm registered or unregistered and his profits are to be ascertained in accordance with the relevant special requirements of the Act. It is equally well-established that where a deduction is proper and necessary to be made or any loss is to be allowed to be taken into the computation or to be set-off against his profits in business to ascertain the result or ultimate position, that ought to be allowed provided there is no prohibition against such deduction or allowance or set-off. The levy is on the total income of the assessable entity to be computed in accordance with the provisions of the Act. It is equally firmly established that loss arising from any one source under the head of "business" may be set-off against profits from another source under the same head. This is on general principle—apart from any provision of the Act—since income under each head is to be computed by clubbing or lumping together of the profits of the assessee from various sources under the same head. The levy is on the balance of profits after deducting such losses, and it is not now disputable nor disputed before us that an assessee who carries on a number of businesses is entitled under s. 10 to set-off his losses in one source under the head of 'business' against his profits in another source under the same head. The arguments of learned counsel for the parties and particularly on behalf of the Revenue have touched s. 23(5) and mainly s. 24 but we may in passing mention s. 16 since we are reviewing the scheme of the Act in the context of the share of a partner in the losses of an unregistered firm. Section 16(1)(b) relates to the mode or method of computing a partner's share and lays down certain exemptions and exclusions in determining the total income. No argument has been founded on it and no reference has been made to it by counsel but we mention it because the proviso to that sub-section states that the share of an assessee in the loss of a partnership firm may be set-off in accordance with the provisions of s. 24. Section 23(5) deals with and governs "assessment" of a firm. The firm may or may not have been registered under the relevant provisions of the Act. If the firm is registered [s. 23(5)(a)] the levy must be directly on the firm and each partner's share of the firm's profit is added to his other income and charged as part of his total income; and if such share of the partner is a loss [first proviso to s. 23(5)(a)] it is to be set-off against his other income or to be carried forward in accordance with the provisions of s. 24. Then comes cl. (b) of s. 23(5) which, as has often been said, is an enabling provision. At the relevant time it was as under:

"In the case of an unregistered firm, the Income-tax Officer may instead of determining the sum payable by the firm itself proceed in the manner laid down in clause (a) as applicable to a registered firm if, in his opinion, the aggregate amount of the tax including super-tax, if any, payable by the partners under such procedure would be greater than the aggregate amount which would be payable by the firm and the partners individually if the firm were assessed as an unregistered firm."

Whether registered or not a firm is an assessee within the meaning of that expression as defined in s. 2(2). Its income may be assessed like that of any other unit or entity of assessment regardless of the fact that it is registered or not. One of two positions can arise in the matter of assessment of a partner in an unregistered firm. The position would be simple when the unregistered firm has made profits. The Income-tax Officer may adopt any of the two courses open to him under s. 23(5)(b). Before completing the assessment of the individual partner the Income-tax Officer may exercise his option and proceed to determine the sum payable by the firm itself as if it were a registered firm, though in fact it is not registered, if it appears to him that such procedure would in the aggregate bring a greater amount to the Revenue by way of tax and super-tax. No question arises in any such case of setting-off of any losses of the unregistered firm, it having made profits in the relevant accounting period. The other position would arise when the unregistered firm has made a loss and an individual partner seeks to set-off his share of that loss in his individual assessment against his other income from business. Here also the Income-tax Officer may before completing the assessment of the individual partner ascertain the loss incurred by the firm and decide upon the course to be adopted by him. He may decide to treat the unregistered firm as if it were registered and the amount of the share of the loss of the individual partner in such a case would be set-off against his other income from business. Or he may determine the amount of loss incurred by the unregistered firm without treating it as a registered firm and in such a case the latter part of the second proviso to s. 24 would come into play and the position would be what we shall presently point out after referring to s. 24, relevant part of which is as follows:—

"Where any assessee sustains a loss of profits or gains in any year under any of the heads mentioned in section 8, he shall be entitled to have the amount of the loss set-off against his income, profits or gains under any other head in that year."

The first proviso to sub-s. (1) of s. 24, which sub-section is set out above, permits the claim for set-off in respect of speculative losses only to the extent of the amount of profits in any other business consisting of speculative transactions. In the present case there is no dispute that the assessee firm's business is in speculative transactions and the loss claimed by the assessee is also in respect of speculative transactions. The second proviso to sub-s. (1) of s. 24 is as under:—

"Provided further that where the assessee is an unregistered firm which has not been assessed under the provisions of clause (b) of sub-section (5) of section 23.., any such loss shall be set-off only against the income, profits and gains of the firm and not against the income, profits and gains of any of the partners of the firm; and where the assessee is a registered firm, any loss which cannot be set-off against other income, profits and gains of the firm shall be apportioned between the partners of the firm and they alone shall be entitled to have the amount of the loss set-off under this section."

In order to avoid any unnecessary complication which can arise from the fact that the assessee in the present case happens to be a registered firm and claims to set-off its share of losses as a partner in another firm which is unregistered, it will be convenient to examine the legal position as stated by us at the very outset of our judgment by considering the question whether an individual assessee, can, as against the profits of his business, claim to set-off his share of the loss of a firm in which he is a partner although that partnership firm is unregistered. As already mentioned by us the Income-tax Officer may in such a case decide to treat the unregistered firm as if it were registered and the amount of the share of the loss of the individual partner would be allowed to be set-off against his other income. Or instead he may, as we have already mentioned, determine the amount of loss incurred by the unregistered firm without treating it as a registered firm. It is in such a case that the second proviso to s. 24(1) would come into play and the loss of the unregistered firm can be set-off only against the income, profits and gains of the unregistered firm and not against the income, profits and gains of the individual partner who seeks to set-off his own share of those losses against his other income from business in his personal assessment. The position so far is quite clear and cannot raise any problem for the assessee partner or the unregistered firm or the Department. But difficulty and complication is likely to arise, as it has in fact arisen in the case before us, if the Income-tax Officer neither proceeds to treat the unregistered firm as if it were registered and assess the loss nor proceeds to assess the loss of the unregistered firm and simply refuses to recognize the factum and existence of the unregistered firm and holds that the assessee who claims to be a partner in the unregistered firm was not a partner at all in the alleged unregistered firm or that the transactions are not the partnership business. Question must arise in such a case if it turns out and is ultimately held that he was in fact a partner in the unregistered firm which had incurred losses or that the transactions are of the partnership. And the contention of Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the assessee before us, is that since the Income-tax Officer did not choose to adopt any of the two courses open to him and simply declined to grant any set-off on the ground that there was no such partnership transaction as alleged by the assessee, the assessee could claim to set-off its share of those losses against its other income from speculative business. The view taken by the Accountant Member was that in no circumstance can a set-off be allowed to an individual partner in respect of his share of the loss of an unregistered firm and that it can only be carried forward in the account of the firm as provided by the second proviso to s. 24(1). Therefore, what we have now to consider is what is to happen in a case of this nature. Can it be said that since the unregistered firm has not been assessed and its loss not determined the individual partner is not entitled to claim any set-off? The argument of learned counsel for the assessee, as we have already stated, is that there is authority for the proposition that in case of an individual or a registered firm who is an assessee, if he or it enters into partnership with another and the firm so constituted is not registered, it is still competent to the taxing authority to add the share of the profits of such individual or registered firm (which joined in partnership with another person) in the business of the unregistered firm, to his or its other income even though the unregistered firm has not been assessed to tax. The next step of the argument is that there is no reason why the same principle should not apply to the case of set-off if instead of profit the business of the unregistered firm has resulted in loss simply because it has not been assessed to tax.

Mr. Kolah has drawn our attention to two decisions of this Court. In *J. C. Thakkar v. Comr. I.T.*¹ the question arose whether a partner in an unregistered firm could be taxed in respect of his profits in the unregistered firm when the unregistered firm itself had not been assessed to tax. A contention was urged on behalf of the assessee that the scheme of the Act did not permit the Department to tax a partner in an unregistered firm before assessing the unregistered firm itself in the manner provided in s. 23(5)(b). That contention was repelled by the Court and it was held that a partner could be assessed in respect of his share of profits in an unregistered firm even though the unregistered firm itself had not been first assessed to tax. The view taken by the Court was that it was not a condition precedent to the bringing of the share of a partner in the profits of an unregistered firm in his total income simply on the ground that the unregistered firm had not been first assessed to tax. It was also pointed out in that case that there is no provision of the Income-tax Act which prohibits the assessment of a partner until the firm in which he is a partner is assessed. At p. 467 of the Report it is observed:

"...Now, as has often been pointed out, the assessable entity under the Income-tax Act is different from a legal entity. The object of the Income-tax Act is to spread its net wide and to include in that net every person and every association of persons, however that association may have been constituted. Therefore, we find that what is subject to tax under s. 3 is the total income of the previous year of every individual, Hindu undivided family, company and local authority, and every firm and other association of persons or the partners of the firm or the members of the association individually. Therefore, an individual can be assessed to tax, a partnership in which the individual is a partner can be assessed to tax, and s. 3 does not provide that when there is a partnership only the firm can be taxed and not the partners of that firm. Far from so providing, the section makes it clear that even where there is a firm which can be assessed to tax, a partner of that firm can also be an assessee for the purposes of the Act... But all that we wish to point out is that in the charging section itself, far from there being a prohibition against a partner of a firm being assessed to tax, there is a legislative fiat as it were in favour of the Income-tax department if they choose to assess a partner and not the firm of which he was a partner."

The other decision to which our attention has been drawn by Mr. Kolah is Jamnadas Daga v. Commr. I-Tax,² which was decided by my brother Tendolkar J. and myself. In that case the assessee was a partner in two registered firms which in the relevant accounting year incurred losses, and in an unregistered firm which in the same year earned a profit which was taxed in the hands of the unregistered firm. The share of the assessee in the profit of the unregistered firm was a larger amount and exceeded the share of losses in the registered firms. The assessee had a small income which had to be taxed at the rate applicable to the total income of the assessee. The assessee contended that his share of the profits in the unregistered firm having been taxed in the hands of that firm, should be entirely ignored and could not be set-off against his share of the losses in the other firms. In that case, reliance was placed on the second proviso to s. 24(1). The view we took of the matter was that for the purpose of ascertaining the total income of the assessee, the assessee's share of profit in the unregistered firm which had separately been taxed could not be ignored but should be set-off against his share in the losses of the registered firms.

Now a somewhat ingenious argument has been advanced before us by Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, and the argument is that though the applicant is a registered firm, the correct position for the purpose of the present matter is that it is an unregistered firm consisting of four partners. It is urged that a careful scrutiny of the partnership agreement would show that the partnership was not between the assessee firm of Jadavji Narsidas and Damji Laxmidas. It will be convenient to set out the relevant part of that agreement, on which Mr. Joshi has founded the present argument:

"This Indenture...made between Jadavji Narsidas...of the first part; Parmanand Narsidas...of the second part; Nagindas Jadavji...of the third part; Jashvantral Jadavji...of the fourth part; all partners in the firm of Messrs. Jadavji Narsidas carrying on business at Masjid Bunder Road, Bombay and Damji Laxmidas of the fifth part..."

Learned counsel has also drawn our attention to the fact that the shares in the profits and losses of the business were set out in the names of all the five persons. We do not think there is any scope for the fine distinction which Mr. Joshi has tried to make out from the partnership deed. In effect Mr. Joshi is trying to develop a question which is altogether new. Even so we have heard him on that point. We may observe that the Department as well as the Tribunal has proceeded on the footing that the assessee firm and the individual outsider Damji Laxmidas had entered into partnership. But what has been held is that in the transactions in question the assessee firm had no interest as a partner of the unregistered firm. We have here to consider whether in fact there was or was not a partnership between the firm of four persons on the one hand and Damji Laxmidas on the other in respect of the relevant transactions. The present contention must, therefore, be negatived.

Learned counsel for the Revenue has drawn our attention to s. 3 of the Act and stressed that the persons who can be units of assessment, or an "entity" are mentioned in that section. It is stated that in the case of an assessee who carries on business, what can be taxed under the head of "business" mentioned in s. 10 can be the profits and gains of the business of that firm as a unit or an entity. The argument has proceeded that if a firm carrying on business happens to be a partner in another firm which is unregistered, its share in the other firm may be taken into account in ascertaining the profits or losses of the firm to be ascertained under s. 10 and that before that can be done the profits and losses of the other firm must be separately ascertained and assessed. The argument is that the profits or losses of the other firm would first have to be ascertained and it is only after assessment of that unregistered firm that the question of set-off can arise and that in no case set-off for losses would be allowed. It has been stated that if this position is not accepted, it would not be possible to give effect to the various provisions of the Act relating, for instance, to deductions, allowances and exemptions. Therefore, the argument is that an unregistered firm must be assessed as a unit or as an entity and its loss determined before any set-off in respect of his share of such losses can be claimed by a partner against the profits of his other business. We agree that the procedure suggested by Mr. Joshi is a practical method to adopt and would be convenient and would avoid a good deal of delay and difficulties. But what we are concerned with here is as to what is to happen if the Income-tax Officer does not determine the losses of the unregistered firm. The point before us is as to the right of a partner to claim a set-off in respect of his share of losses in an unregistered firm which has not been assessed and losses of which should have been assessed. It is not difficult to see that if the law requires that under no circumstances any set-off can be claimed by an individual partner unless the unregistered firm was brought to tax, we must give effect to the same. But the question is: Is there any such requirement of the Income-tax law? We have already referred to ss. 23 and 24 and may add that there is no provision of law which requires an unregistered firm to have its losses assessed. Of course, if the unregistered firm does not have its losses determined, does not file a return and get its losses determined, it would not have the benefit of carrying forward those losses. But that is a different matter. In the absence of any express provision in the Income-tax law and on general principles we do not see why a partner in an unregistered firm should not be permitted to claim a set-off in respect of his share of loss in an unregistered firm against the profits of his other business simply because the Department does not choose to determine the losses of the unregistered firm. The provisions of s. 23(5)(b) enable the Income-tax Officer to choose one of two alternative methods. In a case of the nature before us when a set-off is claimed in respect of the share of loss in an unregistered firm, it would be necessary for the assessee to satisfy him that the losses were in fact incurred and the Income-tax Officer would be justified and indeed bound to satisfy himself about the true position of the business of the unregistered firm for the year in question. It would also be open to him to take such steps as he may deem proper under the provisions of the Act. He may exercise the option laid down in s. 23(5)(b). In case of profits he may determine the profits of the firm. He may then proceed to assess the firm as a registered firm if there is any taxable profit if he thinks that the aggregate amount of the tax including super-tax payable by the partners would be greater than the aggregate amount which would be payable by the firm and the partners individually if the firm was assessed as a registered firm, or he may assess it as an unregistered firm. In case of losses he would have to determine the losses of the unregistered firm as he would be doing in the case of a registered firm where loss is shown and for which there is ample provision in the Act. But there is neither principle nor any provision of law which bars an assessee, whether an individual or a firm, from claiming a set-off in respect of his or its share of the loss in an unregistered firm simply on the ground that the latter has not been brought to tax. Partnerships between firms and individuals and firms and firms are not uncommon in our country. The Income-tax department often deals with such partnerships.

In order to test Mr. Joshi's argument we put an illustration to him. We asked Mr. Joshi as to what would happen where the partners themselves had made large profits in their own business and in the partnership business of the unregistered firm had made a profit which was within the taxable minimum or had made a loss and the illustration we mentioned was of the firm of two partners who had made large profits in their own separate businesses and in the joint venture had earned a profit of only Rs. 1,000. Mr. Joshi had to agree that in such a case it cannot be said that the shares of the individual partners in the profits of the firm would not be added to their profit in the other business before the assessment of the unregistered firm, and that could be the only answer because in such a case there would be no assessment of the profits of the unregistered firm. Therefore, it is not possible to accept the contention that the assessment of the unregistered firm is a sine qua non to the right of a partner to claim a set-off in respect of his share of the losses in an unregistered firm. Moreover, Mr. Joshi's present argument is contrary to the principle laid down in the decisions to which we have already made reference. The fact that the assessee before us is not an individual but a registered firm does not make any difference. Our answer, therefore, to the second question will be that the assessee can claim a set-off in respect of its share of loss in an unregistered firm if the Income-tax authorities do not proceed to determine the loss of the unregistered firm and do not bring it to tax as permitted by s. 23(5)(b).

THE STATE v. SHANKAR BHAURAO KHIRODE.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 173, 4(l) & (k), 190(1)(b), 193; 337—Police Manual, Vol. III, rr. 202, 203—Criminal Law Amendment Act (XLVI of 1952), Secs. 6, 7, 8—Prevention of Corruption Act (II of 1947), Secs. 5A, 6—Final report in connection with offence under s. 161, I. P. Code and s. 5 of Prevention of Corruption Act submitted by police officer to Magistrate under s. 173, Cr. P. Code with request for issue of 'B' summary—Magistrate on merits by order granting 'A' summary—Whether Magistrate had jurisdiction to consider and act on report—Magistrate whether empowered to take cognizance of offence—Whether cognizance of offence taken by Magistrate by issuing 'A' summary—What constitutes cognizance under s. 190.

On a report submitted to a Magistrate of the first class under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, by a police officer after completing investigations with reference to offences which are exclusively triable by a Special Judge under s. 7(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952, the Magistrate has jurisdiction to consider the report and grant the type of summary (as contemplated in the Police Manual) which according to him is appropriate in the circumstances of the case.

Before it could be said that a Magistrate has taken cognizance under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, it is not sufficient that he should have applied his mind to the report submitted to him by a police officer under s. 173 of the Code, but he must do something for proceeding under the subsequent provisions of the Code, e.g., under s. 200, under which the Magistrate has to examine the complainant on taking cognizance of an offence.

A police officer after completing investigation in connection with an offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, and s. 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947, submitted a report to a First Class Magistrate under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, and requested that 'B' summary may be issued in respect thereof. The Magistrate on merits passed an order granting 'A' type of summary on the report. On the question whether the Magistrate had power to consider the report and act on it, it was contended that the Magistrate was not empowered to take cognizance of the offence which was exclusively triable by a Special Judge under s. 7(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952, and that he could not take cognizance of the offence by refusing to issue 'B' summary and in issuing 'A' summary in contravention of the provisions of s. 6 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947:—

Held, that the Magistrate was not deprived of his power to take cognizance of the offence even though it was exclusively triable by a Court of a Special Judge and, therefore, the submission of the report by the police officer and his request for the issue of 'B' summary and the order passed granting 'A' summary were not without jurisdiction, that as no further proceedings were intended to be taken by the Magistrate it could not be said that the Magistrate in issuing 'A' summary had taken cognizance of the offence, and that, therefore, the order could not be challenged on the ground that it was bad as the Magistrate took cognizance of the offence without any previous sanction as contemplated under s. 6 of the Prevention of Corruption Act.

GOKHALE J. This Criminal Reference raises a point of some importance as regards the jurisdiction of a Magistrate to take action on a report submitted to him under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code, by a police officer after completing investigations with reference to offences which are exclusively triable by a Special Judge under s. 7(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952.

The present reference has been made by the learned Sessions Judge, Ahmednagar, in these circumstances: It appears that the Circle Police Officer, Rajur, investigated a case registered on the complaint of one Mr. Pahuja, Sub-Inspector of Police, Rajur, against a constable by name Khirode. It was alleged by the Sub-Inspector that the police constable attempted to give him Rs. 100 as a bribe to hush up a chapter case instituted against one Bhaui Mohana. A trap was set for the police constable, and when the amount of Rs. 100 was being attempted to be given to the sub-inspector, it was attached in the presence of the panchas. A report was made with regard to this to the District Superintendent of Police, and the Circle Police Officer was ordered to investigate the matter with regard to this complaint. On investigation, the officer, however, came to the conclusion that the panchanama made by the complainant, Sub-Inspector, Rajur, about attaching notes from the police constable Khirode was false and the complaint was also false. In accordance with these findings, the Circle Police Officer submitted a report under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Akola, and it was requested that 'B' summary may be issued in respect thereof. The learned Magistrate issued a notice to the complainant, Sub-Inspector Pahuja, who submitted a detailed report. It was contended on behalf of the complainant that the panchanama made by him on November 25, 1956, with regard to the alleged offence was true, and the two panchas had subsequently gone back on their statements later on. On these allegations, the learned Magistrate considered the question whether there was proper ground for granting 'B' summary as prayed for in the final report of the Circle Police Officer. It was contended before the learned trial Magistrate, as a preliminary ground, that he had no jurisdiction to grant 'B' summary in respect of the offence under s. 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act. That contention about jurisdiction was negatived, and the learned Magistrate came to the conclusion that his Court had jurisdiction to grant an appropriate summary which the investigation suggested. On the merits, the learned trial Magistrate came to the conclusion that he should not grant the 'B' type of summary which was sought by the Circle Police Officer, and that, under the circumstances of the case, it was proper to grant the 'A' type of summary. In accordance with these findings, he passed an order granting 'A' type of summary on the report. Against this order, there was an application for revision before the Sessions Court, which held that the learned trial Magistrate had no jurisdiction to pass orders on the report made by the police officer, as the offence in respect of which the report had been made was one exclusively triable by a Special Judge, and, therefore, the report under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code for any type of summary could be made only to a Special Judge and not to any Magistrate. The learned Sessions Judge has, therefore, made this reference recommending to this Court that the order passed by the learned trial Magistrate granting 'A' summary should be set aside as one passed without jurisdiction.

Now, this reference came up for hearing before my learned brother, who ordered that it should be referred to a Division Bench, as it raised a point of some importance.

Before us, Mr. Gumaste, learned Assistant Government Pleader, has supported the reference, and contended that the view of the Sessions Judge, that the trial Magistrate had no jurisdiction to consider the report under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code, with regard to the alleged offence, was correct. On the other hand, Mr. Nagrani, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the complainant, has contended that the trial Magistrate had jurisdiction to consider the report of the police officer made under s. 173, Criminal Procedure Code, and to grant the type of summary which, according to the Magistrate, was appropriate in the circumstances of the case.

Section 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code forms part of Chapter XIV of Part V relating to the subject of information to the police and their powers to investigate. Under s. 173(1)(a), as soon as every investigation under this chapter is completed, the officer in charge of the police station shall forward to a Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence on a police report, a report in the form prescribed by the State Government, stating the names of the parties, nature of information and the names of the persons who appear to be acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and stating also whether the accused, if arrested, has been forwarded in custody or has been released on his bond, and, if so, whether with or without sureties. It would be obvious from the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, Chapter XIV, that when a police officer is investigating a case, he would be making three different kinds of reports at three different stages of the investigation. Section 156 refers to investigation into cognizable cases, and under s. 157, the officer in charge of the police station can make a preliminary report to the Magistrate. Section 168 deals with the report of investigation by a subordinate police officer who, if he makes an investigation under Chapter XIV, must submit his report embodying the result of such investigation to the officer in charge of the police station. Section 173 requires the submission of the final report by the police officer as soon as investigations are completed. But the report has to be forwarded to a Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence on a police report. Now, the argument which found favour with the learned Sessions Judge was that the investigation by the police officer in this case being in connection with an offence under s. 161, of the Indian Penal Code and s. 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, and these offences being exclusively triable by a Special Judge under s. 7 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the Magistrate would not be empowered to take cognizance of these offences, and would not have the power to consider this report and act on it.

In order to test this argument, it is necessary to refer to the relevant provisions of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947, as well as the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952. By virtue of s. 5A of the Prevention of Corruption Act, police officers of certain ranks would be competent to investigate into cases without any sanction. In the town of Bombay, a Superintendent of Police is so competent to investigate; whereas in the mofussil, the Deputy Superintendent of Police would be similarly able to exercise powers of investigation. But police officers below the ranks of these officers shall not investigate any offence punishable under ss. 161, 165 or s. 165A, Indian Penal Code, or under sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, without the order of a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class, as the case may be; so that, an important pre-requisite of an investigation under s. 5A is that an order of a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class has to be obtained by the police officer in the first instance. There is an exception provided in the case of police officers belonging to the Delhi Special Police Establishment. But, even in that case, the police officer has not to be below the rank of an Inspector of Police and has to be specially authorized by the Inspector General of Police of the Establishment, and even then he cannot investigate the offence without an order of the Magistrate of the First Class, unless he has reasons to believe that, on account of the delay involved in obtaining the order of a Magistrate of the First Class, any valuable evidence relating to such offence is likely to be destroyed or concealed; and further in every case where he makes such investigation without such an order, the police officer concerned, has to send a report as soon as possible to a Magistrate of the First Class, together with the circumstances in which the investigation was made. Under s. 6 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, no Court can take cognizance of an offence punishable under ss. 161, 164 or 165, Indian Penal Code, or under sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Act alleged to have been committed by a public servant except with previous sanction of certain authorities who are mentioned in that section.

Under s. 6 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952, the State Government is empowered to appoint Special Judges to try offences under s. 161, 165 or 165A, Indian Penal Code, and sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, or any conspiracy to commit or any attempt to commit or any abetment of any of the offences mentioned above. Sub-section (2) of s. 6 prescribes the necessary qualifications of persons to be appointed as Special Judges. Under s. 7(1), notwithstanding anything contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure or in any other law, the offences mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 6 are triable by Special Judges only. Section 8 deals with the procedure and powers of Special Judges, and sub-s. (1) of s. 8 provides that a Special Judge may take cognizance of offences without the accused being committed to him for trial, and in trying the accused persons, shall follow the procedure prescribed by the Code of Criminal Procedure for the trial of warrant cases by Magistrates. It is clear from these provisions that Special Judges, appointed under s. 6 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, are invested with exclusive jurisdiction to try offences mentioned in s. 6, and the Special Judges are further empowered to take cognizance of these offences without the accused being committed to them for trial. Now, Mr. Nagrani contends that, though a Special Judge can take cognizance of these offences, without there being any committal proceedings, s. 8 does not deprive the Magistrates of their power to take cognizance of such offences, though they would not have the power to try these offences. According to Mr. Nagrani, the stage of trial must be distinguished from the stage of taking cognizance of an offence. The argument is that so far as the question of taking cognizance of these offences is concerned, a Magistrate as well as a Special Judge can take cognizance of these offences. In this connection, he relied on Dagdu v. Punja,¹ where it was held that

"the 'trial' of a criminal case means the proceeding which commences when the case is called on with the Magistrate on the bench, the accused in the dock and the representatives of the prosecution and defence, if the accused be defended, present in Court for the hearing of the case."

In that case, the question which arose was whether in a warrant case the trial could be said to have begun with the framing of a charge, and it was held that it was not so, and that, where a warrant case was transferred from the Court of one Magistrate to that of another after a charge had been framed, it was open to the latter to hear the case de novo, and that he was not bound to recommence the proceedings from the stage of the charge. Mr. Nagrani argues that in the present case there was no question of any trial, but the Magistrate was merely considering the report submitted to him under s. 173, Criminal Procedure Code. In this connection, a reference might be made also to s. 4(l) of the Criminal Procedure Code, which defines 'investigation' as including all proceedings under the Code for the collection of evidence conducted by a police officer or by any person, other than a Magistrate, who is authorised by a Magistrate in that behalf. Section 4(k) defines an 'inquiry' as including every inquiry other than a trial conducted under the Code by a Magistrate or Court. The terms 'investigation', 'inquiry' and 'trial' would, therefore, denote three different stages in a criminal case, and Mr. Nagrani's argument is that in cases of offences falling under s. 6 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the stage of trial alone must be conducted by a Special Judge, while there is concurrent jurisdiction as regards taking of cognizance of the offence which must precede the stage of trial.

In support of his argument, Mr. Nagrani has also relied on the provisions of s. 190(1)(b) of the Criminal Procedure Code, under which any District Magistrate or Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and any Judicial Magistrate, specially empowered in this behalf, may take cognizance of any offence upon a report in writing of such facts made by any police officer, and the argument is that under this section, a Magistrate can take cognizance of even offences mentioned in s. 6 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, upon a report submitted to him by a police officer. If that be so, Mr. Nagrani says that the learned trial Magistrate would be competent to consider and act upon the final report submitted to him by the police officer under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In our view, this argument of Mr. Nagrani is well founded.

Under s. 193 of the Criminal Procedure Code, except as otherwise expressly provided by the Code or by any other law for the time being in force, no Court of Session shall take cognizance of any offence as a Court of original jurisdiction unless the accused has been committed to it by a Magistrate duly empowered in that behalf. It is true that under s. 8(3) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the Court of a Special Judge is deemed to be a Court of Session. But under this sub-s. (3) itself, it is mentioned that it is subject to what is provided for in sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 8. As already stated, under sub-s. (1) of s. 8 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, a Special Judge is entitled to take cognizance of offences covered by s. 6 without there being any committal proceedings in the Court of a Magistrate. It seems, therefore, that so far as the Courts of Special Judges are concerned, though they are placed on the same footing as the Courts of Session, the procedure prescribed under s. 193 of the Criminal Procedure Code is not necessary to be followed in the case of these Courts. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 8 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, a Special Judge is empowered to tender a pardon to a person supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in, or privy to, an offence, with a view to obtaining the evidence of such person. This section also makes a distinction between a Court of a Special Judge and a Court of Session, because, whilst a Special Judge can himself grant pardon under s. 8(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, under s. 338 of the Criminal Procedure Code the Sessions Court has power not only to tender a pardon, but to order the committing Magistrate or the District Magistrate to tender a pardon to any person. But, though the Court of a Special Judge has itself this power of tendering a pardon conferred on it under s. 8(2), in our opinion, that would not affect the general provisions contained in s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code, regarding tender of pardon to an accomplice. Prior to 1952, under s. 337(1), there was no provision for tender of pardon to an accomplice with regard to offences under ss. 161, 165 and 165A, Indian Penal Code. By s. 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952, in the first instance and subsequently by s. 59(a) (iv) of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, XXVI of 1955, these three sections were inserted in s. 337(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code, so that, after this amendment, under s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code any Magistrate of a First Class, at any stage of the investigation or inquiry into or trial of an offence even under these three sections, is empowered to tender a pardon. Under the proviso to s. 337(1) as amended in Bombay, when the offence is under enquiry or trial, no Magistrate of the First Class shall exercise this power unless he is the Magistrate making the inquiry or holding the trial, and when the offence is under investigation, a Magistrate can grant pardon only with the sanction of the Sessions Judge. (See s. 2 of Bombay Act XXIII of 1951). Under sub-s. (2) of s. 337, every person accepting a tender under this section, shall be examined as a witness in the Court of a Magistrate taking cognizance of the offence and in the subsequent trial, if any, sub-s. (2A) refers to the powers of a Magistrate, before whom the proceedings are pending, to commit the accused for trial to the Court of Session, in every case where an accomplice has accepted a tender of pardon and has been examined under sub-s. (2), provided the Magistrate is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the accused is guilty of the offence, alleged to have been committed by him. Then comes sub-s. (2B) of s. 337, which was in the first instance inserted by s. 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952, and subsequently by s. 59(b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act XXVI of 1955, and that sub-s. (2B) runs as follows:

"(2B) In every case where the offence is punishable under section 161 or section 163 or section 165A of the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860) or sub-section (2) of section 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947 (II of 1947), and where a person has accepted a tender of pardon and has been examined under sub-section (2), then, notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (2A), the Magistrate shall, without making any further inquiry, send the case for trial to the Court of the Special Judge appointed under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1952 (XLVI of 1952)."

Now, this sub-section which is newly added can not have reference to pending cases only for which provision had been made under s. 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, which provided that all cases triable by a Special Judge under s. 7 which, immediately before the commencement of the Act, were pending before any Magistrate shall, on such commencement, be forwarded for trial to the Special Judge having jurisdiction over such cases; so that, under s. 10, all cases which were pending before any Magistrate before the commencement of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and which were exclusively triable by a Court of a Special Judge, were to be forwarded for trial to such Courts. Now, sub-s. (2B) of s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code contemplates that in cases where an offence is triable by a Court of a Special Judge, and where a pardon has been tendered to an accomplice and he has been examined under sub-s. (2), then, notwithstanding the requirement of sub-s. (2A) to commit the accused for trial to the Court of Session, the Magistrate has to send the accused for trial to the Court of a Special Judge without making any further inquiry. This provision is perfectly consistent with s. 8(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act which, as already stated, enables the Court of a Special Judge to take cognizance of an offence without any committal proceedings. But the important thing to be noted is that under sub-s. (2B) of s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code, a Magistrate has not only the power to tender a pardon to an accomplice, but would have the power to examine him under sub-s. (2) even in respect of the offences triable exclusively by a Court of a Special Judge. This would support the contention of Mr. Nagrani that a Magistrate is not deprived of his power to take cognizance of an offence even though it is exclusively triable by a Court of a Special Judge.

In the Police Manual, Vol. III, p. 176, under r. 202, the reports required by s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code to be submitted on the completion of an investigation are classified under two heads: (i) charge sheets which are to be in form C.P.C. 20, and (ii) final reports in form C.P.C. 19. Under sub-r. (2) of r. 202, the police are directed to send a charge-sheet to the Magistrate directly when there is sufficient evidence to justify the sending of the accused person to a Magistrate. Rule 203, at p. 178, deals with the submission of final reports and provides that when there is no sufficient evidence to justify the forwarding of the accused to a Magistrate, the Police Station Officer or the investigating officer will release the accused person on bail, if he is in custody, and submit a final report to the Magistrate requesting to classify the case and issue an appropriate summary of his order. Now, these summaries are of three kinds: "A" type of summary would be issued where the Magistrate classifies the case as true but undetected, and the Police Manual explains this as "where there is no clue whatsoever about the culprits or property or where the accused is known but there is no evidence to justify his being sent up to the Magistrate for trial." "B" type of summary would be issued where the Magistrate classifies the case as maliciously false; and "C" type of summary is issued where the case is classified as neither true nor false which is explained in the Police Manual, as for example being "due to mistake of facts or being of a civil nature." Now, as already stated, under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code, a Magistrate specially empowered in this behalf may take cognizance of any offence upon a report in writing by any police officer. There is no dispute about the learned trial Magistrate in this case having the powers under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code. If that be so, the submission of the report by the police officer in this case to the learned trial Magistrate, and his request for the issue of B summary and the order passed granting 'A' summary could not be said to be without jurisdiction.

But it is contended by Mr. Gumaste, learned Assistant Government Pleader, that even assuming that this submission of the final report under s. 178 of the Criminal Procedure Code to the learned trial Magistrate was not bad, the Magistrate, in fact, took cognizance of the offence in refusing to issue "B" summary and in issuing "A" summary, and his order, would, therefore, according to Mr. Gumaste, be illegal under s. 6 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, under which no Court can take cognizance of an offence punishable under s. 161, 164 or 165, Indian Penal Code, or under sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, without obtaining the requisite previous sanction of the authorities mentioned in that section. The next question, therefore, is whether, in fact, the learned trial Magistrate has taken cognizance of the offence mentioned in the report submitted by the police officer. It is true that the order passed by the learned trial Magistrate issuing "A" summary, as contemplated under the provisions of the Police Manual, is not an administrative order but a judicial order. See *Emperor v. Bajaji Appaji*². But the mere fact that in issuing "A" summary he has passed a judicial order would not necessarily mean that he has taken cognizance of the offence referred to in the report. The police officer prayed for the issue of "B" summary on the ground that the complaint was maliciously false. If the learned trial Magistrate had, in fact, accepted the request of the police officer and granted the "B" summary, it is difficult to appreciate how it could have been said that he had taken cognizance of any offence. Mr. Gumaste has contended, however, that even if he had granted the "B" summary, still, it would be taking cognizance of the offence mentioned in the report, and he further contends that the learned trial Magistrate having given the "A" type of summary, he classified the case as true but undetected, and, therefore, he took cognizance of the offence which was the subject-matter of an investigation by the police. In this connection, Mr. Gumaste, in support of his argument has referred to two cases. In Emperor v. Baburao Tatyarao,³ it was held that the expression "taking cognizance of an offence" in s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code dealt with a matter of a purely technical nature; and that cognizance was usually taken upon complaint when process was issued, but no restricted interpretation could be given to that expression in the consideration of the character of the action of a Magistrate at any particular stage of the proceeding before him. It was further held that cognizance was taken by the Magistrate in that case upon issue of process before evidence was recorded. Reliance is also placed by Mr. Gumaste on another decision of this Court reported in *Boywalla v. Sorab Engineer*⁴, in which the facts were that a complaint was made to the police regarding an offence under s. 420, Indian Penal Code, on which the police started investigation, arrested the accused and released him on bail. Subsequently, the police applied to a Magistrate to have the bail enlarged, which was done. After further investigation into the matter, a report was sent by the police to the Magistrate that no offence was disclosed, whereupon the Magistrate discharged the accused and cancelled his bail bond. Then he in his turn filed a complaint against the original complainant for the offence under s. 211, Indian Penal Code, and it was held by this Court that, in doing what he had done (in the prior proceedings) the Magistrate had taken cognizance of the case under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code, and that, therefore, under the provisions of s. 195(b) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, it was that Magistrate alone who could lodge the complaint for an offence punishable under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code. That case, however, can be distinguished on its own facts. There, on a complaint, the accused was actually arrested and released on bail, and, subsequently, the police had applied to the Magistrate to have the bail enlarged. Upon a further report by the police, the Magistrate held that no offence was disclosed and passed an order of discharge, and this is what Sir John Beaumont, C.J. observed at pp. 532-533:

"...Where, in the case of a man who has been arrested and released on bail the police officer reports that there appears to be no case, and invites the Magistrate to discharge the man, the Magistrate is not bound to act upon the police view. He can undoubtedly say: 'I will have a further inquiry in this matter. I think the police are wrong in suggesting that the accused should be discharged.' And he may direct further investigation. On the other hand, I have no doubt that he may say: 'I have no reason for thinking that the report of this police-officer, who is a responsible person, is wrong and if he tells me that after investigation he thinks there is no case, I will do as he suggests and discharge the accused.' But in either case the Magistrate is taking cognizance of the case. He cannot discharge the accused, or direct a further investigation, unless he first takes cognizance."

And Sir John Beaumont expressed the view that in discharging the accused, the Magistrate was making an order similar in character to the order which he could make under s. 203, Criminal Procedure Code, where he acts on a report of the police or an investigation undertaken at his request.

The Criminal Procedure Code has not defined the expression "take cognizance". But it appears clear on decided cases that taking of cognizance is a different thing from initiation of proceedings. The Magistrate may apply his mind and consider a report submitted to him by the police officer under s. 173, Criminal Procedure Code; but, before it could be said that he has taken cognizance under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it is not sufficient that he should have applied his mind to the report, but he must do something for proceeding under the subsequent provisions of the Code, for example, under s. 200, under which the Magistrate has to examine the complainant on taking cognizance of an offence. In Legal Remembrancer v. Abani Kumar,⁵ it was held that:

"Before it can be said that any Magistrate has taken cognizance of any offence under s. 190(1)(a), he must not only have applied his mind to the contents of the petition, but he must have done so for the purpose of proceeding in a particular way as indicated in the subsequent provisions of the Chapter. When the Magistrate applies his mind not for the purpose of proceeding under the subsequent sections of the Chapter, but for taking action of some other kind, e.g., ordering investigation under s. 156(3), or issuing a search warrant for the purpose of the investigation, he cannot be said to have taken cognizance of the offence."

Now, this view of the Calcutta High Court has been approved by the Supreme Court in R. B. Chari v. The State of Uttar Pradesh,⁶ where their Lordships of the Supreme Court were concerned with a case where the police had applied for a warrant of arrest of the accused for an offence punishable under s. 161 or 165, Indian Penal Code. Under s. 3 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947, such an offence is a cognizable offence for the purpose of the Criminal Procedure Code, subject to the condition that the police officers below the rank of officers mentioned in s. 5A cannot investigate without an order of the Magistrate of the First Class, or make an arrest without a warrant, and, it was held by the Supreme Court that, when the police applied for a warrant of arrest during investigation under s. 3, and the Magistrate issued a warrant, he could not be deemed to have taken cognizance of the case under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and, therefore, the fact that sanction of Government under s. 197 of the Code had not been obtained before the warrant was issued would not vitiate the trial. That case, therefore, clearly shows that, where a Magistrate applies his mind only for ordering investigation under s. 5A of the Prevention of Corruption Act, or issues a warrant on the application by the police for the purpose of investigation, the Magistrate is not taking cognizance of the offence. In our opinion, the present case would fall within the principle laid down in this case. All that was done by the police officer here was to submit a report under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and the police wanted the Magistrate to issue a "B" summary, classifying the complaint as maliciously false. In fact, the officer did not want the Magistrate to take any further action on the report. It was open to the Magistrate to grant that type of summary. It was also open to the Magistrate to differ from the view of the police, and, in fact, in this case, the trial Magistrate chose to classify the case as fit for the issue of "A" summary. But, since no further proceedings were intended to be taken, it cannot be said that the learned trial Magistrate in issuing "A" summary had taken cognizance of the offence. In these circumstances, the order of the trial Magistrate cannot be challenged on the ground that it was bad, as he took cognizance of an offence without any previous sanction as contemplated under s. 6 of the Prevention of Corruption Act.

Then Mr. Gumaste has contended that the order of the learned trial Magistrate is wrong on merits. According to Mr. Gumaste, if the Magistrate, after applying his mind to the report submitted to him, came to the conclusion that the allegations were true but the offence was undetected, the latter part of the finding would not be correct in the particular circumstances of this case. Now, this reference was made by the learned Sessions Judge purely on the point of law as to whether the learned trial Magistrate had jurisdiction to consider the report submitted to him under s. 173, Criminal Procedure Code. The Sessions Court has not given any consideration to the merits of the order of the trial Magistrate, which, under the rulings of this Court, is a judicial order. We do not, therefore, propose to express any opinion on the merits of the order passed by the learned trial Magistrate.

The result is that we do not accept the reference, but direct that the papers should be sent down to the Sessions Court to dispose of the Criminal Revision Application on merits.

SHAH J. The plaintiff filed Special Civil Suit No. 188 of 1951 in the Court of the 2nd Joint Civil Judge, Senior Division, of Poona, for a declaration that the partnership between him and the defendant stands dissolved on July 29, 1951, or from the date determined by the Court, for an account of the partnership and for a decree for the amount that may be found due on taking such accounts and for costs of the suit. The plaintiff valued the claim at Rs. 10,500 for purposes of court-fee and jurisdiction. The defendant denied the partnership set up by the plaintiff and denied liability to account. The learned trial Judge passed a decree declaring that the business referred to in the plaint was carried on by the parties to the suit in partnership and each party had a half share in the profit and loss in the business thereof. He declared the partnership as dissolved from the date of his order, and appointed a commissioner for taking accounts for determining the amount, if any, due to the plaintiff. Against that decree this appeal has been preferred by the defendant and the defendant has valued the claim for purposes of court-fee and advocate's fee at Rs. 200. The office of the Registrar, when the appeal was filed, raised an objection about the adequacy of the court-fee paid on the memorandum of appeal. The defendant explained that he was entitled to value the claim, in an appeal from a decree for accounts, by virtue of the provision contained in s. 7(v) (f) of the Court-fees Act, at any arbitrary figure he chose and he was not bound in appeal by the valuation made by the plaintiff. The office of the Registrar accepted the contention raised by the defendant and registered the appeal. At the hearing of the appeal an objection has been raised about the valuation of the appeal for purposes of court-fee.

Admittedly, in the trial Court the plaintiff had valued the claim at a consolidated amount of Rs. 10,500 for a declaration and for dissolution of the partnership and for accounts. The reliefs for declaration and for dissolution were however purely incidental to the claim for accounts. Section 7(v) (f) of the Court-fees Act, in so far as it is material, provides:

"The amount of fee payable under this Act in the suits next hereinafter mentioned shall be computed as follows:

(iv) In suits—...

(f) for accounts—according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the plaint or memorandum of appeal, and in all such suits, the plaintiff shall state the amount at which he values the relief sought."

The plaintiff, as we have already stated, valued the claim, at Rs. 10,500. By s. 8 of the Suits Valuation Act, this valuation became determinative of the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the suit. In the trial Court the defendant did not contend that the valuation made by the plaintiff was arbitrary, and defended the suit on the merits. By the decree it was declared that there was, in fact, a partnership and an account of the partnership was directed. In this appeal the defendant seeks to value the claim for court-fee at Rs. 200. The question which then falls to be determined is whether when the plaintiff has made a valuation of a suit for accounts and the defendant has not challenged that valuation in the Court of first instance, it is open to the defendant in filing an appeal to alter that valuation? In suits governed by s. 7(v) (f) of the Court-fees Act, the plaintiff has to value the relief claimed by him. That value placed by the plaintiff for purposes of court-fee in suits for accounts becomes determinative of the jurisdiction of the Court. There is no express provision in the Court-fees Act which justifies the defendant in altering the valuation made by the plaintiff which is determinative of the value of the subject-matter of the suit for purposes of court-fee. But it is urged by Mr. Lalit, who appears on behalf of the defendant, that when the plaintiff is given under the provisions of the Court-fees Act an option to value the subject-matter of the suit for accounts, the exercise of that option enures only during the suit and after a decree is passed by the Court which tries the suit it is open to the defendant to alter the valuation and value the subject-matter at any amount which in his view is the true value. Mr. Lalit contends that to hold otherwise would enable the plaintiff in a possible case to make an arbitrary and exaggerated valuation of the subject-matter and hold the defendant bound by that valuation in the subsequent proceeding, in the court of appeal. This, Mr. Lalit contends, may work injustice by compelling the defendant to pay an excessive court-fee on a claim which is exaggerated.

We are unable to accept the contention raised by Mr. Lalit. If the subject-matter of any suit has been wrongly valued by the plaintiff, it is open to the defendant to apply to the Court to correct that valuation. If, however, the defendant does not raise a contention in the trial Court that the valuation made by the plaintiff is exaggerated and chooses to join issue on the merits of the case, it will not, in our judgment, be open to him after a decree is passed against him to contend that the valuation made by the plaintiff was exaggerated. In any event, in our judgment, once the valuation of the subject-matter is fixed by the plaintiff by valuing the claim for purposes of court-fee in the manner permitted to him by the Legislature, that valuation of the subject-matter must, in the absence of any provision justifying a departure, enure for the entire proceeding in the suit, and if the defendant desires to challenge the whole decree passed by the trial Court, the defendant must accept that valuation.

The view we have expressed has been taken by a majority of the High Courts in India. According to the High Court of Madras, in a suit for accounts of a partnership the valuation made by the plaintiff is binding upon the defendant when the defendant appeals against the whole decree passed by the Court of first instance directing an account to be taken (see Samiya Mavali v. Minammal,¹ Srinivasachari v. Perindevamma,² and *Dhanukodi In re*³). The view taken by the Madras High Court has also been approved by this Court in *Pochalal v. Umedram*⁴. In that case Mr. Justice Fawcett and Mr. Justice Baker following the decision in Srinivasachari's case held that the defendant in an appeal against a preliminary decree for account, was not, having denied liability to account, competent to alter the valuation of the subject-matter made by the plaintiff. With this view Mr. Justice Mirza did not agree.

The same view was also taken by the Nagpur High Court in *Sheoram v. Atmaram*⁵. Mr. Lalit contends that the view taken by the Madras High Court and followed by this Court and the Nagpur High Court is inconsistent with the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in *Faizullah Khan v. Mauladad Khan*⁶. That was a case in which the plaintiff claiming a decree for accounts of a partnership between him and the defendant valued the claim in the Court of first instance at Rs. 3,000 and paid court-fee on that valuation. The defendant denied liability and claimed that at the foot of the account he was entitled to recover a sum exceeding Rs. 29,000 from the plaintiff and he counter-claimed that amount. The Court of first instance passed a decree against the plaintiffs for Rs. 19,991. In filing the appeal to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, the plaintiffs valued the claim for court-fee at Rs. 19,991 at the same time explaining that the claim was for reversal of the decree against them and for a decree in their favour for the amount claimed. The Judicial Commissioner set aside the decree and remanded the case observing that the plaintiffs having failed to pay court-fee on their original claim of Rs. 3,000 were, if they succeeded in the suit on remand, entitled to have the decree in favour of the defendant vacated but not a decree in their favour on their initial claim. Their Lordships of the Privy Council disagreed with this view and held that the court-fee paid on a valuation of Rs. 19,991 sufficiently covered the appeal as a whole including the claim of the defendants on the one hand, and the smaller claim of the plaintiffs on the other. We are unable to appreciate how this decision has any bearing on the question whether the defendant in an appeal against a preliminary decree for an account against him is entitled to alter the valuation initially made by the plaintiff in the suit. This question did not fall to be determined before their Lordships of the Privy Council. Mr. Lalit also contended that in a subsequent judgment of this Court a view different from the one which was expressed in Pochalal's case has been expressed; and Mr. Lalit placed reliance on Vershi v. Kaku.⁷ That was a case which was decided by Mr. Justice Murphy and Mr. Justice Sen. It does not appear that Mr. Justice Murphy dealt with the question of court-fee. Mr. Justice Sen alone dealt with the question of court-fee payable on the memorandum of appeal. In that case the subject-matter of the suit was valued in the trial Court by the plaintiff at Rs. 5,450 and a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed to the High Court and valued the claim at Rs. 200 and counsel for the plaintiffs raised an objection to the maintainability of the appeal without payment of court-fee on a valuation of Rs. 5,450. Mr. Justice Sen relying upon the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Faizullah Khan v. Mauladad Khan and following the judgment of the Madras High Court Venkatanandam, In re⁸ held that the decision in Pochalal v. Umedram must be held to be over-ruled by the Privy Council. We may observe that the decision in Venkatanandam In re has been over-ruled by the subsequent judgment of the same High Court, in Dhanukodi In re to which we have already referred, and the observation of the Privy Council in Faizullah Khan's case have no bearing on the question which falls to be decided before us. We, therefore, with respect, cannot agree with the view taken by Mr. Justice Sen in Vershi v. Kaku.

Our attention was also invited to a judgment of the Patna High Court in Deoji Goa v. Tricumji Jivan Das.⁹ In our view that case does not support the contention raised by Mr. Lalit but goes against his contention. The majority view of the full bench was that in a case falling under s. 7(iv)(f) of the Court-fees Act, the defendant preferring an appeal from the preliminary decree should not be permitted to value his appeal at anything less than the valuation in the plaint (provided of course that he is appealing from the whole decree), unless he can demonstrate that there is a valid ground for holding that the plaint was deliberately overvalued.

It is true that the Rangoon High Court in *C. K. Ummar v. C. K. Ali Ummar*¹⁰ and the Allahabad High Court in *Chunni Lal v. Sheo Charan Lal, Lalman*¹¹ appear to have taken the view that the defendant is not bound by the valuation made by the plaintiff in a suit for accounts when he appeals against a preliminary decree passed against him, and he is at liberty to value the appeal, for court-fee, at an amount which may seem to him to be approximately correct. We have carefully considered the grounds which appealed to the Court in Chunni Lal v. Sheo Charan Lal, Lalman, and C. K. Ummar v. C. K. Ali Ummar, and we are of the view that having regard to the phraseology used in s. 7(iv)(f) of the Court-fees Act, the privilege of fixing the value of the subject-matter of a suit for accounts is with the plaintiff and it is not open to the defendant in an appeal against the preliminary decree for accounts to alter the valuation made by the plaintiff of the subject-matter for purposes of court-fee. On that view, we must hold that the defendant has not paid adequate court-fee on the memorandum of appeal.

We adjourn the hearing for one month and call upon the defendant to pay the court-fee payable by him on the memorandum of appeal.

Order accordingly.

SUPREME COURT

Present: The Hon'ble Mr. Harilal J. Kania, Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Mehr Chand Mahajan and Mr. Justice Chandrasekhara Aiyar.

GEOFFREY MANNERS & CO. LTD. v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Secs. 486, 487, 482—Person accused of affixing counterfeit mark—Whether such person can be held guilty of offences under ss. 486, 487 and 482 where existence of genuine mark or goods of true nature not proved.

Sections 482, 486 and 487 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, require that before a person can be held guilty of affixing a counterfeit mark or to have affixed a false mark on a receptacle containing goods of a "quality or nature different from the real nature," there must be proof of the existence of some genuine mark or goods of the true nature.

THE facts appear at 53 Bombay Law Reporter 112.

E. C. Ormond, with H. J. Unrigar, for the appellants.

C. K. Daphtary, Advocate General of Bombay, with G. N. Joshi, for the respondent.

KANIA C.J. This is an appeal from a judgment and order of the High Court at Bombay convicting the appellants under s. 6 of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act (hereafter referred to as the Act) and s. 486 of the Indian Penal Code, in respect of a toilet preparation described as "Anne French, cleansing milk" with a label affixed thereon. The relevant facts are these. The first appellant company is a private limited company, having its registered office in Bombay. Appellants Nos. 2 and 3 are the directors of the company. They were original accused Nos. 1, 2 and 5. On June 7, 1949, Dr. Dhume, Deputy Director of Industries, Department of Industries, Bombay, filed a complaint against the three appellants and two other directors of the first appellant company alleging that amongst the articles manufactured in Bombay by the accused was a facial cream called Anne French Cleansing Milk which was sold by the accused in bottles with a label on which was printed:

"Anne French
Cleansing Milk
4, Old Bond St. London W1."

The label nowhere stated that the preparation contained in the bottle was produced in India. It was contended that on the contrary the whole get-up and descriptive words on the label were fraudulently intended and calculated to suggest that the bottle contained a preparation manufactured in England. The accused were selling the said preparation with the above described label through various stores, inter alia, in Bombay. One of the bottles sold by a retail dealer was purchased by Dr. Dhume on May 30, 1949, with the said label and description. The complainant, therefore, charged the accused with applying false trade description to the goods, e.g. Anne French Cleansing Milk, by affixing on the bottle containing their said preparation a label with the description fraudulently intended and calculated to convey that the said preparation was made in London whereas in fact it was manufactured in India and further selling the said goods with the aforesaid false trade description. A process was issued against all the accused and on November 4, 1949, the Magistrate framed the charge. Dr. Dhume, the shop-keeper from whom he had purchased the bottle and a Drug Inspector gave evidence. The Magistrate, on a consideration of the evidence, acquitted all the accused. The State of Bombay filed an appeal and the High Court reversed the acquittal and by their judgment dated September 13, 1950, convicted the three appellants under ss. 6 and 7 of the Act and also under ss. 482, 486 and 487 of the Indian Penal Code. The High Court passed the sentence of one month's rigorous imprisonment on accused *Decided, May 11, 1951. Criminal Appeal No. 24 of 1950.

Nos. 2 and 5 (appellants Nos. 2 and 3) and a fine of Rs. 200 under s. 6 of the Act and a sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000 under s. 486 of the Indian Penal Code. They did not pass any separate sentences under s. 7 of the Act or ss. 482 and 487 of the Penal Code in view of s. 71 of the Code. The substantive sentences were directed to run concurrently and substantive sentences were passed in default of payment of fine. As regards the company, a fine of Rs. 200 under s. 6 of the Act and Rs. 1,000 under s. 486 of the Indian Penal Code was imposed. The appeals against accused Nos. 3 and 4 were kept pending. Under the powers reserved to it under s. 14 of the Act the Court further ordered the three accused against whom it passed the sentence to pay the costs of the proceedings. The Court directed warrants to issue in pursuance of their judgment. In terms of that order, the writs were issued on the same day. When the transcript of the oral judgment was seen, counsel for the accused and also for the State saw the learned senior Judge in his chambers and desired that if the judgment was not signed they would like the matter to be mentioned in Court so far as the liability of the directors, viz. appellants Nos. 2 and 3, was concerned. The Judge doubted the jurisdiction of the Court to make any alteration or review of its judgment after it was pronounced in a criminal case on the Appellate Side of the High Court but allowed the matter to be argued on October 18, 1950. The Court held¹ that it had no power to alter or review its judgment. The Court, however, granted a certificate that it was a fit case for appeal to the Supreme Court. The appellants have thereupon come in appeal.

The sections under which appellants Nos. 2 and 3 stood their trial all required a guilty intention on their part. Apart from the fact that appellants Nos. 2 and 3 were directors of the first appellant company there was no evidence on record to prove their guilty intention. In the judgment delivered by the Court on October 18, 1950, this point was noticed and the Court observed:

"Therefore on the record as it stood, we would probably not have confirmed the order of acquittal but having set it aside we might either have remanded the case for fresh trial or we might ourselves have asked for fresh evidence to be recorded and certified to us."

The observations from the High Court judgment, quoted above, indicate that if the High Court had the power to review it would not have convicted appellants Nos. 2 and 3 as it had done in its first judgment. The further observations that the Court would have either remanded the matter for fresh trial or directed that additional evidence may be recorded and sent to the High Court overlook the fact that the prosecution had full opportunity to lead evidence before the Magistrate and no question of taking additional evidence to supplement the lacuna in the evidence already led could be deemed to arise. If the prosecution had omitted to prove the guilty intention of the two directors, as required by the sections under which they were charged, it will not be proper to allow them to supplement the evidence at a later stage about twenty months after the prosecution had started. In view of this state of the record, the Advocate-General of Bombay quite properly could not sustain the judgment of the High Court against them on the evidence recorded by the trial Court. The result is that the conviction of appellants Nos. 2 and 3 must be quashed and the sentences passed against them must be set aside. The order of costs made against them must also be revoked.

As regards the first appellant company, the position is this. It is not disputed that the company had manufactured in India the "cleansing milk" and had sold the same in bottles with the label in question. Sections 6 and 7 of the Act run as follows:—

Section 6. "If a person applies a false trade description to goods, he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, and unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, and in the case of a second or subsefactured in England. It was suggested that a trade mark may contain the name of a town or country, and a trade mark may be the trade mark of a manufacturer or of a dealer. It was, therefore, argued that the fact of an address being printed on a label does not amount to a description of the place in which the goods were made or produced. In our opinion, the question whether the description does or does not mean a statement of that kind is a question of fact depending on what is exactly stated in the document in question, the manner in which it is stated and also the goods in relation to which it has been stated. On such questions another judicial decision is hardly an authority as it is almost impossible to have the same facts in two cases. When evidence was given before the Magistrate no alternate suggestion was put forth on behalf of the accused and it was not suggested that any other construction was proper or even plausible. The contention that the address may be a part of the trade mark of the producer or a dealer depends on the facts proved in each case and in the absence of any evidence on record we are unable to take into consideration hypothetical questions which may arise on different facts. In our opinion, the High Court was right in its conclusion that the description "4 Old Bond St. London W1" printed on the label with the various things printed thereon when considered along with the fact that this is a toilet preparation, indirectly means a description as to the place and country in which the goods were made or produced. Unless, therefore, the first defendant company proved facts sufficient to bring its defence within one of the exceptions, it is guilty of an offence under s. 6 of the Act.

It was faintly suggested that there was no evidence about the company "applying" the false trade description to goods. This was based on the absence of affirmative evidence led by the Crown to prove that it was the company which had glued the labels on the bottles. In our opinion it is not necessary even in a criminal case to prove that fact by positive affirmative evidence alone. This fact like others can equally be proved by circumstantial evidence. The company has admitted that the goods contained in the bottle have been prepared by it and that it is selling the goods with the labels in question which were printed in India. The contention that the fact of gluing the labels on the bottles is not proved under the circumstances, in our opinion, has no substance. A limited company has no arms to apply the glue to the labels; it must work through some agent and representative. Therefore, the work of gluing the labels on the bottles may be done by a contractor or a clerk or a peon or workmen of the company or its contractors under the directions of the company. In our opinion, the requirements of the section, on the evidence on record, are fully complied with. In our opinion, therefore, the conviction of appellant No. 1 under s. 6 of the Act is correct. We see no reason to differ from that conclusion or to disturb in any way the order of fine based on that conviction.

In our opinion the sentence passed under s. 486 of the Indian Penal Code is not justified on the facts. The different sections of the Penal Code under which the High Court convicted the accused require one important factor. To hold any of the accused guilty of affixing a counterfeit mark or to have affixed a false mark on a receptacle containing goods of a "quality or nature different from the real nature", there must be proof of the existence of some genuine mark or goods of the true nature, because without such proof the requirements of the sections are not complied with. The evidence on record does not show the existence of any such genuine mark or different true article. We, therefore, think that the High Court erred in convicting the accused under the different sections of the Penal Code or s. 7 of the Act. We, therefore, set aside the conviction and sentence passed on appellant No. 1 in respect of all charges except s. 6 of the Act. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, in our opinion, this is not a fit case in which the accused should be ordered to pay the costs of the prosecution and that order of the High Court is, therefore, also set aside.

quent conviction with imprisonment which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Section 7. "If a person sells or exposes or has in possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things to which a false trade description is applied ...he shall, unless he proves—

(a) that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this section, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade description, ...and

(b) that, on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things; or

(c) that otherwise he had acted innocently,

be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, and in case of a second or subsequent conviction with imprisonment which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both."

Section 486 of the Indian Penal Code, under which the appellant company was convicted and fined, runs as follows:—

"Whoever sells, or exposes, or has in possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things with a counterfeit trade mark or property mark affixed to or impressed upon the same or to or upon any case, package or other receptacle in which such goods are contained, shall, unless he proves—

(a) that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this section, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the mark, and

(b) that, on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things, or

(c) that otherwise he had acted innocently,

be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both."

It is clear that to sustain a conviction under s. 6 of the Act it is necessary to prove that there was a "false trade description". That expression is defined in s. 2(3) as follows:—

"'false trade description' means a trade description which is untrue in a material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied, and includes every alteration of a trade description, whether by way of addition, effacement or otherwise, where that alteration makes the description untrue in a material respect, and the fact that a trade description is a trade mark or part of a trade mark shall not prevent such trade description from being a false trade description within the meaning of this Act."

The expression 'trade description' is defined in s. 2(2)(b), the relevant part of which runs as follows:—

"'trade description' means any description, statement or other indication, direct or indirect—...

(b) as to the place or country in which, or the time at which any goods were made or produced"...

On behalf of the Government it is contended that in the absence of any explanation, the statement "4 Old Bond St. London W1" considered in the position in which it has been printed on the label directly, and in any event indirectly, makes it a description as to the place or country in which the goods were made or produced, and as the goods contained in the bottles were admittedly produced in India, that trade description is untrue in a material respect as regards the goods. The Government, therefore, contend that they have established that the company had applied a false trade description to the goods. The burden of proving the exception in s. 6 is on the company and no attempt has been made to prove it. It was, therefore, contended that the conviction of the company is correct and must be sustained.

On behalf of the company it was firstly argued that the description on the label does not necessarily convey that the contents of the bottles were manu-

SARASWATI PRINTING PRESS v. THE COMMISSIONER OF SALES-TAX, EASTERN DIVISION, NAGPUR.*

Hyderabad General Sales Tax Act, 1950, Sec. 2(m), Explan. I(i)—Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules, 1950, r. 5(3)—Constitution of India, Seventh Sch. List II, item 54—Whether s. 2(m), Explan. Section 2(m), Explanation I, cl. Rule 5(3) of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules, 1950, is ultra vires the Constitution of India as it is arbitrary and not based upon any rational basis.

Where a printing press itself purchases stationery and does printing work upon it and supplies the product to its constituents for a price, the transaction of the press with its constituents amounts to a sale of a commercial commodity viz. the printed stationery.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

H. G. Vaishnav and K. B. Deshpande, for the petitioner.

R. J. Joshi, instructed by Little and Co., for the opponents.

VYAS J. This is an application under art. 226 of the Constitution of India by the petitioner press, Messrs. Saraswati Printing Press, wherein the petitioner has prayed for the setting aside of the order dated September 7, 1956, of the Hyderabad Sales Tax Tribunal, by which order the Tribunal confirmed the order dated July 22, 1955, passed by the Deputy Commissioner, Sales Tax, Hyderabad.

The circumstances which have given rise to this application may be briefly stated. The Marathawada Prakashan Limited, a public limited company, which was registered under the Hyderabad Companies Act, was running a printing press known by the name of the Saraswati Printing Press. This press is situated in Aurangabad. The above-mentioned public limited company sold this press to Messrs. Parmanand Bapuji Muley on March 1, 1954. The petitioner press contends that it accepts contracts for printing works and for the supply of printed goods. On March 10, 1955, the Sales Tax Authority under the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Act took accounts of the petitioner press for the years 1950-51, 1951-52, 1952-53 and 1953-54. The Authority found that for the years 1950-51 and 1952-53, the turnover of the press was not of such an amount as to make it chargeable to sales tax. However, the Authority found that the turnover of the press for the years 1951-52 and 1953-54 was chargeable to sales tax. Accordingly, the Authority made an assessment order on March 31, 1955, charging the petitioner press to sales tax for its turnover for the years 1951-52 and 1953-54. The assessment order was communicated on the same day (March 31, 1955) to the petitioner press. The petitioner press appealed from that order to the Deputy Commissioner, Sales Tax. The Deputy Commissioner modified the order of the Authority. The Deputy Commissioner treated the printing work done by the petitioner press as works contract under the Act and allowed a reduction of 30 per cent. on the total turnover on the ground that the said 30 per cent. represented the cost of labour involved in the printing work. Due to this reduction of 30 per cent., the turnover for the year 1953-54 went down so low that it did not become chargeable. After the reduction of 30 per cent., the turnover for the year 1951-52 only remained chargeable to sales tax. From this order made in appeal by the Deputy Commissioner, Sales Tax, the petitioner press made a second appeal to the Sales Tax Tribunal of the Hyderabad State. The Sales Tax Tribunal rejected the petitioner's appeal on September 1, 1956. It is these orders of the Sales Tax Tribunal and the Deputy Commissioner, Sales Tax, made by them on September 9, 1956, and July 22, 1955, respectively, that are sought to be quashed by the petitioner in this application.

Now, the learned advocate Mr. Deshpande appearing for the petitioner press has raised the following contentions before us:

(1) Section 2, cl. (m), Explanation I, cl. (i), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Act, 1950, and r. 5, sub-r. (3), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules framed under the Act were ultra vires the legislative competence of the Legislature of the former State of Hyderabad.

(2) The provisions of r. 5, sub-r. (3), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules are ultra vires the Constitution, in that they are arbitrary and not based upon any rational basis.

(3) Even if the Court holds that s. 2, cl. (m), Explanation I, cl. (i), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Act, 1950, and r. 5, sub-r. (3) of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules, 1950, were intra vires the legislative competence of the Hyderabad State Legislature and the Constitution respectively, even so the petitioner's case would be covered by cl. (iv) of Explanation I to s. 2, cl. (m) of the Act, and

(4) The supply of the printed material to the customers by the petitioner press would not amount to a sale of goods and, therefore, the turnover which would result from the said supply would not be chargeable to sales tax.

Now, so far as the first point out of the points raised by Mr. Deshpande is concerned, Mr. Deshpande's contention is that the provisions of s. 2, cl. (m), Explanation I, cl. (i), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Act and r. 5, sub-r. (3), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules were ultra vires the legislative competence of the State Legislature, in so far as they were hit by item No. 54 of List II mentioned in the VIIth Schedule to the Constitution. Section 2, cl. (m) of the Act provides that "turnover" means the aggregate amount for which goods are either bought by or sold by a dealer, whether for cash or for deferred payment or other valuable consideration. Explanation I, cl. (i) at the foot of s. 2, cl. (m) provides:

"Subject to such conditions and restrictions, if any, as may be prescribed in this behalf, the amount for which goods are sold shall, in relation to a works contract, be deemed to be the amount payable to the dealer for carrying out such contract, less such portion as may be prescribed of such amount representing the usual proportion of the cost of labour to the cost of materials used in carrying out such contract."

Rule 5, sub-r. (3) of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules, 1950, provides:

"For the purpose of sub-rule (1) the amount for which goods are sold by a dealer shall in relation to works contract be deemed to be the amount payable to the dealer for carrying out such contract less a sum not exceeding such percentage of the amount payable as may be fixed by the Commissioner from time to time for different areas representing the usual proportion in such areas, of the cost of labour to the cost of materials used in carrying out such contract, subject to the following maximum percentages:

- (a) in the case of an electrical contract...20 per cent;
- (b) in the case of a structural contract...30 per cent;
- (c) in the case of a sanitary contract...33-1/3 per cent;
- (d) in the case of other contracts...30 per cent."

Since there is a reference to sub-r. (1) in sub-r. (3), it would be convenient to set out the provisions of sub-r. (1) of r. 5 as well in this context. Sub-rule (1) provides:

"Save as provided in sub-rule (2), the turnover of a dealer for the purpose of these rules shall be the amount for which goods are sold by the dealer."

Now, as I have stated above, the contention of Mr. Deshpande for the petitioner press is that the aforesaid provision of s. 2, cl. (m), Explanation I, cl. (i), of the Act and the provisions of r. 5, sub-r. (3) of the Rules are in violation of the Constitution of India, in that they are hit by item No. 54, List II, mentioned in Schedule VII to the Constitution. Now, if we turn to item No. 54, it relates to "taxes on the sale or purchase of goods other than newspapers, subject to the provisions of entry 92-A of List I." Mr. Deshpande's contention is that the transactions of the petitioner press with its constituents are not sales so as to fall within the ambit of item No. 54 mentioned in List II of the VIIth Schedule to the Constitution. It is Mr. Deshpande's contention that the dealings done by the petitioner press are contracts for services, in other words works contracts and, says Mr. Deshpande, the charges levied by the petitioner press from its constituents are in respect of the services rendered by the press to the constituents. In these circumstances, Mr. Deshpande says that the transactions of the petitioner press would not amount to sales within the meaning of entry No. 54. We have considered this contention of Mr. Deshpande, but we are unable to see force in it. There is no doubt that the essential character of the work done by the petitioner press is the supply of stationery. It is no doubt true that upon the stationery supplied by the press to its constituents, a certain amount of printing work is done by the press. But that is not the essential character of the business done by the press. It cannot be disputed that the petitioner press brings into existence printed stationery according to the orders of the individual customers, and when the press brings into existence such stationery, it produces a commercial commodity which is capable of being sold or supplied. Therefore, when the press sells printed material to its constituents, it sells goods to the constituents upon which sales tax is leviable. The learned advocate Mr. Deshpande also fairly concedes that when the printed material is sold by the press to its customers, there is a sale of finished goods to the customers. What Mr. Deshpande contends for, however, is that the essence of the work done by the press is not production of finished goods, but the printing work. It is in this manner that Mr. Deshpande contends that the transactions done by the petitioner press with its constituents are in the nature of works contracts. Now, the nature of a contract must be determined by the substance of the contract. As the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court pointed out in *Kanpur Journals Ltd. v. Commr. of Sales Tax, U.P.*¹ (p. 664):

"...We think it now to be established that in order to determine the nature of a contract the Court has to look at its substance. If the substance of the contract is the production of something to be sold to the customer,—such as a suit of clothes—then that is a sale of goods. If, on the other hand, the substance of the contract is that skill and labour have to be exercised for the production of the article, and that it is only ancillary to that that there will pass to the customer some materials in addition to the skill involved—as in the case of an oil painting—the contract will be one of work."

In our opinion, there can be no doubt that the substance of the transactions which the petitioner press enters into with its constituents is the production of something to be sold to the constituents. It is no doubt true that a certain amount of printing work which requires skill and labour is done on the stationery. But unless there is the base of the stationery itself, there would be nothing upon which the skill of the petitioner press could be used. It would have been a different matter if the stationery were to be supplied by the constituents to the press. But that is not the case here. It is a conceded position that the petitioner press itself purchases stationery, and having purchased the stationery, it does printing work upon it. In these circumstances, the essential character of the business done by the petitioner press is the supply of the stationery itself to the constituents with the printing work done upon that stationery. It would not matter where the press would purchase the stationery from. So far as the relations of the press with its constituents are concerned, the constituents purchase the stationery itself together with the printing material upon it from the press. Therefore, we have no doubt that this is a case in which a commercial commodity, which is a finished product, viz. the printed stationery etc. is sold by the press to its constituents.

Mr. Deshpande has invited our attention to a decision of the Hyderabad High Court in *Jubilee Engineering Co. v. S. T. Officer*². In this case, and be it noted that it was a case of a building contract, it was observed by the Court, agreeing with the view of the Madras High Court, that the power of the provincial Legislature to levy a tax on sale of goods was confined and restricted only to the transaction of sale as understood by the Parliament of the United Kingdom in the law relating to the sale of goods, and any attempt of the Legislature to tax under the guise or under the pretence of such a power transactions which were wholly outside would be ultra vires and must be declared invalid. Now, it is to be remembered that a building contract is one entire indivisible contract and in such a contract there is no sale of goods. One fundamental difference between a building contract and the work done by the petitioner press is that in a building contract, the various materials which are used in the process of constructing a building lose their original character, viz. the character of moveable property and get converted into parts of immoveable property by being fixed to a building. It is this important aspect of a building contract which distinguishes it from the work done by the petitioner press. As I have mentioned above, the press purchases stationery and brings into existence a finished product, viz. the printed material and, therefore, when it supplies that product to its constituents, it sells it to the constituents. We are, therefore, unable to accept the contention of Mr. Deshpande that the provisions of s. 2, cl. (m), Explanation 1, cl. (i) of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Act and r. 5, sub-r. (3), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules were ultra vires the legislative competence of the Legislature of the former State of Hyderabad.

The next point which has been canvassed before us by Mr. Deshpande is that r. 5, sub-r. (3) of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules is ultra vires the Constitution as it is arbitrary and not based upon any rational basis. Now, if we turn to r. 5, sub-r. (3), it virtually provides that the sale price of the goods shall be calculated at 70 per cent. of the price paid by the customers. Under sub-r. (3); a deduction of 30 per cent. is to be made towards the cost of labour in case of contracts other than electrical contracts or structural contracts or sanitary contracts. The fixation of the cost of labour at 30 per cent. and the fixation of the sale price at 70 per cent. of the amount realised from the customers are both arbitrary. The learned counsel Mr. Joshi appearing for the respondents in this case has not been able to point out to us any rational basis upon which the above-mentioned percentages were fixed. We are not told that these percentages were fixed upon any enquiry made by the State of Hyderabad or upon the recording of any evidence. Apart from this infirmity which attaches to sub-r. (3) of r. 5 of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules, 1950, it is also to be borne in mind that sub-r. (3) could only be attracted in case of a works contract. Sub-rule (3) provides:

"For the purpose of sub-r. (1), the amount for which goods are sold by a dealer shall in relation to works contract be deemed..."

Now, for the reasons stated in the earlier part of this judgment, we have come to the conclusion that the transactions which are done by the petitioner press for its constituents are not in the nature of works contracts. They are sales of goods. That being so, a recourse to sub-r. (3) of r. 5 of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules, 1950, could not validly avail the respondents. Therefore, on both the grounds, viz. the ground that sub-r. (3) of r. 5 is ultra vires the Constitution in that it is arbitrary and is lacking in any rational basis and also upon the ground that the provisions of this sub-rule could not be attracted in the present case which is not a case of works contract, the levy of sales-tax upon the petitioner press could not be justified.

The third point which Mr. Deshpande has pressed before us is that even in case the Court holds that s. 2, cl. (m), Explanation I, cl. (i), of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Act and r. 5, sub-r. (3) of the Hyderabad General Sales Tax Rules were intra vires the legislative competence of the Legislature of the former State of Hyderabad, even so the petitioner's case would fall within the ambit of cl. (iv) of Explanation I to s. 2, cl. (m) of the Act. We are unable to agree with Mr. Deshpande. Clause (iv) of Explanation I provides:

"Where for accommodating a particular customer, a dealer obtains goods from another dealer and immediately disposes of the same to the said customer, the sale in respect of such goods shall be included in the turnover of the latter dealer but not in that of the former."

Mr. Deshpande says that in the present case, for accommodating its customers, the petitioner press obtains goods from other dealers in the market and disposes of the said goods in favour of its own constituents and, therefore, the sale in respect of such goods should be included in the turnover of the constituents and should not be included in the turnover of the press itself. Mr. Deshpande appears to overlook the importance of the word "immediately" which the Legislature has used in cl. (iv) of Explanation I to s. 2, cl. (m). Had this been a case in which the press, after purchasing the stationery from the market, were to hand over the said stationery immediately to the constituents, it would have been a different thing. Here the press does not immediately dispose of the stationery purchased by it in favour of its constituents. It keeps it in the press. It prints letter-heads etc. upon the stationery and then supplies the finished product to the constituents. That being so, the provisions of cl. (iv) of Explanation I at the foot of cl. (m) of s. 2 would not be attracted in this case.

The last point of Mr. Deshpande is that the supply of the printed material to the constituents by the press would not amount to a sale. We have already dealt with this point while dealing with point No. 1 of the points pressed before us by Mr. Deshpande. Therefore, it is not necessary to add any more observations in respect of this point.

As, in our view, the transactions done by the petitioner press with its constituents are sales of goods, and are not in the nature of works contracts, r. 5, sub-r. (3) would not be attracted in the present case, and as this sub-rule itself is arbitrary as held by the Hyderabad High Court in Jubilee Engineering Co. v. S. T. Officer, the turnover of the petitioner press would not be chargeable to sales tax. Accordingly, the order made by the Sales Tax Tribunal on September 7, 1956, whereby it confirmed the order of the Deputy Commissioner, Sales Tax dated July 22, 1955, must be reversed and the application must be allowed. The respondents will bear their own costs and also pay the costs of the petitioner. The respondents are hereby restrained from recovering the sales tax from the petitioner press for the year 1951-52, for which a notice of demand was issued upon the petitioner.

Application allowed.

Mortgage—Equitable mortgage—Sole surviving coparcener mortgaging property vested in him to bank—Cash credit loan account for specified amount opened with bank as consideration for mortgage—Mortgagor covenanting to repay loan after one year, and on failure to do so, bank entitled to recover amount due by sale of mortgaged property—Two extensions of one year each granted by bank of cash credit loan arrangement—Enforcement of mortgage by bank on failure of mortgagor to pay amount found due at foot of account—Suit by son of mortgagor born after date of execution of mortgage and not conceived on or before that date for declaration that mortgage not binding upon his share in mortgaged property—Whether son can challenge mortgage—Mortgage whether continued to remain in operation notwithstanding the two extensions of cash credit arrangement—Whether mortgage became effective on the date of its execution.

The defendant on June 4, 1947, executed a mortgage deed, called a deed of equitable mortgage, in respect of certain property belonging to him, in favour of a co-operative bank to secure a loan for a certain amount. On the date of the execution of the deed the defendant was the sole coparcener in a joint Hindu family. The deed inter alia stated that the defendant had opened a cash credit loan account with the bank for developing his business and the defendant could from time to time withdraw upto the amount of the mortgage loan. Under the deed the defendant covenanted to repay to the bank on or before June 3, 1948, the amount received by him or whatever amount he might withdraw from the cash credit loan account and it was stipulated that the mortgage documents were to remain in possession of the bank till the mortgage amount was repaid by the defendant. It was also provided that if the defendant failed to repay the loan within the time stipulated, the bank was entitled to recover it by sale of the mortgaged property. On May 4, 1948, and again on June 3, 1949, the defendant made applications for extension of the cash credit loan arrangement for a period of one year respectively and both the extensions were granted. On June 3, 1950, a certain amount remained due to the bank at the foot of the account and as the defendant remained indebted in that account till 1952, proceedings were taken against him under the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act, 1925. An award was obtained by the bank under which the defendant was directed to pay the amount due out of the mortgaged property. The plaintiff, who was the son of the defendant, born on April 23, 1948, and who was not conceived on or before June 4, 1947, filed a suit inter alia for a declaration that the mortgage of the property executed by the defendant in favour of the bank and the award in favour of the bank were not binding upon his share in the property mortgaged:—

Held, that the mortgage was binding upon the defendant who as the sole surviving coparcener was competent to dispose of the property vested in him and the plaintiff not being in existence at the date of the mortgage could not challenge it, that notwithstanding the applications for renewal of the agreement under which the cash credit arrangement was extended, the mortgage continued to operate on the property, that when the deed of mortgage was executed for a consideration which was to be advanced in future, the mortgage became effective and enforceable against the totality of the interest of the joint family of which the defendant was the sole surviving co-parcener and the birth of the plaintiff subsequently did not affect the enforceability of that mortgage against that interest, and that, therefore, the award obtained by the bank against the defendant was binding upon the plaintiff's share in the property mortgaged.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. M. Shah, with B. G. Thakore, for the appellant.

A. H. Mehta, for respondent No. 1.

M. P. Sethna, for respondent No. 2.

SHAH J. The plaintiff, who is a minor, sued through his next friend for (1) a declaration that the mortgage of the properties described in sub-paras. (a) and (b) of para. 16 of the plaint effected by defendant No. 1 in favour of defendant No. 4 and an award in favour of defendant No. 4 by the Registrar under the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act are not binding upon the plaintiff's share in the properties mortgaged; (2) for a declaration that a sale-deed dated October 20, 1949, executed by defendant No. 1 in favour of defendant No. 2 conveying the property described in sub-para. (1) of para. 16 of the plaint is not binding upon the plaintiff, the same being without consideration and brought about by undue influence; (3) that an agreement of sale entered into by defendant No. 1 on January 23, 1950, with defendant No. 3 for sale of the properties described in para. 16 of the plaint is without consideration and without legal necessity; (4) for partition and separate possession of his share in the properties described in para. 16 of the plaint and (5) for an injunction restraining defendant No. 4 from executing the award obtained under the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act against defendant No. 1. The learned trial Judge decreed the plaintiff's suit. Against that decree defendant No. 4 alone has appealed to this Court.

In order to appreciate the claim made by the plaintiff certain material facts may be set out. The plaintiff is the son of defendant No. 1. Defendant No. 5 is the mother of the plaintiff and defendants Nos. 6 to 8 are his sisters. On June 4, 1947, defendant No. 1 was the sole co-parcener in that family. The plaintiff was born on April 23, 1948, and it is conceded that he was not conceived on or before June 4, 1947. On May 23, 1947, defendant No. 1 applied to defendant No. 4, which is a co-operative bank, for a loan of Rs. 8,800 on the security of his property and on June 4, 1947, a mortgage-deed, which is called a deed of equitable mortgage, was executed by defendant No. 1 in favour of defendant No. 4. By the preamble of the deed it was recited that defendant No. 1 had mortgaged to defendant No. 4 two houses belonging to him on the terms and conditions set out therein. By the first paragraph it was recited that defendant No. 1 had opened a cash credit loan account with defendant No. 4 for developing his "radio business." The limit up to which defendant No. 1 could withdraw was fixed at Rs. 8,800, and interest and as security for repayment of the said amount and interest thereon, defendant No. 1 executed a deed of equitable mortgage in favour of defendant No. 4. By the 2nd paragraph a covenant of title in the property mortgaged was guaranteed and it was stipulated that the mortgage documents were to remain in the possession of defendant No. 4 till the amount of Rs. 8,800 together with interest due thereon was repaid to defendant No. 4. It was recited in sub-para. (1) that the loan was sanctioned on May 22, 1947, to be advanced according to the rules and regulations of the bank and the same was advanced to defendant No. 1 on the date of the execution of the mortgage. By the 2nd sub-para. defendant No. 1 covenanted to repay to defendant No. 4 on or before June 3, 1948, the amount received by him or whatever amount he might withdraw from the cash credit loan account sanctioned by the bank together with interest and other incidental expenses. By the fifth sub-para. defendant No. 1 agreed to repay the cash credit loan together with interest and other expenses within the period stipulated or within any other period fixed by the rules and regulations of the bank. By the 6th sub-para. it was provided that in the event of defendant No. 1 failing to repay the loan with interest within the time stipulated together with interest thereon, defendant No. 4 will be entitled to recover the same with interest by sale of the property.

The loan was sanctioned to be advanced by defendant No. 4 to defendant No. 1 on May 22, 1947, and on June 4, 1947, defendant No. 1 executed the deed of mortgage thereby creating an encumbrance for repayment of Rs. 8,000 and interest on the property described therein in favour of defendant No. 4. It appears that by June 3, 1948, the amount advanced to defendant No. 1 was not repaid and defendant No. 1 submitted an application exh. 71 dated May 4, 1948, reciting therein that the period of the loan was expiring on June 4, 1948, and praying for extension of the cash credit loan arrangement for a further period of twelve months.

On June 4, 1948, the amount due at the foot of the cash credit loan account stood at Rs. 2,552. On that date pursuant to the application exh. 71 the cash credit arrangement was extended for one year. Between June 21 and July 2, defendant No. 1 made various repayments and on June 30, 1948, the balance due was Rs. 2-9-0 only. Thereafter the account continued and defendant No. 1 again withdrew large sums of money. On June 3, 1949, the balance due stood at Rs. 8,591-13-9. On that date another application exh. 72 was submitted by defendant No. 1 for extension of the cash credit arrangement for one year more and the extension was granted by defendant No. 4. Pursuant to this arrangement, again defendant No. 1 operated upon the account and on June 3, 1950, Rs. 8,894-8-3 remained due at the foot of the account. No further extension was thereafter asked for but defendant No. 1 remained indebted in that account till the year 1952 when proceedings were taken against him before the Registrar of Co-operative Societies and an award under the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act was obtained by defendant No. 4. By the award defendant No. 1 was directed to pay the amount due at the foot of the account out of the mortgaged property and personally. Defendant No. 4 then filed Darkhast No. 280 of 1952 in the Court of the Third Joint Civil Judge (Junior Division), Ahmedabad, for execution of the award. It appears that in the meanwhile defendant No. 1 had transferred city survey No. 2281, one of the two properties mortgaged by him to defendant No. 4, under a sale-deed dated October 20, 1949, for Rs. 10,000 to defendant No. 2. This sale-deed was registered on October 24, 1949. Defendant No. 1 also agreed to sell both the houses on January 23, 1950, to defendant No. 3. The plaintiff, who is a minor son of defendant No. 1, then filed Civil Suit No. 236 of 1952 in the Court of the Joint Civil Judge, Senior Division, at Ahmedabad for the reliefs which we have set out earlier. The suit was resisted by defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4. In this appeal we are concerned with the contentions raised by defendant No. 4 only.

Defendant No. 4 contended inter alia that the mortgage was binding upon the plaintiff because he was not born on the date of the mortgage, that defendant No. 1 on that date being the sole surviving co-parcener was entitled to deal with the property as absolute owner thereof, that in any event the alienation was binding upon the plaintiff as it was supported by legal necessity of the family, that is, for the business carried on by defendant No. 1, and that the plaintiff could not resist execution of the award obtained by defendant No. 4 and that the plaintiff had no cause of action for the suit against defendant No. 4.

The learned trial Judge decreed the plaintiff's suit and declared that the plaintiff had 1/3 share in the suit properties described in paras. 16(a) and 16(b) of the plaint and further declared that the award obtained by defendant No. 4 against defendant No. 1 was not binding upon the plaintiff's share in the suit property. He also declared that the sale-deed dated October 20, 1949, in favour of defendant No. 2 was not binding on the plaintiff's share if the plaintiff paid Rs. 1,666-10-8 to defendant No. 2. The learned trial Judge also granted an injunction restraining defendant No. 4 from executing the award against the plaintiff's share in the suit properties, and directed that the plaintiff do recover possession of his one-third share in the suit properties. Against that decree defendant No. 4 has appealed to this Court.

In holding that the plaintiff was not bound by the mortgage created by defendant No. 1 in favour of defendant No. 4, the learned trial Judge held that the encumbrance created by the mortgage-deed dated June 4, 1947, was only in respect of the advances to be made during the course of one year from that date, and that encumbrance could not be enforced by the bank to recover advances made after the expiry of one year from the date of the mortgage, and that in the absence of a renewal of the account, the bank could not make any fresh advances after June 3, 1948. He was also inclined to take the view that each agreement for renewal of the cash credit account created a fresh mortgage by "constructive deposit of title-deeds" and the constructive deposit of title-deeds under exhs. 71 and 72 after the plaintiff was born, in law amounted to the creation of fresh mortgages in favour of defendant No. 4 on the respective dates of those two documents, and consequently on June 4, 1948, defendant No. 1 must be deemed to have created a fresh mortgage in favour of the bank for securing re-payment of Rs. 8,526-4-9 and future advances to be made within the course of the next one year subject to the maximum limit under the original mortgage deed and on June 3, 1949, defendant No. 1 must be deemed to have created a fresh mortgage for securing repayment of an antecedent debt of Rs. 8,591-13-9 and for future advances to be made during the course of that year. He then held that the antecedent debt which was outstanding on June 4, 1949, was satisfied by repayments made by defendant No. 1 during the course of the year and the entire balance outstanding against defendant No. 1 on June 3, 1950, consisted of items withdrawn during the course of the year and thereafter as the account was not renewed the award obtained by defendant No. 4 must be held enforceable against the interest of defendant No. 1 alone in the property mortgaged and not against the interest of the plaintiff.

We are unable to agree with the view taken by the learned trial Judge. It is undisputed that on June 4, 1947, the plaintiff was not born and defendant No. 1 as the sole surviving co-parcener of the joint Hindu family was competent to dispose of the property vested in him even for purposes not supported by legal necessity. On that date a mortgage deed was executed by defendant No. 1 in favour of defendant No. 4 in which it was expressly recited that Rs. 8,800 were borrowed by him and as security for repayment thereof, the two houses in suit were mortgaged. Evidently the mortgage-deed was for consideration. It is true that the amount of Rs. 8,800 was not in fact paid immediately to defendant No. 1 but was credited to defendant No. 1 in a separate cash credit account. It appears from exh. 60, which is a statement of account, that on June 4, 1947, Rs. 8,800 were credited to defendant No. 1's account and Rs. 645 were advanced to defendant No. 1 on the date of the execution of the mortgage. But on that account we are unable to hold that the mortgage for the full amount of Rs. 8,800 was not binding upon defendant No. 1. In substance there was a dual arrangement. For securing repayment of Rs. 8,800 defendant No. 1 on June 4, 1947, mortgaged the properties belonging to him to defendant No. 4 and thereafter under another arrangement he left the amount with defendant No. 4 bank to be called for as and when required. This second arrangement was called the cash credit loan account. The learned trial Judge's observation, that the security created on June 4, 1947, was only in respect of the advances to be made during the course of one year, does not find any support from the covenant contained in the mortgage-deed. The deed merely provided that defendant No. 1 shall repay the amount of Rs. 8,800 within one year, and there was in fact no covenant in the deed whereby the security was to enure only in respect of advances made during the course of one year. There is no covenant again in the deed which supports the view of the learned Judge that defendant No. 4 could not make any fresh advances after June 3, 1948. It is true that according to Mr. Setalwad, the Manager of defendant No. 4 bank, cash credit arrangement was good for one year, and after the expiry of one year, the bank would not have advanced any amount unless the arrangement was renewed, but that evidence, in our judgment, does not justify the inference that the encumbrance created by the mortgage-deed was restricted to amounts advanced during the course of one year or that the bank was prohibited from making any fresh advances after June 3, 1948. It is true that before the date of the application exh. 71, the plaintiff was born and acquired an interest in the joint family property by his birth, but if the future advances were to be made in consideration of an agreement to make advances to defendant No. 1 as and when required subject to the maximum limit of Rs. 8,800 and defendant No. 1 executed a deed of mortgage at a time when the plaintiff was not in existence, that mortgage, in our judgment, must be regarded as binding upon defendant No. 1; and the plaintiff, not being in existence at the date of the mortgage cannot challenge the same. The application exh. 71 whereby the cash credit arrangement was extended for a period of one year does not, in our judgment, affect the liability which was undertaken by the deed of mortgage. We are unable to hold that the law recognises a "constructive deposit of title-deeds" as creating a mortgage. Normally a mortgage of immovable property is effected by an instrument duly executed and registered. Even if an equitable mortgage is intended to be created, there must be a deposit of title deeds of properties to be mortgaged with intent to mortgage the same as security for repayment of the loan advanced or to be advanced. In the absence of anything to show that the security under the original deed of mortgage created by the deed exh. 70, was extinguished, there is, in our judgment, no support for this theory of a fresh mortgage coming into existence by the application exh. 71 dated June 4, 1948, and of another mortgage by a subsequent application exh. 72 dated June 4, 1949.

Even if the mortgage-deed and the cash credit account be regarded as parts of the same transaction, in our judgment, the mortgage-deed executed by defendant No. 1 on June 4, 1947, must still be regarded as binding upon the plaintiff. Defendant No. 1 had by the deed undertaken liability to repay within one year, the loan of Rs. 8,800 advanced to him. That covenant does not warrant the assumption made by the learned trial Judge that on the expiration of the year, the mortgage became unenforceable. The extension of the cash credit arrangement beyond the period of one year initially contemplated also has not the effect of extinguishing the original encumbrance or substituting it by a fresh encumbrance. It must, in our judgment, be held that the mortgage continued to operate on the properties, renewal of the arrangement under which the cash credit arrangement was extended by applications under exh. 71 and exh. 72 notwithstanding.

Section 58 of the Transfer of Property Act which defines a mortgage states:

"A mortgage is the transfer of an interest in specific immoveable property for the purpose of securing the payment of money advanced or to be advanced by way of loan, an existing or future debt or the performance of an engagement which may give rise to a pecuniary liability."

From the plain words of the statute for transfer of an interest in immovable property to secure repayment of money, there need not be a present advance at the date of the execution of the deed. Even an agreement to advance money in future will support a mortgage. As has been held in Raghunath Bhagat v. Amir Baksh,¹ a mortgage is perfected by registration, and unless the bond provides to the contrary, it takes effect from the date of registration and not from the date when the consideration money is paid. In that case the consideration money was to be paid in pursuance of an arrangement between the parties after the date of execution of the deed of mortgage. Before receiving the consideration agreed to be paid the mortgagor transferred the property by a sale-deed to a third person and there was a contest between the mortgagees and the purchaser. The Patna High Court held that the mortgage document became effective from the date of the execution and the transfer to the third person was subject to the mortgage. In so holding Mr. Justice P. R. Das relied upon the observations made by this Court in *Tatia v. Babaji*² where Chief Justice Farran observed (p. 183):

"...I am not, however,...prepared to assent to the train of thought which puts conveyances of lands...perfected by possession or registration, where the consideration expressed in the conveyance to have been paid has not in fact been paid, in the same category as contracts void for want of consideration. The radical distinction between a perfected conveyance and a contract does not seem to me to have been sufficiently borne in mind throughout the judgment."

When the deed of mortgage was executed for a consideration of Rs. 8,800 which was to be advanced in future, the mortgage became effective and enforceable against the totality of the interest of the joint family of which defendant No. 1 was the sole co-parcener and the birth of the plaintiff subsequently did not affect the enforceability of that mortgage against that interest.

Even on the view taken by the learned trial Judge, which, we may observe, we are not prepared to accept his conclusion cannot be accepted. Assuming for the sake of argument that in the month of June 1949 there was, what he calls, a "constructive deposit of title deeds", which gave rise to a new mortgage for a sum of Rs. 8,526-4-9 in favour of defendant No. 4, which the learned trial Judge concedes was an antecedent debt for which defendant No. 1 was liable, we are unable to appreciate why defendant No. 4 is not entitled to enforce that mortgage against the interest of the plaintiff in the joint family property for satisfaction of that debt. A Hindu son is under a pious obligation to pay the debts of his father which are not Avyavaharika, and an alienation by a Hindu father for payment of antecedent debts which are not Avyavaharika, is binding upon the sons, who are members of the joint Hindu family with the father. If, on June 4, 1949, even assuming the theory, which has been evolved by the learned trial Judge, be correct, there came into existence a fresh mortgage to secure repayment of an antecedent debt of Rs. 8,591-13-0, that mortgage, in our judgment, was enforceable against the interest of the joint family in the property mortgaged and the circumstance that the mortgage amount was credited into an account operated upon by defendant No. 1 was a cash credit account, and payments were made in that account and withdrawals were made from that account, did not affect the enforceability of the mortgage for the amount due at the foot of the account. We are, therefore, of the view that even on the view taken which appealed to the learned trial Judge his conclusion cannot be supported.

The plaintiff had attempted to make out a case that the debts incurred by defendant No. 1 were tainted with immorality. The learned trial Judge negatived that contention and no arguments have been advanced before us in support of that contention. On the view taken by us the decree passed by the trial Court against defendant No. 4 must be set aside. Defendant No. 2 against whom a decree has been passed by the trial Court has not appealed to this Court and we are unable to alter that decree.

On the view taken by us the second sentence of the decretal order will be deleted and will be substituted by the following order.

"It is further declared that the award decree obtained by the 4th defendant against the 1st defendant under the Co-operative Societies Act is binding upon the plaintiff's one-third share in the suit properties."

The last sentence in the first paragraph of the decretal order will also be deleted. The second paragraph of the decretal order will be modified by adding after the words "it is ordered" the words "subject to the directions contained in paragraph (1) of the decretal order". The order regarding the costs passed by the learned trial Judge will be deleted. The plaintiff's suit against defendant No. 4 will be dismissed with costs payable to defendant No. 4. The appeal will be allowed. Defendant No. 4 will be entitled to its costs in this appeal from the plaintiffs.

Appeal allowed.

N. V. RAVAL.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 35(10)—Income-tax Officer allowing rebate on undistributed profits of assessee company under Part I, Para B, proviso (i) of Schedules of Finance Acts of 1950-52 for calendar years 1949-51—Assessee company showing loss in calendar year 1952, but paying dividend for that year out of profits made by it in 1949-51—Income-tax Officer passing order under s. 35(10)—Whether Income-tax Officer had power to pass such order.

For the assessment years 1950-51, 1951-52 and 1952-53 the Income-tax Officer passed orders on various dates assessing the total income of the assessee company for the relevant assessment years, the previous years being calendar years 1949, 1950 and 1951. At the time of making these assessments the Income-tax Officer allowed a rebate of income-tax on undistributed profits under Part I, Para. B, proviso (i) of the relevant Schedules to the Finance Acts of 1950, 1951 and 1952. For the assessment year 1953-54, the calendar year being 1952, the assessment order showed that the assessee company had incurred losses. The assessee company, however, declared and paid dividend for the calendar year 1952 and these were paid out of the reserves formed out of the profits of the previous years viz. 1949, 1950 and 1951, which had been subjected to tax. The Income-tax Officer called upon the assessee company to show cause why action should not be taken under s. 35(10) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, as, according to him, dividends declared by the assessee company for the assessment year 1953-54 had come out of reserves of earlier years on which rebate was allowed on undistributed profits. The Income-tax Officer ultimately passed orders on the assessee company under s. 35(10) of the Act. The assessee company challenged the orders contending that as the provisions of s. 35(10), which were added by the Finance Act, 1956, and came into force on April 1, 1956, became operative only from April 1, 1956, the original assessment orders, which had been made before that date, had become final and conclusive before that date and these assessments could not be affected or touched or altered in any manner by the subsequent legislation introduced for the first time by s. 35(10):—

Held, that on a fair reading of s. 35(10) of the Act the Income-tax Officer in the instant case was authorised to recompute the tax payable by the assessee company by reducing the rebate originally allowed as if the recomputation was a rectification of a mistake apparent from the record and, therefore, he had the power to pass the impugned order under s. 35(10).

S. T. DESAI J. This petition for a writ of certiorari or a writ of mandamus or a writ of prohibition raises a rather important question of the construction of s. 35(10) of the Income-tax Act. Sub-section (10) of s. 35 was introduced by amendment brought about by the Finance Act, 1956. We shall have occasion to refer to the amendment little later in our judgment. The facts succinctly stated are these. The petitioner, the New Shorrock Spg. and Mfg. Co. Ltd., which carries on business of manufacturing and selling textiles, has its registered office at Ahmedabad. Respondent No. 1 is the Income-tax Officer having jurisdiction to assess the petitioner. The assessment years in respect of which this petition arises are 1950-51, 1951-52 and 1952-53.

* Decided, November 6, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 1609 of 1958.

2 (1958) 34 I.T.R. 143.

For the assessment year 1950-51 (previous year ending December 31, 1949) the Income-tax Officer had passed an order on January 18, 1951, assessing the total income of the petitioner-mills at Rs. 30,30,822. At that time, in accordance with the provision contained in cl. (1) of the proviso to para. B of Part I of the Schedule to the Finance Act of 1950, he allowed the rebate of one anna in a rupee on the undistributed profits of Rs. 6,43,621. The rebate so allowed amounted to Rs. 40,226.

It will be convenient to reproduce the provision of law relating to that rebate. It is to be found in the First Schedule to the Finance Act of 1950:

"In the case of every company—...

(i) where the total income, as reduced by six and a half annas in the rupee and by the amount if any, exempt from income-tax, exceeds the amount of any dividends (including dividends payable at a fixed rate) declared in respect of the whole or part of the previous year for the assessment for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1951, and no order has been made under sub-section (1) of section 23A of the Income-tax Act, a rebate shall be allowed at the rate of one anna per rupee on the amount of such excess."

For the assessment year 1951-52 (previous year ending December 31, 1950) the Income-tax Officer passed an order on January 31, 1952, and assessed the total income of the petitioner-mills at Rs. 27,43,730. In that year also he allowed similar rebate of one anna per rupee. That was under cl. (i) of the proviso to Para. B of Part I to the Schedule to the Finance Act, 1951, and it was on the undistributed profits of Rs. 4,01,348 and amounted to Rs. 25,084.

For the assessment year 1952-53 (previous year ending December 31, 1951), the Income-tax Officer assessed the total income of the petitioner-mills at Rs. 34,51,284. In that year also he allowed similar rebate of one anna per rupee, which was under cl. (i) of the proviso to Para. B of Part I of the Schedule to the Finance Act of 1952. In that year, the undistributed profits of the mills company came to Rs. 8,07,363 and the amount of rebate allowed for that year was Rs. 50,460. It may be mentioned that in respect of the assessment for the first two years, there was subsequent review in 1954 of the orders, but that is immaterial for the purpose of this petition.

For the assessment year 1953-54 (previous year ending December 31, 1952) the assessment order showed that the petitioner-mills had incurred losses. The mills, however, declared and paid dividends aggregating to Rs. 10,92,000 for the accounting year ending December 31, 1952, and the dividends were paid out of profits made by the company in the earlier years. The balance-sheet of the company for the year ending December 31, 1952, stated that the dividends had been distributed from:

"(a) Profits of the aforesaid year and/or

(b) the reserves formed out of the profits or accumulated profits of the following 'previous years' which have been subjected to tax.

Year ending	..	..	..	..	..	31-12-1937
Year ending	..	..	..	..	..	31-12-1949
Year ending	..	..	..	..	..	31-12-1950
Year ending	..	..	..	..	..	31-12-1951"

In March 1958 respondent No. 1 called upon the petitioner-mills to show cause why action should not be taken under s. 35(10) of the Act, as, according to him, dividends declared by the mills for the assessment year 1953-54 aggregating to Rs. 10,92,000 had come out of reserves of earlier years on which rebate of one anna in the rupee for the years 1950-51, 1951-52 and 1952-53 had been allowed on undistributed profits. There was some correspondence and ultimately respondent No. 1 passed orders on the mills company under s. 35(10) of the Act, terms of which sub-section are as follows:

"Where, in any of the assessments for the years beginning on the 1st day of April of the years 1948 to 1955 inclusive, a rebate of income-tax was allowed to a company on a part of its total income under clause (i) of the proviso to Paragraph B of Part I of the relevant Schedules to the Finance Acts specifying the rates of tax for the relevant year, and subsequently the amount on which the rebate of income-tax was allowed as aforesaid is availed of by the company, wholly or partly, for declaring dividends in any year, the amount or that part of the amount availed of as aforesaid as the case may be, shall, by reason of the rebate of income-tax allowed to the company and to the extent to which it has not actually been subjected to an additional income-tax in accordance with the provisions of clause (4) of the proviso to Paragraph B of Part I of the Schedules to the Finance Acts above referred to, be deemed to have been made the subject of incorrect relief under this Act, and the Income-tax Officer shall re-compute the tax payable by the company by reducing the rebate originally allowed, as if the re-computation is a rectification of a mistake apparent from the record within the meaning of this section and the provisions of sub-section (1) shall apply accordingly, the period of four years specified therein being reckoned from the end of the financial year in which the amount on which rebate of income-tax was allowed as aforesaid was availed of by the company wholly or partly for declaring dividends."

The mills company challenged the right of respondent No. 1 to pass those orders and raised before him various contentions, which it is not necessary to set out here. In the petition, the mills company has raised various contentions, one of them being that s. 35(10) of the Act is ultra vires the Constitution being in contravention of certain fundamental rights there guaranteed and being in violation of the provisions of art. 265 of the Constitution. One of the contentions set out in the petition is that the provisions of s. 35(10) being added only by the Finance Act of 1956 had no application to the case of the mills company because to apply the provisions of s. 35(10) to the mills company would be to give retrospective operation to those provisions. The contention is that the provisions of s. 35(10) became operative only from April 1, 1956, and the original assessment order had been made much before that and the assessments had become final and conclusive before April 1, 1956. Very briefly stated the contention is that those assessments cannot be affected or touched or altered in any manner by any subsequent legislation introduced for the first time by s. 35(10) in 1956.

The contentions relating to ultra vires and violation of fundamental rights have not been urged before us by Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the petitioner-mills. The only contention which is pressed before us, it is said, falls under two heads: (1) the assessments in question had become final before April 1, 1956, and on a proper construction of s. 35(10) those assessments do not fall within the purview of the section: (2) Section 35(10) properly read is not intended to have any retroactive operation. It seems to us that these are phases of the same argument. It will be convenient to set out here s. 28 of the Finance Act of 1956 whereby s. 35(10) was introduced for the first time in the Income-tax Act:

"The amendments made in the Income-tax Act by section 4 and clause (b) of section 15 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of April 1955 and the amendments made by sections 3 to 27 inclusive shall come into force on the 1st day of April 1956."

The amendment by way of introduction of s. 35(10) was brought about by s. 19. It is one of the provisions which s. 28 says "shall come into force on the 1st day of April 1956". There is no dispute, and there can be no dispute, that s. 35(10) came into force on April 1, 1956, but the dispute is as to the precise effect of the coming into force of that section on April 1, 1956, in the light of the provisions of s. 35(10) itself. In a case of the nature before us the prospective or retrospective operation of s. 35(10) cannot depend merely on the word "shall come into force on the 1st day of April 1956" if there is something in s. 35(10) itself which shows that the rule laid down in it was to become operative in respect of certain matters of previous years. The major premise of Mr. Kolah's argument is that the assessment of the mills company was changed by the provisions contained in sub-s. (10). It is said that the assessment is sought to be altered and affected by those provisions. He has drawn our attention to instances where the Legislature in giving retrospective operation to a provision of law had used certain words. He has asked us to contrast those words with the words in s. 28 "shall come into force on the 1st day of April 1956". At one stage of the argument the suggestion seemed to us to be that assessments which had been completed before April 1, 1956, could not be touched by the amended provisions introduced by incorporating s. 35(10), but when the argument was developed Mr. Kolah stated that in a sense s. 35 did apply to completed assessments and in a sense it did not apply to completed assessments, and the distinction rather fine or perhaps overrefined is that s. 35(10) could apply only in respect of assessments completed before April 1, 1956, if dividend was declared after April 1, 1956. Otherwise s. 35(10), it is said, would not apply. Now, as we shall presently point out the language of the section is quite clear and it is difficult to see on what principle or authority or reason this arbitrary distinction is to be drawn.

Before we proceed to examine the language of s. 35(10) and analyse the section we would like to preface our judgment with a few general observations. We have often quoted and we may quote once again the celebrated observations of Mr. Justice Rowlett which have now become classical:

"In a taxing Act one has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment. There is no equity about a tax. There is no presumption as to a tax. Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used."

One safe and infallible principle which is of guidance in these matters is to read the words through and see if the rule is clearly stated. If the language employed gives the rule in words of sufficient clarity and precision, no more requires to be done. Indeed, in such a case the task of interpretation can hardly be said to arise: Absoluta sententia expositore non indiget. The language used by the Legislature best declares its intention and must be accepted as decisive of it. We may permit ourselves to make some further observations of the nature we have made before about the interpretation of provisions said to be retroactive in their operation. The general rule indubitably is that where a statute is passed altering the law it is to be presumed as intended to apply to a state of facts coming into existence after the Act. It is a fundamental and a firmly established rule of interpretation that a statute which deals with matters of substantive law—and taxation is a matter of substantive law—would not be construed to have retrospective operation unless such a construction appears very clearly in the terms of the Act or arises by necessary implication. Now, the use of the expression "retrospective operation" is at times vague and misleading. In a broad general sense it may be right to say that a statute has retrospective operation when it purports to touch facts or events which took place before the enactment came into force. It is sometimes used in a different sense when vested rights are sought to be affected. It is sometimes loosely used in the context of certain fictions of law which the law-maker deems it necessary to introduce in existing laws for the purpose of setting certain matters right or avoiding certain mischief which might be possible but for the change in the law; and this is done by laying down that certain facts or things which did not in fact exist shall be deemed to have existed. This last need not necessarily be called retrospective legislation. It may be more appropriate to describe it as ex post facto legislation of a curative nature. It is unsusceptible of dispute that s. 35(10) lays down a fiction of law. It is also unsusceptible of dispute that by the fiction juris the Legislature has laid down a rule which is intended to embrace rebates which were granted in the past before the commencement of the rule. The inherent oppressiveness—or at least hardship—of retroactive operation in case of statutes creating new penalties or liabilities or ex post facto deprivation of concessions in matters of taxation and other matters has always induced Courts to view changes in law aimed so to operate, with extreme care and to express the inhibition in unmistakable terms. In examining the language of s. 35(10) and in reaching a conclusion as to the meaning of the language fairly read, we shall be doing so in the light of the observations just made.

Section 35 deals with rectification of mistake. Section 35(10) is intended to lay down certain provisions in respect of rebate on income-tax allowed to a company on a part of its income by virtue of the concessions given by the Finance Acts of 1948 to 1955 and as the initial words clearly show it deals with rebates granted in respect of any of the assessments for the years 1948 to 1955 inclusive. Then it proceeds to state the condition in which or the event on the happening of which the rebate is to be deemed to have been given by a mistake apparent from the record. That condition or event is that the company to which such rebate of income-tax had been allowed has availed of the amount on which the rebate was allowed, meaning thereby the undistributed profits, for declaring dividends in any subsequent year. The expressions "subsequently" and "for declaring dividends in any year" in the sub-section have reference to the words "in any of the assessments for the year beginning on the 1st day of April of the years 1948 to 1955 inclusive." That, in our judgment, permits of no doubt and little debate. We leave out certain words in sub-s. (10) which deal with matters of detail, and doing so, we find that the words that follow are the crucial words. They are made in the context of rebates made and the amount of undistributed profits on which rebates were granted being availed of by the company for paying dividends in subsequent years, and the crucial words are that in such a case the amount of undistributed profits availed of by the company on which rebate had been allowed "shall be deemed to have been made the subject of incorrect relief under this Act". In such a case the Income-tax Officer is authorised to recompute the tax payable by the company by reducing the rebate originally allowed as if the recomputation is a rectification of a mistake apparent from the record. The substance of the matter, evidently, is that something which had in fact not taken place, something which was not incorrect when done, relief which was correctly given when it was given, all that is to be deemed to have been made the subject of an incorrect relief under the Act and it is to be deemed that the recomputation necessary for the purpose of setting the matter right is nothing more than a rectification of a mistake apparent from the record. It may be said that rebate which was the subject-matter of the relief is to be recalled because of an event which subsequently happened and although the rebate was granted strictly in accordance with the provisions relating to the concessions made by the Finance Act during the relevant year and even though there was no mistake in the matter of granting that rebate or relief, what was done is nevertheless to be deemed to have been made by mistake. In modern statutes the expression "deemed" is used a great deal and for many purposes. It is at times used to introduce artificial conceptions which are intended to go beyond legal principles or to give an artificial construction to a word or phrase. It is not possible to list the purposes for which legal fictions may be created by statute. We had occasion in tax cases to refer to the judgment of the Supreme Court in *The State of Bombay v. Pandurang Vinayak Chaphalkar*¹ where their Lordships observed (p. 778) :

"...When a statute enacts that something shall be deemed to have been done, which in fact and truth was not done, the court is entitled and bound to ascertain for what purposes and between what persons the statutory fiction is to be resorted to and full effect must be given to the statutory fiction and it should be carried to its logical conclusion."

Then their Lordships proceeded to quote certain observations of Lord Asquith which have now become classical. In East End Dwellings Co. Ltd. v. Finsbury Borough Council,² Lord Asquith observed :

"If you are bidden to treat an imaginary state of affairs as real, you must surely, unless prohibited from doing so, also imagine as real the consequences and incidents which, if the putative state of affairs had in fact existed, must inevitably have flowed from or accompanied it...The statute says that you must imagine a certain state of affairs; it does not say that having done so, you must cause or permit your imagination to boggle when it comes to the inevitable corollaries of that state of affairs."

Far from there being any prohibition in the present case, the statute enjoins that what when done was not a mistake, what was correct relief granted according to the provisions of the Finance Acts in operation at the relevant times, shall nevertheless be deemed to have been made by mistake and the relief granted shall be deemed to have been incorrectly granted. By virtue of this deeming provision, the granting of rebate must be assumed even factually to have been made as a result of a mistake apparent from the record although in fact and in truth no such mistake had ever been made. Therefore, the crucial question that we have to put to ourselves is: what is the point of time at which the mistake was made and the relief incorrectly given? The first of April 1956 has no cogency to the point under consideration. It is a date after which the Income-tax Officer can sit down for the first time to think as to what is it that is to be deemed by him to have taken place by or through a mistake. Apart from that, April 1, 1956, the date so strongly relied on by Mr. Kolah, has no bearing on the interpretation of this section. Indubitably the section says that relief which was properly given, which was legally given, is to be deemed to have been incorrectly given. Rebate which was justifiably granted and correctly granted is to be deemed to have been granted under a mistake apparent on the record. As already stated we put to ourselves the question as to when the rebate can be said to have been incorrectly given: when was the relief granted by a mistake? And the answer inescapably must be that it was when the relief was granted by permitting rebate, and if that be the true position—and we have no doubt that it is so—it is extremely difficult to see how the principles of construction and the inhibition against retroactive operation can have any real effect on or can in any manner govern the enactment we are called upon to interpret. The language of s. 35(10) is very clear. It is one of those few sections in the Act which do not permit of any doubt as to what the lawmaker intended. It is not possible to see any difficulty of ascertainment of what the Legislature has said it meant. Therefore, on a fair reading of s. 35(10) it seems to us that the Income-tax Officer had the power to pass those orders.

But it is said by Mr. Kolah that there are decisions which are indicative of the contrary view. Before we examine those decisions, we may refer to certain general observations of Lord Dunedin in *Whitney v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue*³, where the eminent Judge very vividly and clearly brought out the three stages in the imposition of a tax:

"...Once that it is fixed that there is a liability, it is antecedently highly improbable that the statute should not go on to make that liability effective. A statute is designed to be workable, and the interpretation thereof by a Court should be to secure that object, unless crucial omission or clear direction makes that end unattainable. Now, there are three stages in the imposition of a tax: there is the declaration of liability, that is the part of the statute which determines what persons in respect of what property are liable. Next, there is the assessment. Liability does not depend on assessment. That, ex hypothesi, has already been fixed. But assessment particularises the exact sum which a person liable has to pay. Lastly, come the methods of recovery, if the person taxed does not voluntarily pay."

The declaration of liability of the assessee-mills was by the statute itself. The assessment in respect of the relevant years was made much prior to 1956. But says Mr. Kolah, that assessment is being altered and affected by giving effect to s. 35(10). In our opinion it would not be accurate to say that the effect of s. 35(10) is to assess the mills company over again or to re-open the assessment already made. It is stressed that some change or some alteration is being made. Of course, some change or alteration is being made. That is the very purpose of s. 35(10). But the question is what is the nature of that change or alteration? The assessment, strictly speaking, is not being changed or affected. There is only recomputation of a restricted nature vis-a-vis the rebate. What is permitted to be done by operation of the deeming provision is that the rebate is wholly or partially to be recalled as it is to be deemed to have been allowed through a mistake and relief which was granted, is to be deemed to have been incorrectly granted. Therefore, in our opinion, it would not be correct to say as learned counsel strongly asserted that his assessment was being disturbed and/or in a sense he was being assessed over again. Nor can it be said that the finality of that assessment has been really affected. The assessment depended on the income of the company for the relevant years. There is to be no recomputation of the income of the company for the relevant years. That has already been done. The only thing to be done is to ascertain what was the amount of undistributed profits in respect of which rebate had been granted that was availed of by the company wholly or partially for declaring dividend in any subsequent years. That is not assessment. There is not a word in s. 35(10) which would even faintly suggest that there was to be anything of the nature of assessment, in the sense in which that expression is to be understood in the present context. The order made by the Income-tax Officer may be considered. In effect the original order of assessment as made said: This is your income. This is the amount of tax you have to pay after bringing into play the various provisions of the Income-tax law having bearing on your assessment. The dividend you have declared leaves undistributed profits. In accordance with law, I give you a rebate or a drawback or a discount and shall only recover from you the balance after subtracting the amount of such drawback from the amount of tax which you are liable to pay and bound to pay. It is difficult to see how this restricted recomputation can properly be said to be alteration or modification or any change in the assessment actually made. But even assuming that this can be regarded as an alteration in the assessment finally made in the earlier years, that does not affect the conclusion we have reached on the question of construction of s. 35(10). In a broad general sense, it is true that there is finality about an order of assessment. Whatever be the position in law as to this doctrine of finality—and it is not necessary for us in this petition to examine the matter in detail—one thing is clear that s. 35 can operate despite any such broad doctrine. Question of rectification obviously would only arise in case of an assessment which is finalised. Section 34 which deals with the re-opening of assessments when income has escaped assessment also has bearing on this doctrine of finality.

To turn to the decisions to which our attention has been drawn by Mr. Kolah. In *Chatturam v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bihar*⁴, the Federal Court had occasion to consider certain principles of taxation and a dispute about retrospective operation of certain provisions. There is nothing in the observations there made which lend any support to the argument of Mr. Kolah. Particular reliance was placed by counsel on the recent decision of the Supreme Court in *Venkatachalam v. Bombay Dyeing and Mfg. Co. Ltd.*⁵ Statutes which give retrospective operation to their provisions may have different objects in view and the purpose may be to lay down different rules. Mr. Kolah is right when he says that in case of different enactments different words are used in giving retrospective operation. Now, the meaning of the words employed in s. 35(10) and the question whether the rule laid down in those words is to affect any rebates granted in the past can only be determined from the words themselves and the object of the rule if there is language appropriate to that object or purpose. Other enactments with different objects in view and intended to serve different purposes would necessarily have been enacted in different language. Therefore, comparison of the language of one enactment whereby retrospective operation was sought to be given by the lawmaker is of little guidance in matters of this type and it is unnecessary for us to examine the provision which required to be considered in the case before their Lordships of the Supreme Court. There are, however, certain observations in that case, which, we may respectfully say so, afford guidance on the question before us and we may quote them. Before doing so, we may observe that they were made in a different context (p. 147):

"...The argument for the respondent is that the assessee has obtained a right under the order passed by the Income-tax Officer to claim credit for the specified amount under section 18A(5) and the said right cannot be taken away by the retrospective operation of section 13 of the Amendment Act. The same argument is put in another form by contending that the finality of the order passed by the Income-tax Officer cannot be impaired by the retrospective operation of the relevant provision. In our opinion, this argument does not really help the respondent's case because the order passed by the Income-tax Officer under section 18A(5) cannot be said to be final in the literal sense of the word. This order was and continued to be liable to be modified under section 35 of the Act. What the Income-tax Officer has purported to do in the present case is not to revise his order in the light of the retrospective amendment made by section 13 of the Amendment Act alone, but to exercise his power under section 35 of the Act; and so the question which falls to be considered in the present appeal centres round the construction of the expression "mistake apparent from the record" used in section 35. That is why we think the principle of the finality of the orders or the sanctity of the existing rights cannot be effectively invoked by the respondent in the present case". It is true that the observations, as we have already said, were made in a different context. But we have quoted these observations solely for the purpose of showing that the doctrine of finality is not of the nature sought to be made out by learned counsel.

In the result, the petition fails and will be dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 2 & 46(3)—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 46(5A)—Execution of decree—Judgment-debtor complying with notice issued against him under s. 46(5A) of Indian Income-tax Act and paying amount to Income-tax Officer payable by assessee judgment-creditor—Whether judgment-debtor discharged from liability to extent of payment made to Income-tax Officer—Judgment-creditor whether competent to execute decree for such payment made to Income-tax Officer.

Where the liability of the judgment-debtor to pay the decretal amount is discharged by virtue of the provisions contained in s. 46(5A) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, the Court executing the decree must recognise this statutory discharge of liability to the extent of the payment made and the decree-holder becomes incompetent to execute the decree for the amount paid by the judgment-debtor to the Income-tax Officer.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Y. V. Chandrachud, for the appellant.

A. D. Desai, for the respondent.

SHAH J. This is an appeal from an order in an execution proceeding. In Suit No. 13 of 1944 of the file of the Civil Judge, Senior Division at Broach, it was decreed that defendant No. 10 Mahomad Hussein Haji Abdulrehman do pay Rs. 24,426-5-4 to the heirs of one Kadarbhai. After this decree was passed Suit No. 203 of 1949 to administer the estate of Kadarbhai was filed. By the decree in that suit it was directed that Mahomad Hussein Haji Abdulrehman

*Decided, November 14, 1958. First Appeal Sakllkar, Civil Judge, Senior Division at No. 565 of 1955, against the decision of R. K. Broach, in Special Darkhast No. 26 of 1951.

(whom we will hereafter refer to as the judgment-debtor) do pay the decretal amount of Rs. 24,426-5-4 to Abdul Karim Husseinbhai Lakdawala who was one of the heirs of Kadarbhai. Abdul Karim Husseinbhai Lakdawala (whom we will hereafter refer to as the judgment-creditor) then filed Darkhast No. 28 of 1951 to recover the amount declared to be due to him by the decree in Suit No. 203 of 1949. It was contended in that darkhast, that the judgment-debtor had under the orders passed by the Income-tax authorities, paid an amount of Rs. 11,508-9-0 which was payable by the heirs of Kadarbhai to the Income-tax department and the judgment-debtor was to that extent discharged from liability, by virtue of s. 46(5A) of the Income-tax Act.

The learned Judge accepted the contention of the judgment-debtor and directed that execution do proceed after giving credit for Rs. 11,508-9-0 to the judgment-debtor. Against that order the judgment-creditor has appealed to this Court.

Section 46(5A) of the Income-tax Act in so far as it is material provides that the Income-tax Officer may by notice in writing require any person from whom money is due or may become due to the assessee or any person who holds or may subsequently hold money for or on account of the assessee to pay to the Income-tax Officer, so much of the money as is sufficient to pay the amount due by the tax-payer in respect of arrears of income-tax and penalty. By the third paragraph of sub-s. (5A) it is provided that any person making payment in compliance with the notice under this sub-section shall be deemed to have made the payment under the authority of the assessee and the receipt of the Income-tax Officer shall constitute a good and sufficient discharge of the liability of such person to the assessee to the extent of the amount referred to in the receipt.

In this case, the judgment-debtor was served with a notice issued by the Income-tax Officer under s. 46(5A) to pay Rs. 11,508-9-0 and the judgment-debtor complied with that notice. By the operation of the third paragraph of sub-s. (5A) of s. 46, the amount must be deemed to have been paid under the authority of the judgment-creditors. Of the heirs of Kadarbhai, the judgment-creditor claims to be an assignee and the judgment-debtor having paid the amount under the direction of the Income-tax Officer, he is by statute discharged from liability to the extent of the payment made.

But Mr. Chandrachud, who appears on behalf of the decree-holder, contends that under O. XXI, r. 2, of the Civil Procedure Code, a payment made by the judgment-debtor in satisfaction of the liability under a decree can only be recognised by the executing Court if it is certified by the Court which passed the decree, and payment by the judgment-debtor to the Income-tax Officer not being certified in the manner and on an application made within the period prescribed, the executing Court was incompetent to entertain the plea of partial discharge of liability by virtue of the provision contained in sub-r. (3) of r. 2, O. XXI, Civil Procedure Code. In other words it is submitted that even if the liability to pay the decretal amount is discharged by virtue of the provision contained in s. 46(5A) unless the payment is certified in the manner prescribed by O. XXI, r. 2, the Court executing the decree is unable to recognise the payment, and the only remedy of the judgment-debtor is to proceed in a criminal Court. We are unable to accept that contention. By the third paragraph of sub-s. (5A) of s. 46 liability under the decree is discharged to the extent of payment made by the judgment-debtor to the Income-tax department. It is the receipt issued by the Income-tax Officer acknowledging payment which by operation of the statute discharges the judgment-debtor's liability for the amount paid. Under the Civil Procedure Code there is an analogous provision in O. XXI, r. 46(3), which discharges liability of a garnishee on payment by him in Court of a debt in respect of which a prohibitory order is issued under cl. (4) of sub-r. (1) thereof. When a judgment-debtor resists execution in these and other analogous provisions, he asks the Court executing the decree to take note of the statutory discharge of liability and not the payment made.

He informs the Court that by operation of the statute, even though the decree-holder has not received the payment, the liability is to the extent of the payment discharged. In our judgment there is nothing in sub-r. (3) which precludes the Court executing the decree from recognizing the statutory discharge of liability to the extent of the payment made. Sub-rule (3) of O. XXI, r. 2 of the Civil Procedure Code is at best a rule of evidence; whereas s. 46(5A) of the Income-tax Act enacts a provision which extinguishes liability. In the absence of an intention clearly expressed or necessarily implied in the statute providing for that extinction, we will not be justified in holding that the statutory discharge of liability operates only when the payment is certified. By reason of the statutory discharge of liability under s. 46(5A) of the Income-tax Act, the decree-holder becomes incompetent to execute the decree for the amount paid by the judgment-debtor on behalf of the assessee to the Income-tax Officer.

We agree with the view of the learned trial Judge that the decree to the extent of the amount paid by the judgment-debtor was unenforceable and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Hindu Law—Stridhan—Non-Saudayika stridhan—Wife separated from husband and living apart from him as husband addicted to vices—Whether wife competent to dispose of by will her non-saudayika stridhan.

Under Hindu law a wife, who on account of incompatibility of temperament or other cause is separated from her husband and the marital home is broken up, is competent to dispose of her non-saudayika stridhan by will without the consent of her husband who is separated from her.

ONE Sonubai, wife of Narhari Kalbhor, by sale-deed, dated May 21, 1930, purchased a house, City Survey No. 292 of Somvar Peth, Poona, for Rs. 10,500. Sonubai had paid to the vendor Rs. 1,000 before the date of the sale-deed and the balance of Rs. 9,500 was paid in the presence of the Sub-Registrar. After purchasing this house Sonubai let it out to tenants. Sonubai was conducting a sweetmeat shop in City Survey No. 15 of Shukrawar Peth, Poona, and in the conduct of that business she was assisted by her son Baburao Narhari. Narhari—husband of Sonubai—was living apart from Sonubai. Sonubai made and executed a will on December 16, 1943, which was attested by N. W. Pandit, pleader, and Sitaram Vinayak. By that will, Sonubai purported to appoint Ramchandra Khanderao Korhale (plaintiff) as her executor, and she made various devises thereby. She devised the property substantially to her daughter and provided a legacy of Rs. 20 per month in favour of Shantabai—widow of her son Baburao. She also devised a legacy in favour of the plaintiff. Sonubai died on December 28, 1943. The plaintiff then applied to the District Court at Poona by Miscellaneous Application No. 49 of 1944 for probate of the will of Sonubai. Narhari—husband of Sonubai—contested the proceeding. By order, dated September 28, 1945, the District Court of Poona granted probate to the plaintiff of the will of Sonubai. Even after probate was granted to the plaintiff, in whom the estate had vested by virtue of his appointment as executor under the will of Sonubai, Shantabai (defendant), continued to remain in occupation of the house and declined to deliver possession to the plaintiff. The plaintiff then filed Suit No. 180 of 1953 in the Court of the Joint Civil Judge, Senior Division, Poona, against the defendant, for a decree for possession of the house and for Rs. 3,500 as mesne profits for three years prior to the date of the suit and for an order for payment of mesne profits from the date of the suit till delivery of possession and for costs of the suit. It was the plaintiff's case that the house in dispute had been purchased by Sonubai with her own fund, that it was her property and she was competent to make a will of which probate was granted to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was entitled to obtain possession of the house from the defendant who had no title thereto. The defendant by her written statement contended inter alia that the house in dispute belonged to Sonubai's husband Narhari and it had been purchased from the joint family funds in Sonubai's name, and accordingly Sonubai had acquired no title to the house, that Sonubai was not in possession of the property, that Narhari and his son Baburao were all along in possession of the property and were managing the same, that on the death of Narhari and Baburao she—the defendant—had become the owner of the house, that Sonubai had no authority to make a will devising the house, that the defendant was in possession and management of the property as the owner and that she the defendant was receiving an income of Rs. 75 per month from the tenants occupying the house. She also contended that she was in possession of the house as owner even during the life-time of Sonubai and was collecting the rents from the tenants.

The trial Judge negatived the contentions raised by the defendant and decreed the plaintiff's suit for possession and directed an inquiry into mesne profits for a period of three years prior to the date of the suit under O. XX, r. 12, of the Civil Procedure Code and also directed ascertainment of mesne profits from the date of the suit under O. XX, r. 12(1)(c), of the Civil Procedure Code. Against that decree the defendant appealed to the High Court.

B. D. Bal, with C. R. Dalvi, for the appellant.

K. B. Sukhankar, with A. A. Adarkar, for the respondent.

SHAH J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and holding that the house in dispute belonged to Sonubai and it was acquired by her out of a fund in which Narhari and Baburao were not shown to be interested, proceeded.] If the house was purchased from a fund acquired by Sonubai from her sweetmeat business, the house will be regarded as stridhan other than saudayika, and the question which then falls to be determined is whether that property could in law be disposed of by Sonubai by a will without the consent of her husband. A Hindu married woman's power to dispose of her stridhan depends on the character of the stridhan. For this purpose, stridhan is divided into two classes, (1) saudayika and (2) other kinds of stridhan. A married woman has absolute power of disposal over her saudayika stridhan. She may dispose of it by sale, gift, will, or in any other way she pleases, without the consent of her husband. Her husband has no control over it. He cannot bind her by any dealings with it. This rule is based upon Katyayana's text.

"What a woman, either after marriage or before it, either in the mansion of her husband or of her father, receives from her lord or her parents, is called a gift from affectionate kindred; and such a gift having by them been presented through kindness, that the women possessing it may live well, is declared by law to be their absolute property; the absolute exclusive dominion of women over such a gift is perpetually celebrated; and they have power to sell or give it away as they please, even though it consist of lands and houses. Neither the husband, nor the son, nor the father, nor the brother, have power to use or to alienate the legal property of a woman." (See Colebrooke's Digest of Hindu Law, Book V, p. 475).

Stridhan other than saudayika is subject to her husband's dominion; he is entitled to use it at his pleasure even if there be no distress, and it cannot be disposed of by a woman without her husband's consent. She cannot sell it, or make a gift of it, or bequeath it by her will, or otherwise deal with it without her husband's consent.

"But whatever wealth she may gain by arts, as by painting or spinning, or may receive on account of friendship from any but the kindred of her husband or her parents, her Lord alone has dominion over it; of her other property she may dispose without first obtaining his assent" (Katyayana) Colebrook's Digest, Vol. V, p. 581; and the text of Vyavahara Mayukha, Ch. IV, Sec. X, p. 93 (Mandlik's translation):

"As for the text—'A wife, a son, and a slave are all incapable of property. Whatever they earn, belongs to him to whom they belong', that too has reference to wealth acquired by mechanical arts and the like... Hence, says Manu (Ch. IX, v. 199):—'a woman should never make any expenditure out of the family [property] belonging to several or even [out of] her own wealth without the assent of her husband'."

The rule is, however, subject to an exception, that where the husband and wife have drifted apart and the wife is not under the control of her husband, she is regarded as competent to dispose of her non-saudayika stridhan without the assent of her husband. In Bhagvanlal v. Bai Divali,¹ a Division Bench of this Court held that a Hindu wife, who had lived apart from her husband for nearly 30 or 40 years, was competent to dispose of by will the property which she had inherited from her father, without the consent of her husband. Sir Norman Macleod, C.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court held that the husband and wife had lived apart for many years and the husband had lost all rights of control over the wife "so as to lose also the right to validate any disposition which she might make by will of property inherited by her from her paternal relations." He then observed: "We think this decision is in consonance with the views which would prevail at the present day in the community."

In the present case, the evidence of the plaintiff and of Nikam shows that Sonubai was living apart from her husband Narhari for about 35 years before her death. That evidence is supported by the admission made by the defendant that the grain-ration card was obtained in the name of Sonubai as the head of the family and not in the name of Narhari, and by the evidence of Godse, the photographer, who has stated that Narhari was not staying with Sonubai in 15, Shukrawar Peth, and that he had not seen him, and also by the recitals made in the will made by Sonubai in the first paragraph of which it is recited that Narhari was addicted to vices and thirty or thirty-five years before the date of the will on account of incompatibility of temperament the testatrix had separated from Narhari and had never lived with him thereafter, and that she herself had by starting a sweetmeat shop acquired the property devised thereby.

Mr. Bal contends that the evidence of the plaintiff is interested evidence and that of Nikam who is an insolvent is unreliable. Mr. Bal says that it was possible for the plaintiff to prove, if Narhari was staying apart from Sonubai, that he was paying rent for occupation of the premises in which it is alleged he resided but the plaintiff has not led that evidence. It is urged that the trial Judge was in error in relying upon the story of Godse that he had never seen Narhari living with Sonubai which was related by the witness in answer to the Court's question after the re-examination of the witness was concluded and the defendant had no opportunity to cross-examine the witness on the truth of the assertion made by him. Mr. Bal also submitted that the recitals made in the will by Sonubai must have been made at the instance of the plaintiff and under advice from some lawyer who prepared the will in the light of Bhagvanlal's case. He also relies upon the evidence of one Datar and contends that Narhari and Sonubai were living together and Sonubai was "under coverture" at the time when she made the will, and accordingly the will was ineffective, Narhari not having assented to the dispositions contained therein.

It is true that the plaintiff may be regarded as interested in the will because he himself is a devisee, and Nikam has admitted that he was adjudicated an insolvent. But on that account we are unable to hold that his testimony is unreliable. The witness, it appears, has written the accounts of the business conducted by Sonubai for 24 years and those account books were produced in the trial Court. The entries in the books of account relate to the business of the shop and the house which was purchased in the name of Sonubai. The story of the witness that he had occasion to meet Sonubai almost every day appears to be true. It is not suggested that this witness was interested in the subject-matter of the suit and we see no reason to disbelieve his testimony when he says that Sonubai and her husband Narhari were living apart for many years.

Even apart from this testimony, the recital in Sonubai's will that Narhari was addicted to vices and that on that account she had been living apart from him for 30 or 35 years has strong probative value. If Sonubai was living with Narhari, there was no reason for her to make this false recital in the will. We are unable to agree with the contention that relying upon the decision in Bhagvanlal's case some lawyer advised that in order to enable Sonubai to make a will of her property she had to allege that she was living apart from her husband for many years prior to the date of execution of the will, and with a view to make the will effective the plaintiff persuaded Sonubai to make a false recital that Narhari was addicted to vices and on that account Sonubai was living apart from him. If Sonubai, who was aged 65 years at the time of her will, had been living happily with her husband Narhari, and even if she was minded to dispose of the property in favour of the plaintiff and her daughter, there was no reason why she should be willing to make a false recital in the will and add thereto that her husband Narhari was addicted to vice and on that account she was living apart from her husband.

Witness Datar, who was a mortgagee of houses Nos. 14 and 15 in Shukrawar Peth in one of which Sonubai resided, has, it is true, stated that Narhari was living with Sonubai till 1938. The learned trial Judge who saw the witness in the witness-box has criticised the testimony of this witness and observed that this story was a "most shabby story" and he has given good reasons for discarding the testimony of this witness. The witness stated that when the house was mortgaged with possession before 1910 the management was with his father Dattatraya and after the death of his father in 1910, the management devolved upon Ramchandra Narayan—brother of the witness—who died in 1925 and since 1925 he, the witness, was managing the property till 1938 when it was redeemed. The witness also stated that about the year 1925 he had been told by Narhari that rent-receipts in respect of the premises occupied by Sonubai in the house under mortgage should be made out in the name of Sonubai and not in his name, and that accordingly the rent receipts were so made out. In cross-examination the witness admitted that he started managing the house some time in 1927-28 and that he had no personal knowledge about any earlier period. That evidently shows that his story that Narhari had told him that the rent receipts should be made out in the name of Sonubai cannot be true. The witness was shown a photograph in his cross-examination and he was able to identify Sonubai sitting at the counter of her shop but he was unable to say where Narhari or his son Baburao were in the photograph. If, as the witness pretends, he was familiar with Narhari and his son Baburao, it would not have been difficult for him to identify from the photograph, which includes a large number of persons, Baburao who, it is conceded, was actually in the photograph, and to state that Narhari was not in the photograph. The non-committal reply given by the witness shows, in our judgment, that the witness did not know Narhari and Baburao. The witness has not produced his books of account on the pretext that they had been destroyed in 1948. Admittedly the witness carries on the business of moneylending and it is difficult to accept the story that he had destroyed his books of account. He is unable to say who the other tenants residing in the house were. His memory with regard to several matters other than the one fact which he came to depose before the Court, viz., that Sonubai and Narhari were living together, appears to be extremely vague. The learned trial Judge who saw the witness and heard his testimony was not satisfied with that testimony, and sitting in appeal we are unable to disagree with the appreciation of the evidence of this witness by the learned trial Judge.

On the evidence which we have already referred to there can be no doubt that Sonubai and Narhari were living apart for many years prior to the date of Sonubai's will. Once we reach that conclusion, there is no reason why the recital made by Sonubai in the will that for more than thirty years prior to the date of the will she had been living apart because her husband Narhari was addicted to vices may not be accepted as true.

Mr. Bal contends that in Sarubai Balakdas v. Narayandas Bairagi,² Sir John Beaumont, C.J., differed from the principle of Bhagvanlal v. Bai Divali, and we may accept the view in the latter case as a correct exposition of the law. In Sarubai's case, on account of quarrels the plaintiff and his wife had lived apart for some twenty-five years. The plaintiff was living in a temple which belonged to him and the wife also resided in the same temple but in a separate room. The wife made a will a few days before her death and left her non-saudayika stridhan to her niece. After the death of the wife, a suit for a declaration of the title of the plaintiff to the property was filed, on the plea that the wife was not competent to dispose of the property as she had not obtained the plaintiff's consent before making the will. On these facts, in second appeal the learned Chief Justice held confirming the decree of the District Court, that the testatrix must be presumed to be "under coverture" when she made the will and she had no power to dispose of the property without the consent of her husband. Beaumont, C.J., observed after referring to Bhau v. Raghunath,³ that (p. 317):

"...The rule is expressed to apply to a woman under coverture, which is the expression used in the translation of the texts, and I must assume that the translations are accurate. The word 'coverture' under English law is synonymous with marriage, and a woman under coverture is simply a married woman...in English law a woman does not cease to be under coverture because she ceases to live with her husband."

Our attention has, however, not been invited to any text which can approximately be regarded as paraphrased by the rule stated by the learned Chief Justice. It is true that Jenkins, C.J., in Bhau's case (which it may incidentally be observed was on the question expressly decided thereby overruled in *Gajanan Yeshwant v. Pandurang Govind*⁴) after setting out Nilkanth Bhatt's text in the Vyavahara Mayukha, observed at page 238:

"This passage clearly indicates that, except as to the kind shown as saudayika, a woman's power of disposal over her stridhan is during coverture subject to her husband's consent."

But it would be unduly exalting the dictum of Sir Lawrence Jenkins to hold that by using the expression "during coverture" it was intended to convey that so long as the marriage tie subsisted the power of disposal of a Hindu woman over her stridhan was inexorably subject to her husband's consent.

The reason of the rule why non-saudayika stridhan is subject to the control of the husband is as stated by Sheshgiri Ayyar J. in Muthukaruppa Pillai v. Sellathammal,⁵ as follows (p. 299):

"...There is however an exception as regards gifts from strangers not given at the nuptial fire or during the marriage procession, and acquisitions made by means of mechanical arts by a married woman. They are subject to the control of the husband because the spirit of the Hindu law is against a married woman receiving gifts from strangers except at the time of marriage or from making acquisitions during coverture as she is expected to give her time and attention solely to the welfare of her husband and children and to the management of the household affairs."

Where a married Hindu woman is on account of incompatibility of temperament or other cause separated from her husband and the marital home is broken up, we are unable to appreciate why the wife should, before making an effective disposition of her property, be required to obtain the assent of her husband who is separated from her. The texts relating to the powers of Hindu women over their stridhan property were evolved at a period when the law-givers proclaimed the perpetual tutelage of woman (Manu IX 3), and as a necessary corollary thereto enjoined frugality in enjoyment of property held by them (Colebrook's Digest of Hindu Law, Book V, p. 477) and placed restrictions upon disposal thereof (Vyavahara Mayukha, Ch. IV, Sec. 8, pl. 3). At the time when the sages propounded the law, there was very little property a Hindu woman could possess and the society did not countenance a woman living apart from her husband. If in the context of that social order the law-givers ordained that stridhan other than saudayika cannot be disposed of by a Hindu woman without her husband's assent, that rule cannot, in our judgment, be made applicable to the Hindu society in the present days. We are unable to hold that the Hindu law is so static or so inelastic that in interpreting the texts the Courts are powerless to mould it to meet situations not contemplated at the time when it was declared and in the light of the consciousness of the society. If, having regard to the conditions prevailing many centuries ago, the rule was laid down by the law-givers that a Hindu married woman was not competent to dispose of her non-saudayika stridhan without the consent of her husband in the context of a society which did not contemplate separate residence of a Hindu woman from her husband, we will not in the present days be justified in holding, in a society which favours emancipation of women and does not look with disfavour upon a married woman for sufficient cause living apart from her husband, that even after the marital home is broken up the wife is still liable, before disposing of property acquired by her own exertions and of which she is the absolute owner, to obtain the assent of her husband. We are of the view that when a Hindu husband and wife have drifted apart and the marital home is broken up, the husband not only loses control over the wife but also loses control over the non-saudayika stridhan of the wife.

We may observe that in Sarubai's case from the facts found proved it appeared that the husband had not lost all control over the wife. They were living under the same roof, and the husband had even control over the residence of the wife. Sir John Beaumont C.J., in Sarubai's case did not, and could not, say that the principle of the judgment in Bhagvanlal's case was incorrect; and, with great respect, we regard the view expressed in Bhagvanlal's case as consistent with the notions of the present-day Hindu society.

MOHANLAL CHANDULAL AGARWAL v. JANU DASRAJI.*

Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act (XXIV of 1951), Secs. 10(1) & (2), 23, 3, 8, 9
 —Whether landholder can apply for enhancement of lease-money agreed upon at time of lease—Rights of lessee safeguarded under s. 23 whether rights granted to lessee by Act or rights allunde the Act—Whether s. 3 overrides other provisions of Act.

Under s. 10(2) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, a landholder can apply for enhancement of the lease-money which was agreed upon at the time of the lease.

The purpose of s. 23 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, is to provide that if a lessee possesses any rights independently of the Act, those rights are not limited or abridged by any of the provisions of the Act except the provisions contained in s. 7(1) of the Act. Therefore, the rights safeguarded are the rights which the lessee has acquired independently of the Act and not the rights granted to the lessee by the Act itself.

Section 3 of the Act must be read along with other sections of the Act, and not so that its provisions override other provisions of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

N. B. Chandurkar, for the petitioner.

N. L. Abhyankar, with S. V. Natu, for opponent No. 1.

TARKUNDE J. The petitioner is a landholder of two agricultural lands. In the year 1951-52, during which the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951 (XXIV of 1951) came into force, the two lands were in the possession of respondent No. 1 as a tenant. The rent agreed for the year was Rs. 150. By virtue of s. 3 of that Act, respondent No. 1 became a protected lessee. Another result of that section was that his lease was deemed to be for a period of five years from the year 1951-52 and by a subsequent amendment that period was extended to seven years. In the year 1954 the petitioner applied under s. 10(2) of the Act to the Sub-Divisional Officer for the determination of reasonable lease-money for the lands, alleging that the agreed rent was very low and that there was an understanding between him and the tenant that the rent was to be increased as the lands improved during the course of tillage. The Sub-Divisional Officer heard the parties and fixed the reasonable lease-money at Rs. 262-8-0 per year. On an appeal taken by respondent No. 1, the Additional Deputy Commissioner confirmed the decision of the Sub-Divisional Officer. Respondent No. 1 went in second appeal to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal, and the Bombay Revenue Tribunal allowed the appeal and set aside the orders of the Courts below. The decision of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal is challenged before us. The Tribunal held that s. 10(2) of the Act did not entitle the petitioner to apply for enhancement of lease-money and that the petitioner's application was not tenable in law. In coming to that conclusion, the Tribunal relied on their earlier Full Bench decision in Imamkhan v. Sheikh Gulam.³

Sub-section (1) of s. 10 of the Act, in so far as it is relevant, provides that

"the lease-money payable by a protected lessee shall be the lease-money agreed upon between such lessee and his landholder, or where there is no agreement or either party to the agreement considers the agreed lease-money as unreasonable, such reasonable lease-money as may be fixed by the Revenue Officer."

This is followed by sub-s. (2) which is in the following terms:

"For the determination of reasonable lease-money under sub-section (1), either the lessee or the landholder may apply in the prescribed form to a Revenue Officer within whose jurisdiction the land is situated."

Thus, by the express terms of sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 10, both the lessee and the landholder have been given the right of getting the reasonable lease-money determined by a Revenue Officer if either of them considers that the agreed lease-money is unreasonable. Despite this, the aforesaid Full Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal held that a landholder cannot apply for enhancement of the lease-money which was agreed upon at the time of the lease; and in coming to this conclusion the Full Bench relied upon the terms of s. 23 of the Act. Section 23 says:

"Save as otherwise provided in sub-section (1) of section 7, no other provision contained in this Act shall be construed to limit or abridge the rights or privileges of any lessee under any usage or law for the time being in force or arising out of any contract, grant, decree or order of a Court or otherwise howsoever."

The Full Bench of the Tribunal held that under s. 3 of the Act the contractual lease between the parties is deemed to be for a period of seven years; that the lease must be deemed to have continued with all the terms and conditions thereof including the term with regard to the lease-money; and that the right so given to the tenant by s. 3 cannot be limited or abridged by anything contained in s. 10, because s. 23 expressly bars any such construction being placed on s. 10.

We are, with respect, unable to accept this view. We agree that s. 3 of the Act creates a legal fiction, and the effect of the legal fiction is that the lease is deemed to be for a period of seven years from 1951-52 with its original terms and conditions. But the rights which are thus granted to the protected lessee by s. 3 of the Act are subject to certain limitations placed by the Act itself; and s. 23 cannot be so construed as to place those rights above the said limitations. For instance, s. 8 of the Act enables a landholder to apply to the Revenue Officer for terminating the lease of a protected lessee on various grounds, such as, that the lessee has failed to pay the lease-money on or before a particular date. Section 9 enables a landholder in certain circumstances to terminate the lease if he requires the land for personal cultivation. These and similar rights granted to the landholder operate as limitations on the security of tenure given to the tenant by s. 3 of the Act, and there is no reason why the right granted to the landholder by s. 10 of the Act of getting reasonable lease-money determined by a Revenue Officer should not have the same effect. Section 3 must be read along with other sections of the Act, and not so that its provisions override other provisions of the Act. If the view of the Revenue Tribunal were accepted, a part of s. 10 would be rendered wholly nugatory, because in no circumstances would a landholder be able to get reasonable lease-money determined by a Revenue Officer, although such a right has been expressly granted to him by that section.

In our view, the purpose of s. 23 of the Act is altogether different. Its purpose is to provide that if a lessee possesses any rights independently of the Act, those rights are not limited or abridged by any of the provisions of the Act except the provision contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 7. Section 7(1) prohibits a protected lessee from transferring his right in the land; so that the effect of this provision read with s. 23 is that even where a protected lessee had the right, independently of the Act, of transferring his leasehold interest, that right is no longer available to him. Subject to this exception, the rights of a lessee are safeguarded by s. 23. But the rights so safeguarded are the rights which the lessee has acquired independently of the Act and not the rights which are granted to the lessee by the Act itself. In the present case, the right of respondent No. 1, the lessee, to remain in possession of the lands on payment of the annual lease-money of Rs. 150 in and after 1952-53 was wholly the creation of s. 3 of the Act; and s. 23 cannot be so construed as to safeguard that right against the other provisions of the Act.

In support of their conclusion, the Full Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal relied on the decision of Chagla C.J. in Dullab Ganpat v. Vallab Ganpat.² That case arose under the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939; and construing the provisions of that Act corresponding to the provisions of ss. 3, 10 and 23 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, the learned Chief Justice held that the landlord had no right to get the agreed rent enhanced by applying for the determination of reasonable rent. In that case, however, the contractual lease was for a period of ten years, independently of the legal fiction created by one of the sections of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939, and it was during the pendency of this contractual lease that the landlord had applied for determination of reasonable rent by the Mamlatdar. The learned Chief Justice held that the contractual right of the tenant could not be abridged or limited by recourse to the provision in the Act which enabled the Mamlatdar to fix reasonable rent. In a subsequent case *Sitaram Vithal Chitnis v. Shri Gundu Satyappa Dhade*³, the learned Chief Justice, delivering the judgment of a Division Bench consisting of himself and Dixit J., had occasion to refer to the judgment delivered by him in Dullab Ganpat v. Vallab Ganpat. Referring to his decision in the earlier case, the learned Chief Justice observed:

"I construed the Act as giving special rights to the tenant, and one further special right was that if he had any right aliunde the Act, that right was safeguarded and that right could not be taken away under the Tenancy Act. But the particular facts I was dealing with in that case were that there was a subsisting lease under which the tenant was liable to pay a certain amount as rent, the landlord applied for the fixation of reasonable rent, and the Mamlatdar fixed the reasonable rent at a higher amount than the contractual rent, and what I held was that as the tenant had a right under the contract to pay a certain rent, that right could not be taken away by the provision of the Act by which the reasonable rent was fixed at a higher amount."

It is thus clear that our view with regard to the scope and construction of s. 23 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act is in no way different from the view taken by the learned Chief Justice about the corresponding provision of the Bombay Tenancy Act.

On behalf of respondent No. 1 Mr. Abhyankar argued before us that s. 23 of the Act safeguards the right of a lessee "arising out of any contract"; that section provides by a legal fiction that the right of respondent No. 1 in this case to pay Rs. 150 as lease-money is a right arising out of a contract; and that the legal fiction must be given full effect by placing that contractual right beyond the limitation comprised in s. 10. Alternatively, Mr. Abhyankar argued that if the said right of respondent No. 1 cannot be regarded as a right arising out of a contract, it was a right "arising...otherwise howsoever", and in that event also, it should receive the protection of s. 23. We are unable to accept either of these arguments. In either case, the right claimed by respondent No. 1 arises by virtue of the provisions of s. 3, and cannot stand independently of it. Section 23 does not safeguard any right derived from the provisions of the Act, whether that right is granted by creating a legal fiction or otherwise.

In the result, we hold that the application of the petitioner for the determination of reasonable lease-money under s. 10(2) of the Act is maintainable, and set aside the decision of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. As the Bombay Revenue Tribunal have not dealt with the merits of the appeal before them, the appeal is restored with a direction that the Tribunal will deal with the same according to law. In the circumstances of the case, there will be no order as to costs.

S. T. DESAI J. A question of considerable importance and some interest arises on this application under the new Companies Act of 1956 and the question relates to the tenure of office of what are usually described as directors elected at annual general meetings of companies. Section 166 of the new Companies Act lays down that the first annual general meeting shall be held by a company within eighteen months of its incorporation. It also lays down that the next annual general meeting of the company shall be held by it within nine months after the expiry of the financial year in which the first annual general meeting was held; and thereafter an annual general meeting shall be held by the company within nine months after the expiry of each financial year. Stripped of details, the provision for years subsequent to the first annual general meeting is that a company shall call its annual general meeting within nine months after the expiry of its financial year. That provision is mandatory. It is express and explicit. Ordinarily, elected directors of companies are not appointed for any specified period of time in term of years. They retire by rotation and they retire from their office of directorship at a date which would be the date of the statutory annual general meeting of the company. The question which we have to determine is whether in a case where despite the mandatory provisions of s. 166 and in breach of their duty as directors, the directors do not call an annual general meeting of the company for any length of time, can they claim to continue in their office of director after the expiry of the period mentioned in the section for calling the statutory meeting. Prima facie the contention that they can continue to hold the office in any such case would seem wholly unsound. But we are told that there is a provision in the Companies Act, which, if properly interpreted, leads to such an undesirable result.

The application before us is by the Colaba Land and Mills Co. Ltd. and the circumstances in which it is made are these. On April 14, 1955, the annual general meeting of the company was held for the year 1954. The financial year of this company, which is a public company, ends on December 31. At that meeting Jayantilal N. Patel retired by rotation and being eligible for re-election was re-elected as a director. The annual general meeting for the year 1955 was held on March 29, 1956. At that meeting V. J. Pilani retired by rotation and being eligible for re-election was re-elected. The annual general meeting for the year 1956 has not been called to this date. The period for holding that meeting was extended by the Registrar upto March 31, 1958. Even so that meeting was not held. Nor has the annual general meeting for the year 1957 been held to this date. Between March 1957 and November 1957 there were certain changes in the constitution of the Board of Directors of the company as some directors resigned and one of them died. In November 1957 the position as regards the personnel of the Board of Directors of the company was this:

(1) V. J. Pilani who had been elected in the annual general meeting of the shareholders on March 29, 1956.

(2) Jayantilal Patel who had been elected in the annual general meeting of the shareholders of the company on April 14, 1955.

(3) K. J. Pilani who had been elected in the annual general meeting of the shareholders on April 22, 1954.

(4) R. S. Sethna who had been appointed by the Central Government on November 12, 1957.

(5) F. S. Wadia who had been appointed by the Central Government on November 21, 1957.

(6) Solomon Moses who was elected as an additional director of the company under s. 260. That was in November, 1957.

On September 30, 1958, the personnel of the Board of Directors of the company was the same with this difference that K. J. Pilani who, it was said, had vacated his office, was co-opted as a director on September 8, 1958. An objection was raised by one of the directors appointed by the Central Government to the attitude taken up by two of the directors, Jayantilal Patel and Solomon Moses that they had continued to be directors of the company, although if annual general meetings of the company had been held as required by s. 166, they would have retired long since. Their contention was that despite non-conformity with the provisions of s. 166 they continued to be directors of the company and were entitled to act as such till the date when an annual general meeting of the company might be held in future. The company has come before us on this application and the question we are asked to determine is whether Jayantilal Patel and/or Solomon Moses have ceased to be directors of the company.

The relevant part of s. 166 of the new Companies Act to which we have already made some reference may be set out here:

"166. Annual general meeting.—(1) (a) Every company shall, in addition to any other meetings, hold a general meeting which shall be styled its annual general meeting at the intervals, and in accordance with the provisions, specified below.

(b) The first annual general meeting shall be held by a company within eighteen months of its incorporation.

(c) The next annual general meeting of the company shall be held by it within nine months after the expiry of the financial year in which the first annual general meeting was held; and thereafter an annual general meeting shall be held by the company within nine months after the expiry of each financial year:

Provided that the Registrar may, for any special reason, extend the time within which any annual general meeting (not being the first annual general meeting) shall be held, by a further period not exceeding six months.

(d) Except in the case referred to in the foregoing proviso, not more than fifteen months shall elapse between the date of one annual general meeting and that of the next." Section 167 empowers the Central Government to call an annual general meeting where default is made in holding an annual general meeting in accordance with s. 166. Section 168 is material and it inflicts penalty for default in complying with the provisions of s. 166. The company and every officer of the company who is in default is liable to punishment with fine which may extend to Rs. 5,000. The other material sections are ss. 255 and 256 which are as under:

"255. Appointment of directors and proportion of those who are to retire by rotation.—(1) Not less than two-thirds of the total number of directors of a public company, or of a private company which is a subsidiary of a public company, shall—

(a) be persons whose period of office is liable to determination by retirement of directors by rotation; and

(b) save as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, be appointed by the company in general meeting.

(2) The remaining directors in the case of any such company, and the directors generally in the case of a private company which is not a subsidiary of a public company, shall, in default of and subject to any regulations in the articles of the company, also be appointed by the company in general meeting."

"256. Ascertainment of directors retiring by rotation and filling of vacancies.—

(1) At the first annual general meeting of a public company, or a private company which is a subsidiary of a public company, held next after the date of the general meeting at which the first directors are appointed in accordance with section 255 and at every subsequent annual general meeting, one-third of such of the directors for the time being as are liable to retire by rotation, or if their number is not three or a multiple of three, then, the number nearest to one-third, shall retire from office.

(2) The directors to retire by rotation at every annual general meeting shall be those who have been longest in office since their last appointment, but as between persons who became directors on the same day, those who are to retire shall, in default of and subject to any agreement among themselves, be determined by lot.

(3) At the annual general meeting at which a director retires as aforesaid, the company may fill up the vacancy by appointing the retiring director or some other person thereto..."

V. J. Pilani, respondent No. 2, Jayantilal Patel, respondent No. 4 and K. J. Pilani are represented by different counsel and have made their submissions before us. The company is represented by separate counsel and the company has also made its submissions before us. Solomon Moses, although he is not a party to the petition, is also represented by counsel. Learned counsel for the company as well as these directors have pressed before us the contention that the position in law is that even though there is a breach of the statutory duty on the part of the directors in not calling an annual general meeting of the company as required by law, they continue and will continue to be the directors of the company till an annual general meeting is in fact held. The directors appointed by the Central Government have opposed that contention. The greatest reliance has been placed by learned counsel for those directors and the company on certain words in s. 256 of the Act and the words are: "At the first annual general meeting" and "at every subsequent annual general meeting". It is urged that the directors who are liable to retire by rotation continue to hold their office as directors till the annual general meeting is in fact held. It is said that there is no other provision in the Act which indicates any contrary rule. It is also said that if the directors have committed a breach of the statutory requirement of s. 166 pertaining to calling of annual general meetings, that is irrelevant for the present purpose and if it has any relevance that would only be on the question of penalty which may be inflicted on them under s. 168 for default in complying with the provisions of s. 166 relating to calling of annual general meetings. It is urged that support is to be derived for this construction when reference is made to the proviso to sub-cl. (c) of s. 166(1) which empowers the Registrar for any special reasons to extend for a further period not exceeding six months the time within which an annual general meeting should be held. It is pointed out that if the view pressed for the acceptance of the Court by the directors appointed by the Central Government were to be accepted, the directors would ordinarily retire at the expiry of nine months from the date of the end of the financial year of the company, and if thereafter the Registrar were to extend the time for the calling of the annual general meeting, the directors who had vacated their office on retirement would not be able to seek re-election. It is difficult to see why they would not be able to seek re-election. But assuming that it is so, we do not see how that can affect the legal position. Another hardship sought to be pointed out on behalf of the company was that if the Central Government were to intervene and call an annual general meeting at a later date, the directors who would be treated as having vacated their office latest at the end of nine months from the expiry of the financial year of the company would be prejudiced. There is no substance in this suggestion either. The question that we have to consider really lies in a very narrow compass and it is whether the tenure of the elected directors can continue after the expiry of the statutory period laid down for calling an annual general meeting? Section 255, as we have already mentioned, is material. It deals with the appointment of directors and proportion of those who are to retire by rotation. Clause (a) of sub-s. (1) speaks of two-thirds of the number of directors as persons whose period of office is liable to termination by retirement of directors by rotation. Section 256 speaks of annual general meeting. But evidently it proceeds on the basis that the annual general meeting has been called as required by statute i.e. s. 166. In our judgment it speaks of directors who till the date of the actual calling of the meeting continued to be directors in accordance with the provisions of law. A person who is to cease to be a director by retirement at the expiry of a stated time cannot claim to have escaped such retirement simply because an annual general meeting had not been called as required by law within that time. Section 256 does not include those who vacated their office. It only applies to directors who had not already vacated their office or ceased to be directors by operation of any provision of law. It has nothing to do with the tenure of the office of a director in the proper sense of that expression. The marginal note of s. 256, which we may look at for the purpose of seeing the trend of the section, speaks of ascertainment of directors retiring by rotation and filling of vacancies. It does not lay down any substantive rule as to the tenure of the office of a director. It is not the only section which has to be considered. We have to ascertain the tenure of the office of an elected director not merely from that section but from the language of ss. 166, 255 and 256 read together.

In the context of the tenure of the office of an elected director, the general meeting at which a director liable to retire by rotation "shall retire from office" must, in our judgment, be understood to be a general meeting called in accordance with the mandatory provisions of s. 166. It is extremely difficult to see how that tenure of office can be extended simply by not calling the annual general meeting and taking shelter under the language of s. 256 which, as we have already said, does not lay down any substantive provision relating to the tenure of the office of an elected director. Mr. Bhabha, learned counsel for respondents Nos. 9 and 10 is, in our opinion, right when he says that persons who have committed a breach of their duty by not calling the required annual general meeting within the statutory time cannot be permitted to say that they have not vacated their office because in fact an annual general meeting has not been called. What we have to consider is the meaning and effect of the sections to which we have already made reference, and reading those sections, we find little difficulty in reaching the conclusion that a director vacates his office at the latest on the last day on which an annual general meeting could have been called as required by s. 166. Now, it is not as if there is no authority in support of the view which we are inclined to take. There is a considerable body of authority in England on the construction of the analogous provisions relating to directors and there are two authorities of Courts in India, one a decision of the Madras High Court and another a decision of the Calcutta High Court. It is not necessary for us to examine the English decisions in any detail since that has been done in the Madras decision to which we shall presently turn. But before we do so, it is necessary to examine the position in law on this question before the Indian Companies Act of 1956 found place on the statute book. Section 17(2) of the Companies Act of 1913 was as under:

"Articles of Association may adopt all or any of the regulations contained in Table A in the First Schedule and shall in any event be deemed to contain regulations identical with or to the same effect as regulation 53, regulation 66, regulation 71, regulations 78, 79, 80, 81 and 82, regulation 95, regulation 97, regulation 105, regulation 107 and regulations 112, 113, 114, 115 and 116 contained in that Table."

We are only concerned with art. 78 mentioned above which was to be deemed to be contained in the articles of association of every company. That regulation was as under:

"At the first ordinary meeting of the company, the whole of the directors shall retire from office, and at the ordinary meeting in every subsequent year, one-third of the directors for the time being or, if their number is not three or a multiple of three, then the number nearest to one-third shall retire from office."

The wording of the analogous provision in English law which was also a regulation was in pari materia. By the Companies (Amendment) Act of 1936, s. 861 was added in our Companies Act of 1913 which dealt with the question of vacation of office of a director. Sub-section (2) of that section was as under:

"Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to preclude a company from providing by its articles that the office of director shall be vacated on grounds additional to those specified in this section."

The position that emerges from the provisions in the Companies Act of 1913 is similar to that under the present s. 256.

A question arose in the case decided by the Madras High Court reported in *Ananthalakshmi v. Indian Trades and Investments*¹ as to whether directors who under the articles of association should have retired from the Board of Directors at any annual general meeting should be held to have vacated their office and ceased to be directors of the company on the last day on which an annual general meeting could have been held. The question was answered by the Court in the affirmative and it was held that the directors had vacated their office despite the fact that an annual general meeting of the company had in fact not been called. The judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice Venkatarama Ayyar (as he then was) and in the course of his judgment his Lordship examined the decisions of Courts in England. The first time when the point came to be decided in England was in 1914 and that was in the case of Consolidated Nickel Mines, Limited, In re.² That decision has been accepted as laying down the correct legal position under the analogous provisions in England without being questioned at any time since 1914. So firmly is the rule accepted as established that when the identical question arose in another case in 1944 counsel appearing for the parties accepted the decision in Consolidated Nickel Mines, Limited, In re. That decision was accepted in the latter case in the trial Court, also before the Court of Appeal and also before the House of Lords in which the leading speech was of Lord Simonds. All those decisions and the observations there made have been considered by Venkatarama Ayyar J. in the Madras case and it is not necessary for us to rehearse the same. The conclusion reached by the Court was that a director who was bound to retire by rotation as well as a director who was an additional director being co-opted by the other directors should be treated as having vacated their office on the last day on which the annual general meeting of the company could have been held. Incidentally, we may observe that the editors of leading text books on the subject in England have referred to the English decisions as laying down the law on the subject. We are in respectful agreement with the decision of the Madras High Court.

Our attention, however, has been drawn to a decision of the Calcutta High Court where a different view appears to have been taken. That case is reported in *Kailash Chandra v. Jogesh Chandra*³ and this is all that is stated in that case (p. 870):

"With regard to the merits, the Articles of Association provided that the directors should be elected annually at a general meeting. It follows, therefore, that so long as the general meeting is not held in which the directors are to be elected the directors elected at the previous meeting would continue in office. It is contended by the learned advocate for the respondent that according to the true interpretation of the articles the directors would hold office only for one year from the date of their appointment; and if no general meeting is held at the lapse of one year the directors would automatically vacate their office and the company would go on without any directors at all. I am unable to accept this contention of the learned advocate as it seems to me that it would be unreasonable to hold that this is the true meaning of the Articles of Association."

With great respect, we are unable to agree with this opinion. It appears that the attention of the learned Judges was not drawn to many aspects of the matter nor does it appear that their attention was drawn to the accepted position under the analogous provisions of the English law.

A distinction is sought to be made between the position of a director liable to retire by rotation and an additional director and we have been referred to s. 260 which deals with additional directors. That section is as under:

"Nothing in sections 253, 258 or 259 shall affect any power conferred on the Board of directors by the articles to appoint additional directors:

Provided that such additional directors shall hold office only upto the date of the next annual general meeting of the company:

Provided further that the number of the directors and additional directors together shall not exceed the maximum strength fixed for the Board by the articles."

It is said that here the words used are: "shall hold office only upto the date of the next annual general meeting" and therefore, in any event in case of additional director, he would not vacate his office until the date of the next annual general meeting. We do not think any emphasis can be laid on the words "upto the date of the next annual general meeting". The expression "upto the date" had to be used in the context of the section because the position of an additional director is in certain respects different from the position of an elected director. One-third of the elected directors have to go out by rotation and in computing the number of directors, the additional directors are not to be taken into consideration. Therefore, it may well be that the Legislature thought it desirable that the words "upto the date" should be inserted in the section instead of "at the annual general meeting". This difference in language does not affect the real question before us.

In our opinion, therefore, both Jayantilal N. Patel and Solomon Moses had ceased to be the directors of the company.

The company will pay the costs of this application fixed at Rs. 500 of Mr. Nariman's client, who is a director appointed by the Central Government. The company will also pay the costs of Mr. Bhabha's clients who are respondents Nos. 9 and 10 of this application fixed at Rs. 500.

THE NATIONAL UNION OF COMMERCIAL EMPLOYEES v. M. R. MEHER.*

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), Secs. 2(j)(k), 22FF—Constitution of India, arts. 19(1)(g), 276—Bombay Shops and Establishments Act (Bom. LXXIX of 1948), Sec. 2(4)—Solicitor's profession whether an industry within the meaning of Industrial Disputes Act—Dispute between firm of solicitors and its employees whether can be subject of reference under Act.

The profession of a solicitor is not an industry within the meaning of the word in the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, and therefore a dispute between a firm of solicitors and its employees is not an industrial dispute which could be the subject of a reference under the Act.

An essential requisite of industry is the existence of relationship of master and servant. This relationship must exist in the industry itself. Only that business, trade, undertaking or calling can be held to be an industry, which requires the co-operation of both the employer and the employees for carrying on that business, trade, undertaking or calling.

A partnership deed between them was executed on January 14, 1929. This partnership came to an end in November 1935 when Mr. Amin retired from the partnership. A new deed of partnership was then executed between Messrs. Pereira and Fazalbhoy respondents Nos. 2 and 3. They carried on the practice of solicitors in the name of Messrs. Pereira Fazalbhoy & Co. This partnership was dissolved on March 31, 1946. From April 1, 1946, there were three partners, Messrs. Pereira, Fazalbhoy and Desai, respondents Nos. 2, 3 and 4. They carried on their practice as solicitors in the name of Messrs. Pereira Fazalbhoy & Co. until November 15, 1957, when the firm was dissolved. firm and submitted certain demands on behalf of the employees of the firm. The demands related to bonus for the years ending March 31, 1955, March 31, 1956, and March 31, 1957, and to certain other matters. As no agreement could be reached between the parties, conciliation proceedings were started. The conciliation Officer could not also bring about a settlement between the parties. He submitted a report to Government who on February 3, 1958, referred the dispute in regard to bonus for two years ending March 31, 1956, and March 31, 1957, to an Industrial Tribunal under sub-s. (5) of s. 12 of the Industrial Disputes Act. Respondents Nos. 2 to 4, to whom I will hereafter refer as the respondents, raised a preliminary objection that the profession followed by them, which is that of solicitors, was not an industry within the meaning of this word in the Industrial Disputes Act, that consequently the dispute between them and their employees was not an industrial dispute, that the reference made by Government was, therefore, bad in law, and that the Tribunal had no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon it. This objection was upheld by the Tribunal. The Tribunal, therefore, passed an order that the reference could not be adjudicated upon. This order is challenged in the present Special Civil Application.

When this application came up for hearing, Mr. Banaji appeared on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society, which is a representative society of the solicitors practising in this Court, registered under the Indian Companies Act. Mr. Banaji stated that the Society was vitally interested in the matter, as the decision given in this case would affect not only the respondents, but all the solicitors and attorneys practising in this Court. He, therefore, requested that the Society should be allowed to appear in the present application. We granted the permission asked for, as our decision will affect all persons following the profession of solicitors. We also adjourned the hearing of the application for two days in order to enable any other Union of persons employed in the offices of other solicitors to make an application for being allowed to appear, in case it chose to do so. No such application was, however, made to us.

To appreciate the arguments, which have been advanced in this case, it is necessary to consider certain provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act. The object of the Act, as stated in the preamble, is to make provision for the investigation and settlement of industrial disputes. The Act has, therefore, been enacted to provide for the settlement of only those disputes, which are of an industrial character, and not of all disputes between employers and employees. Clause (j) in s. 2 of the Act defines the word "industry" as follows:

"'industry' means any business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of employers and includes any calling, service, employment, handicraft, or industrial occupation or avocation of workmen;"

The expression "industrial dispute" is defined in cl. (k) as meaning

"any dispute or difference between employers and employees, or between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, which is connected with the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment or with the conditions of labour, of any person."

Another definition, which is material, is that of the word "workman", who is defined as meaning any person employed in any industry to do any skilled or unskilled manual, supervisory, technical or clerical work for hire or reward. The rest of the definition of this word is not material in this case. "Workman" is therefore defined as meaning any person employed in any industry. "Industrial dispute" means, so far as is material, a dispute between employers and workmen, that is, between employers and persons employed in an industry. Before there can, therefore, be a workman or industrial dispute, there must first be an industry.

The principal question to be decided in this application, therefore, is whether the profession of a solicitor can be said to be an industry within the meaning of the Act. Mr. Gokhale, who appears on behalf of the petitioners, has strenuously contended that such a profession would fall within the words "business," "undertaking" and "calling" contained in the definition of the word

"industry". All these three words are not defined in the Act. We, therefore, have to consider their ordinary dictionary meaning. In Webster's Dictionary the meaning given to "business" is that which busies or engages time, attention or labour; constant employment; regular occupation; work. In Halsbury, Vol. XXXII, 1939 edn., in para. 487, it is stated that "trade in its primary meaning is the exchanging of goods for goods or goods for money; and in a secondary meaning it is any business carried on with a view to profit, whether manual or mercantile, as distinguished from the liberal arts or learned professions and from agriculture."

In para. 488 it is stated that business is a wider term, not synonymous with "trade", and means practically anything which is an occupation as distinguished from a pleasure. In para. 489 the learned author has observed that profit or intent to make profit is not an essential part of the legal definition of a trade or business. The word "business" is, therefore, a wider term than "trade", and according to its dictionary meaning it includes any occupation. Mr. Khambata, who appears on behalf of the respondents, has urged that as the word "business" is followed by the word "trade", it must take its colour from the latter word "trade", and that the business referred to in the definition is, therefore, only that kind of business which is analogous to or which is in the nature of a trade. The latter part of the definition, which includes any calling, service, employment or industrial occupation within the meaning of industry, however, seems to indicate that the two words are not necessarily used in an analogous sense.

It is, however, difficult to accept Mr. Gokhale's argument that the profession of a solicitor is an undertaking. The word "undertaking", as defined in the Webster's Dictionary, means anything undertaken; any business, work or project, which one engages in or attempts; an enterprise. In Province of Bombay v. Western India Automobile Assn.,¹ at p. 66 it was observed that an undertaking is something different from business, trade or manufacture. In Hospital Mazdoor Sabha v. Bombay State,² at p. 774 it was observed that the expression "undertaking" is a term of wide import and is nothing more than any work or project which a person might engage in and that such work or project might have no commercial implications. The word "undertaking" is also used in s. 25FF and s. 25FFF of the Act. Section 25FF begins with the words "Where the ownership or management of an undertaking is transferred..." In these sections "undertaking" is, therefore, used in the sense of an enterprise, which can be owned and transferred. A solicitor's work, which depends entirely on his own personal intellectual ability, is not capable of being transferred. Consequently it would not be an "undertaking" within the meaning of the Act.

The word "calling" is however very wide. According to its dictionary meaning, it means one's usual occupation, vocation, business or trade. Both the words "business" and "calling" are therefore words of wide connotation. If, therefore, the ordinary dictionary meaning is to be given to them, it will be difficult to hold that the practice of the profession of a solicitor is not an industry. In fact it would not be easy to conceive of any profession, which would not then fall within the definition of this expression. This could not be the object of the Legislature: The words "business" and "calling" must be read in their context and in conjunction with other words, which are used in the same definition and from which they must take their colour. The word "calling" is followed by the words "of employers." The latter part of the definition contains the words, "occupation or avocation of workmen." The words "employer" and "workmen" necessarily import the relationship of employer and employee. An essential requisite of industry is, therefore, the existence of relationship of master and servant. This was so held in Province of Bombay v. Western India Automobile Assn., in which it was observed that what is really emphasised in the definition of "industry" is the relationship of employers and workers.

This relationship of master and servant or employer and employee must, however, exist in the industry itself. In other words, only that business, trade, undertaking or calling can be held to be an industry, which requires the co-operation of both the employer and the employees for carrying on that business, trade, undertaking or calling. This is also the ordinary concept of the word "industry". In Webster's Dictionary this word is defined as "any department or branch of art, occupation, or business, especially one which employs much labour and capital and is a distinct branch of trade."

Another definition given in the same dictionary is

"systematic labour or habitual employment; especially human exertion employed for creation of value regarded by some as species of capital or wealth; labour."

In its ordinary meaning "industry", therefore, imports the concept of co-operation between the employer and the employed. In order that an enterprise may constitute an industry, it must, therefore, be one for the carrying on of which, it is necessary to employ labour. In other words, it must be one which requires the joint effort of both the employer and the employed.

Mr. Gokhale has contended that under the definition of the word "industry" given in the Act, two things are necessary in order to constitute industry. There must be a business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling, and, secondly, there must be relationship of master and servant. If these two are present, the enterprise will be an industry within the meaning of the Act. Mr. Gokhale has, therefore, urged that every occupation or business, in which persons are employed, is an industry within the meaning of the Act. This argument ignores the basic concept of industry, which is that there must be joint endeavour of both the employer and the employed. The argument, if accepted, would lead to astounding results. The business of a hawker would have to be held to be an industry, if he employs a labourer to carry his basket. So also the business of a petty shop-keeper, like that of a panshop, will have to be held to be an industry, if a servant is employed to sweep and clean the shop. A doctor, who visits his patients, would be deemed to be engaged in an industry, if he employs a peon to carry his bag containing instruments and medicines. Several other similar instances could be envisaged. We have no doubt that the Legislature could not have intended that the Act should result in such drastic and serious consequences.

In any case, the basic concept of industry has always been held to be that there must be co-operation between the employer and the employees, either in producing wealth or in the rendering services. In other words, what comes out of the industry must be the result of the combined effort of both. That the Legislature had this concept in mind is indicated by the use of the words "of employer" in the first part of the definition and the words "employment, or industrial occupation or avocation of workmen" in the second part. In Hariprasad Shivshankar v. A. D. Divelkar,³ at p. 389, the Supreme Court has observed:

"It is true that an artificial definition may include a meaning different from or in excess of the ordinary acceptance of the word which is the subject of definition; but there must then be compelling words to show that such a meaning different from or in excess of the ordinary meaning is intended. Where, within the framework of the ordinary acceptance of the word, every single requirement of the definition clause is fulfilled, it would be wrong to take the definition as destroying the essential meaning of the word defined."

There are no compelling words to show that the Legislature intended to exclude the essential concept of industry from the definition given to this word in the Act.

Mr. Gokhale has urged that the concept of industry has changed in recent times. That is undoubtedly so. As pointed out by the Supreme Court in *D. N. Banerji v. P. B. Mukherjee*⁴ (p. 307):

"In the ordinary or non-technical sense, according to what is understood by the man in the street, industry or business means an undertaking where capital and labour co-operate with each other for the purpose of producing wealth in the shape of goods, machines, tools etc., and for making profits."

In the same case it has been pointed out that the profit motive is no longer regarded as an essential element of industry. From the observations made at p. 312 it appears that the investment of capital in the ordinary sense is no longer a sine qua non or necessary element in the modern conception of industry. It was, therefore, held in this case that the expression "industrial dispute" in the Industrial Disputes Act includes disputes between municipalities and their employees in branches of work that can be regarded as analogous to the carrying on of a trade or business. It is also not in dispute that the word "industry" can no longer be limited to enterprises which are engaged in the production of wealth, goods or other commodities. Relying on the observations of Isaacs J. in Federated State School Teachers' Association of Australia v. State of Victoria,⁵ Mr. Gokhale has contended that rendering of services may by itself be sufficient to make an organisation an industry. We are inclined to accept this argument, particularly having regard to the fact that the second part of the definition includes any service within the term "industry". But as I will point out presently, in the same case, for a service to be regarded as industry, Isaacs J. himself considered co-operation between employer and employees as being a necessary requisite.

The pursuit of a learned profession like that of a solicitor does not require any co-operation of labour. A solicitor offers his own personal services, or, to put it in different words, is paid for the legal advice and legal assistance given by him personally. His staff cannot do this work or give legal aid to his clients. The money which he earns is for work done by him personally. Its quality depends on his personal qualifications, his brains, his knowledge of law, and the labour put in by him personally. The remuneration earned by him depends upon his personal reputation and the kind and quality of work done by him personally. His staff performs what may be called ministerial functions by typing his opinions, or the documents prepared by him, or by maintaining accounts of his income and expenditure. There is no co-operation between or joint effort of the employer and the employee in this profession, nor is such co-operation or combined effort indispensable for carrying on the profession. An essential requisite of the concept of industry is, therefore, wanting. Consequently, such a profession cannot be said to be an industry within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. Khambata has contended—and we cannot say that there is no force in this argument—that if the Legislature had intended that a profession like that of a solicitor should also fall within the definition of the word "industry" and that the Act should apply to such professions also, it would have included this word specifically in the definition. In this connection, he has drawn our attention to arts. 19(1)(g) and 276 of the Constitution, and s. 2(4) of the Bombay Shops and Establishments Act, in which the word "profession" has been separately used. In art. 19(1)(g) the words used are "to practise any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business." In art. 276 the words used are "professions, trades, callings or employments." Section 2(4) of the Bombay Shops and Establishments Act uses the words "business, trade or profession."

I will now refer to the various cases, which have been referred to in the course of arguments. In Federated Municipal and Shire Council Employees' Union of Australia v. Melbourne Corporation,⁶ it was held by a majority of 4 to 2, that municipal corporations are not, with regard to the making, maintenance, control or lighting of public streets, exempt from Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Act 1904-1915, enacted to provide for the settlement of industrial disputes. Two of the Judges, who formed the majority, were Isaacs and Rich JJ. In their judgment at p. 554 they formulated the concept of an industrial dispute in these words:

"Industrial disputes occur when, in relation to operations in which capital and labour are contributed in co-operation for the satisfaction of human wants or desires, those engaged in co-operation dispute as to the basis to be observed, by the parties engaged, respecting either a share of the product or any other terms and conditions of their co-operation. This formula excludes the two extreme contentions of the claimant and the respondents respectively. It excludes, for instance, the legal and the medical professions, because they are not carried on in any intelligible sense by the co-operation of capital and labour and do not come within the sphere of industrialism.... It implies that 'industry', to lead to an industrial dispute, is not, as the claimant contends, merely industry in the abstract sense, as if it alone effected the result, but it must be acting and be considered in association with its co-operator 'capital' in some form so that the result is, in a sense, the outcome of their combined efforts."

Co-operation of capital and labour and their combined effort were, therefore, held to be essential elements of the concept of industry. This case has been referred to at some length by the Supreme Court in their judgment in Banerji's case.

The other case from Australia, to which reference has been made is Federated State School Teachers' Association of Australia v. State of Victoria. In that case the High Court of Australia, by a majority of 4 to 1, held that the educational activities of the States carried on under the appropriate statutes and statutory regulations relating to education did not constitute an "industry" within the meaning of s. 4 of the Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Act 1904-1928; that the occupation of teachers so employed was not an industrial occupation, and that the dispute which existed between the States and the teachers employed by them was therefore not an "industrial dispute". The majority of the Judges in their judgment at p. 573 described the economic concept of industry in these words:

"...Economists, notably Mr. J. A. Hobson (The Industrial System), say that a scientific interpretation requires us to include in the word 'industry' processes which are concerned with services such as the administrative services of public officials and the skilled professional advice of doctors and lawyers."

At p. 574 it was observed that this economic view had never been accepted by the Court and that it was too wide. It was also observed that the view that the sphere of industrialism is to be found in operations, in which the relation of employer and employee subsists, was too wide. At p. 575 reasons are given for holding that the educational activities of the States did not constitute an industry. These are that they bear no resemblance whatever to an ordinary trade, business or industry; that they are not connected directly with, or attendant upon, the production or distribution of wealth; and that there is no co-operation of capital and labour, in any relevant sense. Isaacs J. did not agree with the majority view, but in his judgment at p. 580 he stated that he adhered to the concept of industrial dispute formulated by him in his judgment in Federated Municipal Employees' Union case. After citing the passage from his previous judgment, which I have quoted above, he observed as follows at p. 581:

"First of all, there is co-operation of 'capital' and 'labour'. Everyone knows that means, in the context, the co-operation of employer and employed, the words 'capital and labour' being representative of the two classes of co-operators. They are the 'partners' referred to by Professor Hearn in his work mentioned. In his recent work Labour Relations in Industry, Dwight Lowell Hoopingarner, M.A., formerly lecturer, Harvard University, says (p. 11): 'There is a marked division of the active parties in industry into the two groups of employing and employed'."

At p. 577 Isaacs J. rejected the argument that an industrial dispute cannot possibly occur, except where there is furnished to the public—the consumers—by the combined efforts of employers and employed, wealth in the sense of “tangible, ponderable, corpuscular wealth.” In his opinion an organisation for service could also be regarded as an industry. On the same p. 577 he observed:

“...But it further neglects the fundamental character of ‘industrial disputes’ as a distinct and insistent phenomenon of modern society. Such disputes are not simply a claim to share the material wealth jointly produced and capable of registration in statistics. At heart they are a struggle, constantly becoming more intense on the part of the employed group engaged in co-operation with the employing group in rendering services to the community essential for a higher general human welfare, to share in that welfare in a greater degree.”

Even in this judgment, therefore, Isaacs J. adhered to his previous view that in an industry there are two partners, the employer and the employed and that the result or the product of the industry, either in the form of wealth or in services to the community, must be the outcome of their combined efforts.

The next case referred to was National Association of Local Government Officers v. Bolton Corporation,⁷ in which it was held that a dispute as to conditions of service of officers of a municipal corporation was a trade dispute. This decision was given having regard to the definitions of the words “trade dispute” and “workman” given in the Conditions of Employment and National Arbitration Order, 1940. These definitions are materially different from those given in our Act. This case is, therefore, not of much assistance.

Mr. Gokhale has also relied on three decisions of this Court in Province of Bombay v. Western India Automobile Assn.,⁸ *Hospital Masdoor Sabha v. Bombay State*⁹ and Nagpur Corporation v. N. H. Mujumdar.¹⁰ In the first case it was held that the Western India Automobile Association of Bombay, which exists for the purposes of rendering services to its members, falls within the purview of the Industrial Disputes Act. In the second case it was held that the activity of the State of Bombay in running a hospital and employing workmen constitutes an industry within the meaning of the Industrial Disputes Act. Mr. Gokhale has relied on the observations in the judgment at p. 774:

“Now, when we look at the definition of ‘industry’, it is not confined to an activity of a commercial character. Nor does it import necessarily a profit motive or the employment of capital. Industry is not only any business or trade or manufacture, but it is also an undertaking or calling of employers, and no expression could have been used with a wider import and connotation than the expression ‘undertaking’. Undertaking is nothing more than any work or project which a person might engage in. Work or project may have no commercial implications.”

Both these cases are clearly distinguishable from the present one. Neither the Western India Automobile Association in the first case, nor the Hospital in the second case, could be run without the co-operation of labour. The running of these institutions did not depend solely upon the personal skill, knowledge or effort of any individual. We have also not been able to find anything in the judgments in these cases which would indicate that co-operation of labour was regarded as not being a necessary element of the concept of industry.

In the third Nagpur Corporation case, the decision in the Hospital Masdoor Sabha case was followed and it was held that the question whether any particular activities of a local authority are industrial activities or not can only be decided after bearing in mind the definition of the term “industry” contained in the Act, and examining the activities of these as well as of other departments in the light of that definition as well as of the test laid down in the Hospital Masdoor Sabha case. In his judgment at p. 186 Mudholkar J. cited the first sentence in the passage from the judgment of Isaacs and Rich JJ. in Federated Municipal Employees' Union case, at p. 554, which I have quoted above, and observed that it did not appear that their Lordships were of the view that for an activity to be classed an industry it must necessarily be carried on by the co-operation of capital and labour for the satisfaction of human wants and desires. The attention of the learned Judge does not appear to have been invited to the subsequent observation in the same passage that "industry" to lead to an "industrial dispute" must be acting and be considered in association with its co-operator capital in some form so that the result is the outcome of their combined efforts. As I have already pointed out, both in this case as well as in the subsequent Federated School Teachers' case, co-operation of capital and labour or of employer and employed was regarded as being necessary for holding an enterprise to be an industry.

Then there are two decisions of the Calcutta High Court, *Brij Mohan v. N. C. Chatterjee*¹¹ and Dunderdele v. Mukherjee.¹² The identical question, which we have to decide, arose for consideration in these cases. In both the cases it was held that the profession of a solicitor is not an industry and that a dispute between him and his employees does not constitute an industrial dispute. In the former case it was observed that the expression "industry" does not include within its concept the case of an individual, who carries on a profession dependent upon his own intellectual skill, and that the calling of a solicitor carrying on his normal avocations cannot be called an industry. In the latter case Mukharji J. held that the basic and distinctive test of industry is that it is a partnership between labour and capital, that each of them has a share in building the product of industry and that the final product is the result of co-operation and partnership between them. Where, however, the product is not the result of joint labour and capital, the very basic test of industry is absent. At p. 469 he observed:

"...A thinker or a statesman or a philosopher who produces a work which embodies the result of his research, study and ideas does not carry on an industry. The fact that the result of such thought can be produced in print and paper if printers, publishers and other persons help in producing the work does not mean that the work is joint. The work remains the individual effort. The publication of the work is not the work itself. Similarly a professional man like a lawyer or a solicitor who renders his professional services to his clients and provides them with his professional skill and experience does an individual work. The fact that communications have to be carried on and correspondence has to be typed by a typist, the fact that accounts have to be kept which usually have to be done by accountants and the fact that assistants are employed to assist, do not make the result or the product joint as in an industry. The product remains the individual product. A solicitor who gives legal advice to his client may give it orally, or may write it in his own hand. The fact that instead of writing his legal advice in his own hand he employs a typist does not make it an industry, nor does it make the legal advice the joint product between him and the typist."

At p. 468 he observed:

"...In an expanding society with broadening concept of business and industry the word 'industry' is also enlarging its ambit, scope and expression. Even then outside the expanding horizon of industry in an industrial civilization and in an industrial democracy there still remains the vast world of individual work and individual endeavour depending on individual skill, excellence and peculiarity personal to the individual or individuals concerned. That vast world does not come within the increasing glitter and glamour of industry...One such world is the world of private endeavour and private excellence personal to the individual concerned. Learned professions, understood in their professional sense, such as the professions of medicine and of law are not normally industries unless some outstanding feature of industry is added to them."

With respect, we agree with these observations, except that, to quote the words of Isaacs J. in Federated School Teachers' case, by co-operation of capital and labour is meant in the context the co-operation of employer and employee, the words "capital" and "labour" being representative of and indicating the two classes of co-operators.

The Tribunal was, therefore, right in holding that the profession of a solicitor is not an industry within the meaning of the Industrial Disputes Act.

After the arguments were over before the Industrial Tribunal, the respondents produced a copy of the judgment of the Calcutta High Court in Brij Mohan's case. Thereafter an attempt was made on behalf of the petitioners to show that the respondents' firm carried on some business other than that of solicitors. It was alleged that the respondents were engaged in doing business in forward transactions in shares and silver and also in the business of buying and selling property. The allegations with regard to carrying on business in shares and in silver was denied in his affidavit filed by respondent No. 2. The Industrial Tribunal has believed his statement on this point. With regard to the second allegation, the respondents mentioned four instances of purchases and sales of property between 1933 and 1957. Three of these transactions took place before the present firm of the respondents came into existence in April 1946. Consequently, they must be left out of consideration. With regard to the fourth transaction, the affidavit filed by the respondents shows that a property was purchased by the firm at an auction sale held in consequence of a charging order for costs made in favour of the firm. This cannot be regarded as dealing in the business of buying and selling property. It appears from para. 11 of the petition that the petitioners had requested the Tribunal to direct the respondents to produce four documents, the three deeds of partnership executed in 1929, 1935 and 1946, and the document executed when Mr. Amin retired from the partnership in November 1935. The documents executed prior to 1946 were obviously irrelevant. They had no connection with the firm in which the petitioners were employed. With regard to the deed of partnership executed in 1946, it is admitted that this document was produced by the respondents in Court. It was shown to the Tribunal. The petitioners have alleged in cl. (n) of para. 11 of the petition that this document was not shown to them. The respondents have in their affidavit denied in general terms the allegations made by the petitioners in para. 11 of their petition. Even assuming that this document was not shown to the petitioners, we do not think that any injustice has been caused to them, because the only transaction alleged by them, which took place during the time the firm, in which they were employed, was in existence, was a transaction in which the respondents purchased a property in execution of an order made in their favour for costs. This transaction by itself would not be a sufficient ground for holding that the respondents were engaged in the business of purchasing and selling property.

The view taken by the Industrial Tribunal that the respondents' firm did not constitute an industry, and that the dispute between them and their employees was not an industrial dispute, which could be the subject of a reference under the Industrial Disputes Act, is therefore correct.

The rule will be discharged. There will be no order as to costs.

RAMNARAIN PRIVATE LTD.*

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Secs. 86, 87B, O. XXX, r. 1—Suit against firm one of the partners of which Ruler of former Indian State—Consent of Central Government to filing of suit against Ruler not obtained—Decree passed against firm whether a nullity.

A decree passed in a suit against a firm in which one of the partners is a Ruler of a former Indian State is not a nullity on the ground that the consent of the Central Government was not obtained under s. 86 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, to the filing of the suit against the Ruler. That want of consent can be availed of only by the Ruler, but the other partners cannot claim any immunity under s. 86 or s. 87B of the Code.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

B. N. Singh, for the appellants.

P. N. Bhagwati, for the respondents.

S. T. DESAI J. This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Shelat on a chamber summons under O. XXI, r. 50(2) and the order appealed against is one granting leave to the decree-holder to proceed in execution against certain persons as partners in the firm of Messrs. Jagatsons International Corporation. In that firm there were several partners including the Maharaja of Sirmoor, a principality in Himachal Pradesh. There is no dispute that the Government of India had recognised the Maharaja of Sirmoor as a Ruler entitled to the privileges under s. 86 of the Civil Procedure Code. The plaintiffs, who are respondent No. 1 before us, filed a suit against that firm to recover a sum of Rs. 1,96,831.58 nP. The suit was filed as a summary suit and the plaintiffs took out a summons for judgment. The writ of the summons was served only upon the manager of the firm and upon one of the partners, Shib Chunder Kumar, who is respondent No. 5 to the appeal. At the hearing of the summons for judgment, the firm was represented by attorneys and counsel and submitted to a decree as prayed and applied for liberty to pay the decretal amount in certain instalments, which application was granted. The firm failed to pay the instalments and the plaintiffs took out a chamber summons, out of which arises this appeal, for liberty to execute the decree against the seven individual partners (other than the Maharaja of Sirmoor) mentioned in the summons. Those seven persons were admittedly partners in the defendant firm at all material times. Various contentions were raised before Mr. Justice Shelat, who negatived them. We shall only examine those contentions which are pressed before us by Mr. Singh, learned counsel for the appellants. The learned Judge, as we have already mentioned, made the summons absolute and four of the partners have now come to this Court in appeal.

It has been argued firstly that the decree passed on the summons for judgment and which was a consent decree was a nullity, and if it was a nullity, it was competent to the executing Court to go into that contention and decline to grant any execution against the partners against whom execution of the decree was sought to be enforced by the chamber summons. The argument is that one of the partners in the firm of the judgment-debtors being a Ruling Prince, no valid decree could be passed against the firm of which he was a partner without the consent of the Central Government certified in writing as required by s. 86 of the Civil Procedure Code. Section 86 of the Civil Procedure Code has to be read with s. 87B which applies the principle of immunity to foreign Rulers to the Rulers of former Indian States. Now, the argument here is that no suit can be filed against a firm if one of the partners in that firm is a Ruler of a former Indian State, and if a suit is filed against a firm in which one of the partners is a Ruler of a former Indian State, the suit is not maintainable, and if a decree were to be passed in that suit, that decree would be a nullity. Another step of the argument is that a decree against a Ruler of a former Indian State without the requisite consent of the Central Government before the institution of the suit is a nullity. We agree with Mr. Singh when he says that a decree passed against a Ruler of a former Indian State without the requisite consent of the Central Government would be a nullity. Sections 9 and 86 of the Civil Procedure Code have, in this context, to be read together, and by doing so it must follow that a Court has no inherent jurisdiction to entertain a suit against a person to whom s. 86 applies. It can only do so if the requisite consent of the Central Government is obtained before the institution of the suit. The provisions contained in s. 86, it is well-established, are imperative, and a decree passed by a Court without the requisite certificate would be by a Court which has no jurisdiction at all to entertain the suit. It would be a case of the total absence of competence and the decree would be a nullity. But that is not the real difficulty of Mr. Singh in this case. The real difficulty of Mr. Singh is when he asks us to accept the proposition that a decree passed against a firm in which one of the partners is a Ruler of a former Indian State would be a nullity if the consent of the Central Government was not obtained to the filing of the suit against him. The suggestion is that a suit against a firm in the name of the firm is as much a suit against every partner of the firm, including the partner who is a Ruler of a former Indian State. So far, we are in agreement with Mr. Singh. A suit against a firm is a suit against all the partners of the firm, and a fortiori it is a suit against one of those partners who is a Ruler of a former Indian State. But it is not possible for us to accede to the argument that a decree against a firm in which one of the partners happens to be a Ruler of a former Indian State is a nullity if the suit was filed without the requisite certificate.

Greatest reliance has been placed by Mr. Singh on a decision of Chagla C.J. in Civil Revision Application decided by his Lordship sitting alone reported in Dulerai & Co. v. Pokedas Meghraj.¹ We would like to preface our observations on that case by drawing attention to the very peculiar nature of the application which the learned Chief Justice had to consider. In the firm of Dulerai & Co. there were four partners, one of whom was the Maharaja of Orchha, a Ruler of the former Indian State of Orchha. The respondents to the Revision Application were Messrs. Pokedas Meghraj and they filed a suit in the City Civil Court, Bombay, against the firm of Dulerai & Co. in the name of that firm to recover a sum of Rs. 5,000. The defendants filed their appearance under protest and informed the plaintiffs that as the Maharaja of Orchha was one of the partners and as the requisite consent of the Central Government under s. 87B read with s. 86 to file the suit against the Maharaja had not been obtained, the suit was not maintainable. The plaintiffs thereupon took out a chamber summons asking that the appearance under protest be removed. The chamber summons was heard by the Principal Judge of the City Civil Court, who held that as the suit was filed against the firm in the firm name and not against the partners in their individual names, ss. 86 and 87B had no application. He made the summons absolute and the Civil Revision Application was against that order. What the learned Chief Justice had to decide, and in fact decided, was that the learned Principal Judge of the City Civil Court was in error in passing that order. The effect of the judgment was that the appearance under protest was to remain on the record of the suit and the City Civil Court was directed to try the issue as to whether the Maharaja of Orchha was a partner in the defendant firm. It is in that context that certain observations seem to have been made in the judgment in that case. Read out of context, those observations may lend support to the argument pressed before us by Mr. Singh. But we are not prepared to read those observations as laying down the proposition which Mr. Singh has contended for before us. But as we have already observed, those observations are to be read in their proper context bearing in mind the real point which had to be decided and what we are concerned with is the ratio of that decision. We do not think that the correct ratio of that decision is that a suit can in no circumstances be filed against a firm in which a Ruler of a former Indian State is a partner. Of course, if the question arises as to whether a Ruler of a former Indian State is a partner in a firm, then it would be necessary for the Court to determine that point and that is what seems to us to have been decided in that case. But we do not think we should read that decision as laying down the wide general proposition pressed for our acceptance by Mr. Singh.

A suit can be filed against a firm under O. XXX, r. 1, of the Civil Procedure Code if the requirements of that rule are satisfied. When a suit is filed against a firm under O. XXX, r. 1, the effect of that is, as was pointed out by Lindley L. J. in the oft-quoted passage in the decision in *Western National Bank of City of New York v. Perce Triana & Co.*² (p. 314):

"It is only a convenient method for denoting those persons who compose the firm at the time when that name is used and a plaintiff who sues partners in the name of their firm in truth sues them individually, just as much as if he had set out all their names." Therefore, when a suit is filed in the name of a firm, the true position is that for all purposes, barring certain exceptions which are in the present context not material, the suit must be treated as operating as a suit and effective as a suit filed against all the partners in their individual names. A firm is not a legal entity or a person. A firm name is merely a label given for convenience to describe and refer to persons who have agreed to carry on business in partnership. Although in mercantile usage a firm is deemed to be clothed with sufficient personality, in the eye of law a firm has no legal existence as such. It is not a juristic person, and when reference is made to a firm, it is really to the individual partners who constitute that firm. This principle is so firmly established that its application permits of no doubt or debate. Therefore, in the present case when the summary suit was filed against the firm of Jagatsons International Corporation, it was for all relevant purposes a suit against all the partners in that firm and when a decree was passed in that suit on the summons for judgment, it was for all relevant purposes a decree against all the partners in that firm. If one of the partners was a person against whom a decree could not have been passed because the requisite consent of the Central Government to the filing of the suit against him had not been obtained, that want of consent can be availed of only by that person and not by the other partners in the firm. The other partners could not possibly claim any immunity under s. 86 or s. 87B of the Code of Civil Procedure. In substance and in effect, the argument of learned counsel for the appellants asks us to extend that immunity to those other partners of the firm.

The same argument has been presented by Mr. Singh in a slightly different form. It is stated that the decree passed by the Court was against Messrs. Jagatsons International Corporation and not against the individual partners. Says Mr. Singh, the decree could have been passed against the individual partners other than the Maharaja of Sirmoor. The next premise is that the decree is not divisible and on these premises it is urged that the conclusion must of necessity be that the decree against the firm was a nullity. The premises of this syllogism are open to serious doubt. To say that the decree against Messrs. Jagatsons International Corporation was not a decree against the individual partners is in the present context a fallacy. We have already referred to the legal position on the subject, and we may say it once again that a decree passed against a firm is a decree against the individual partners. There are certain exceptions to this proposition, but they do not in any manner disturb the correctness of this proposition. Those exceptions refer to certain safeguards in the matter of execution and those safeguards are to be found in O. XXI, r. 50, of the Civil Procedure Code. But in dealing with the present point we are not concerned with them. The argument is stressed in the form of a question: How can a decree passed against a firm in which one partner is a Ruler of a former Indian State be said to be a decree not against him? We do not suggest that the decree was not against the Maharaja of Sirmoor. The view we take is that it was a decree not only against the Maharaja of Sirmoor, but a decree against him as also every individual partner in the firm. The partners in the firm being jointly and severally liable to the judgment-creditor, the decree cannot be said to be a nullity against any of the appellants before us. For all these reasons, the present contention of the appellants must be negatived.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chitambar, Acting Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Shelat.

RAMMAYYA VENKAT NARSU BURA v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), Secs. 12, 28—Bombay Primary Education Act (Bom. LXI of 1947)—Wife of municipal councillor working as teacher in municipal school before his election as councillor and continuing to do so thereafter—Whether councillor disqualified under s. 12(2)(b) of Municipal Boroughs Act—Applicability of s. 28(1).

The respondent was elected a councillor of a municipality governed under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925. The wife of the respondent was working as a teacher for the past several years before his election, in a school conducted by the municipality and she continued to do so thereafter. On the question whether the respondent was disqualified to remain as a councillor it was contended that the respondent could be said to have directly or indirectly an interest in the employment of his wife with or under the municipality within the meaning of s. 12(2)(b) of the Act and that s. 28(1) of the Act was applicable though the disqualification had commenced before the election of the respondent:—

Held, that the respondent's duty as a councillor was or at any rate was likely to be in conflict with his interest in his wife's employment with the municipality and, therefore, he suffered from disqualification within the meaning of s. 12(2)(b) of the Act:

Dattatraya v. S. V. Bhavs' and Champaklal Parikh v. Mahendra Govindlal Choksi,¹ referred to; and that the bar of s. 28(1) of the Act applied to the case of the respondent as the disqualification was not only a pre-existing one but one which continued after his election:

Election Commission, India v. Saka Venkata Subba Rao,² referred to.

In the general election held in 1957, one Shrinivas (respondent No. 2) was elected a councillor of the Municipality of Ahmednagar. Thereafter he was elected a member of the Standing Committee and the Chairman of the Sanitary Committee. In a general meeting of the councillors held after the election, certain members of the municipality were also elected to represent the municipality on the School Board constituted under the Bombay Primary Education Act of 1947. Anjanibai, the wife of respondent No. 2, was working as a teacher for the last several years in school No. 14 conducted among other schools by the municipality. One Rammayya (petitioner), who was a voter, alleged that respondent No. 2 had a direct interest in her employment with the municipality and, therefore, if respondent No. 2 continued to be a councillor, there would be a conflict between his duty as a councillor and his interest in the furtherance of his wife's interests as an employee of the municipality.

The petitioner presented an application to the Collector, Ahmednagar District, stating therein the aforesaid facts and praying that it should be declared that respondent No. 2 became disqualified to remain as a councillor. It was contended on behalf of respondent No. 2 that the words "becomes subject to any disqualifications specified in section 12" in s. 28(1) (a) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act of 1925 meant a disqualification incurred after the election and, therefore, since the wife of respondent No. 2 was employed as a teacher several years before the election, s. 28 did not apply and respondent No. 2 could not be declared as having been disqualified. It was also contended that the petitioner ought to have raised an objection to the nomination of respondent No. 2 as a candidate in the election under s. 12(2) (b), that it was that section that applied to the facts of the case and that, therefore, the petitioner was not entitled to ask for a declaration under s. 28 of the Act.

The Collector by his order negatived these contentions observing as follows:

"It clearly means that even if the disqualification earned by an intending councillor has been overlooked during the scrutiny of Nominations a subsequent remedy is provided for such disqualification in section 28. If this is not true it will be possible for Councillors to temporarily abstain from acquiring disqualifications and then remain as Councillors for the period for which the Municipality is constituted. This interpretation is therefore too far fetched besides being illogical."

The Collector held that respondent No. 2 was disqualified as a councillor, and declared that a vacancy had occurred in the municipality within the meaning of s. 28(2) of the Act. In the appeal filed by respondent No. 2 against the order of the Collector, the Government of Bombay set aside the Collector's order and held that respondent No. 2 was entitled to continue to be a councillor observing that s. 28(2) could apply only to cases where a disqualification occurs after the election and not to a pre-existing disqualification.

The petitioner applied to the High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution of India for inter alia quashing the order passed by the Government of Bombay.

The application was heard.

M. A. Rane, for opponent No. 2.

B. E. Sompura, Assistant Government Pleader, for opponent No. 1.

N. H. Gursahani, for opponent No. 3.

SHELAT J. [His Lordship after stating the facts of the case, proceeded.] Two questions have been raised by Mr. Patel on behalf of the petitioner; (1) that respondent No. 2 has an interest in the employment of his wife as a teacher and (2) that s. 28(1) would apply even though the disqualification has commenced before the election. Mr. Rane, on the other hand, relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in *Election Commission, India v. Saka Venkata Subba Rao*¹ and contended on the strength of that decision that s. 28(1) cannot apply to a pre-existing disqualification.

To appreciate these contentions, it is necessary to examine certain provisions of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act of 1925. Section 12(1) provides that

"No person may become a Councillor" who has been convicted of certain offences or who has been removed from office under s. 27 of the Act, or who is an uncertified bankrupt or an undischarged insolvent or who is of unsound mind or who has acquired the citizenship of a foreign State etc. or who is a Judge. Section 12(2) (b), so far as is material, provides that:

"No person who, save as hereinafter provided, has directly or indirectly...any share or interest in any work...contract or employment with or under...a Municipality... may be a councillor of such Municipality."

It is needless to pause on the proviso contained in sub-s. (3) of s. 12 as it is not material for the purposes of this case. Thus the Legislature has used two different phraseologies. In sub-s. (1) the words are "may become a Councillor" whereas in sub-s. (2) the words used are "may be a councillor of such municipality". It is not clear why this different phraseology has been adopted by the Legislature. But it was not seriously disputed before us that the disqualification set out in sub-s. (2) will also disqualify a person from standing as a candidate.

The first question that falls for determination is whether respondent No. 2 can be said to have directly or indirectly interest in the employment of his wife with or under the municipality within the meaning of s. 12(2)(b). In *Dattatraya v. S. V. Bhave*² a similar question arose though it was under s. 10(1)(f) of the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act of 1949. But since the language in s. 10(1)(f) of that Act is similar to the one in s. 12(2)(b) of the Act under our consideration, the decision is relevant. In that case that petitioner offered himself as a candidate for election in the Municipal Corporation of Poona. He was living with his wife and children in a house owned by him. At the time he stood for election, his wife was employed as a municipal school teacher. His nomination on that ground was rejected. In the petition filed by him, it was held that he had interest in the employment of his wife with the Municipal Corporation and, therefore, he suffered from disqualification within the meaning of s. 10(1)(f) of that Act. It was also held that the interest contemplated in that section need not be pecuniary but should be such as is likely to come in conflict with one's duty as a councillor. A similar question under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, arose in *Champaklal Parikh v. Mahendra Govindlal Choksi*³, where a son was wanting to be a councillor of the Petlad Municipality and his father was a pleader representing that municipality in various cases of assessment. It was there observed:

"In our opinion, the interest here is not the interest which a man may have in the prosperity of his friend. There the interest is clearly sentimental or emotional. When you have a person living jointly with his father, it seems to be inarguable that the son's interest in the prosperity of his father is purely sentimental or emotional. If the father earns more, he has more to spend on the family. His prosperity must affect the position of the son and the interest that the son has in the prosperity of his father is clearly a material or a substantial interest."

It is, therefore, clear looking to the close relationship between a husband and a wife that where a wife is in the employment with or under a municipality, the husband, who desires to become or is a councillor of that municipality, has a substantial interest in that employment which is or is likely to be in conflict with his duty as a councillor.

Mr. Rane, however, contended that the position of a Municipal Corporation such as the Poona Municipal Corporation is different from that of a Borough municipality like the Ahmednagar municipality inasmuch as the control over municipal schools in the former case vests in the Municipal Corporation whereas in the latter case it vests in the State Government. To examine the validity of this contention, it is necessary to turn to the Bombay Primary Education Act, 1947. Section 2(2) of that Act defines an "approved school" which means inter alia a primary school maintained by a School Board or by an authorised municipality. It is not in dispute that the school in question is maintained by the Ahmednagar Municipality and the Ahmednagar Municipality is an authorised municipality. Section 2(6) defines an authorised municipality as one authorised by the State Government under s. 16(1) of the Act. Therefore, the school in which the wife of respondent No. 2 is serving, is a school maintained by the Ahmednagar Municipality. Section 2(19) defines a 'School Board' meaning a District School Board or a Municipal School Board. Section 3 provides that there shall be a District School Board for each district and a Municipal School Board for each area of an authorised municipality. Section 4 provides for the constitution of a School Board. A School Board is to consist of not less than 12 members and not more than 16, of whom not less than 2 and not more than 3 are to be appointed by the State Government. Except for those to be appointed by the Government, the members of the School Board are to be elected by the District Local Board or the authorised municipality as the case may be. Under s. 18(1) the Municipal School Board is to be responsible for the management and control of all primary schools which vest in the authorised municipality and for the control of all other approved schools within the area of the authorised municipality. Lastly, s. 20 provides that every authorised municipality shall maintain:

"an adequate staff of assistant administrative officers...primary school teachers...and other staff...as may in the opinion of the State Government be necessary for the administration, management and control of approved schools within its areas."

Sub-section (2) of s. 20 provides that this staff shall be the servants of the authorised municipality and shall receive their pay, allowances, gratuities, and pensions from its primary education fund. Under s. 44 this fund, in the case of an authorised municipality, means the grant payable by the municipality on account of primary education together with the grant payable by the State Government, the fees of pupils etc. These sections make it clear that the primary school teachers are the servants of an authorised municipality, such as the Ahmednagar Municipality, and their salaries, allowances, pensions etc. are paid from the primary education fund raised by such municipality.

Mr. Rane, however, contended that in spite of these provisions, the real control over the teachers and the staff of the primary schools in the case of Ahmednagar Municipality does not rest with the municipality and, therefore, there would be no question of any conflict between the duties of the petitioner as a councillor and his interest in his wife's employment. In other words, his contention was, that though the Ahmednagar Municipality pays for the expenditure of the schools, the control over the schools and the staff still remains with the State Government. For that purpose he relied on certain other provisions of the Primary Education Act. Section 20(3) provides that the rates of pay and allowances and terms of employment of the primary school teachers maintained by an authorised municipality shall be fixed from time to time by the State Government. Section 21 then provides that for each School Board there shall be an Administrative Officer, who shall be the Chief Executive Officer of the Board. Under s. 21(2) the Administrative Officer is to be appointed by and is the servant of the State Government; his salary and allowances are also payable from the State revenues. Under s. 22 the State Government may delegate the power to appoint an Administrative Officer to an authorised municipality, but as pointed out by Mr. Rane no such power has been delegated to the Ahmednagar Municipality with the result that the Administrative Officer, so far as this municipality is concerned, is the servant of the State and not of the municipality. Therefore, all executive functions of the School Board are under his control and not the municipality. Likewise, under s. 23, a Staff Selection Committee is constituted consisting of the Educational Inspector, the Chairman of the School Board and the Administrative Officer and it is this Committee which selects the teachers and the other staff. Under s. 24 the Administrative Officer has also the power to promote, transfer and take all disciplinary action including that of removal and dismissal against the staff. But sub-s. (2) of s. 24 provides for an appeal against his orders to a Tribunal consisting of the Chairman of the School Board, and the Educational Inspector of the District. Thus argues Mr. Rane, the entire control over the teachers and the staff including their selection, pay and allowances rests not with the municipality but virtually with the Government.

What Mr. Rane however does not take into account are two other sections of the Bombay Primary Education Act. Section 16 enacts that the Government may authorize a municipality constituted under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, to control all approved schools within its area. Since the Ahmednagar Municipality is an authorized municipality, it has under s. 16(1) the power to control all approved schools within its area. Furthermore s. 16(2) provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act and of the rules and regulations made thereunder, all existing and future rights, liabilities, powers and duties of any municipality, which was a local authority under the Bombay Primary Education Act, 1923, immediately before the date of the coming into force of this Act, in respect of primary school teachers and other persons employed by it for the purposes of primary education shall on such date vest in and be performed or exercised by the said municipality as an authorized municipality under this Act; and all properties, moveable and immovable, vesting in or held by or under the control of such municipality for the purposes of primary education, shall from such date continue to vest in, be held by or be under the control of the said municipality as such authorized municipality."

Section 17 provides that "Subject to the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder an authorized municipality shall perform the following duties and functions". Among these duties and functions are:

"(c) to maintain an adequate staff of Assistant Administrative Officers...clerks, teachers;...

(e) to sanction with or without variation the budget of the municipal school board."

Sub-section (3) provides for the power to make regulations, subject, no doubt, to the sanction of the State Government, among other things for determining the qualifications, pay and terms of employment of the Assistant Administrative Officers, Supervisors, Attendance Officers, clerks and other staff, for regulating the administration, management and control of primary schools. Sections 16 and 17 thus vest considerable control over the primary schools in the municipality in their management, budgetary provisions and what is important in determining the terms and conditions, including the pay of the staff. It is true that the Administrative Officer has been conferred considerable powers under ss. 23 and 24 in the matter of appointment of teachers, their promotions, transfers and disciplinary action that may be taken against them, but under s. 23 the Selection Committee which has the power of selection is composed of three persons, one of them being the Chairman of the School Board, who would be the nominee of the municipality. A member of the municipality having a voice in the election of the members of the Board acquires thus a voice in the selection of teachers though indirectly. In regard to the powers of disciplinary action also, an appeal against an order of the Administrative Officer is provided and such appeal is to be heard by the Educational Inspector and the Chairman of the School Board. These provisions show that though there is dual control over the primary schools of the State Government and an authorized municipality, it cannot be gainsaid that the teachers of the primary schools of an authorized municipality are the servants of such municipality and they are under considerable control of the municipality in several important matters. The petitioner in his capacity as a councillor has a voice in the election of at least 10 out of 12 members of the School Board and its Chairman, besides himself exercising a general control through the municipality over all the primary schools within its area. That being so, it must be found that his duty as a councillor is or at any rate is likely to be in conflict with his interest in his wife's employment with the municipality.

The next contention urged by Mr. Rane was that even if the employment of the petitioner's wife were held to be a disqualification, she has been employed since a number of years before the election. Therefore the disqualification is a pre-existing one, and would not attract s. 28(1) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act. It was argued that the words "becomes subject to" any disqualifications set out in s. 12 must be construed as meaning disqualifications accruing after and not before the election. Reliance was placed on the Supreme Court decision in *Election Commission, India v. Saka Venkata Subba Rao*⁴, where on construction of arts. 190(3) and 191(1) of the Constitution it was held that these articles applied to disqualifications to which a member of a State Legislature becomes subject to after being elected as such, and not to a disqualification which arose before his election. Article 190(3) runs as follows:

"If a member of a House of the Legislature of a State—

(a) becomes subject to any of the disqualifications mentioned in clause (1) of article 191;...

his seat shall thereupon become vacant."

Article 191(1) provides:—

"A person shall be disqualified for being chosen as, and for being, a member of the Legislative Assembly or Legislative Council of a State" etc.

Then follow several kinds of disqualifications. Since the same words viz. "becomes subject to any of the disqualifications" occur also in s. 28(1) of the Act before us, the interpretation put upon them by the Supreme Court must be applied to that section also. The facts which led to that case were that the respondent there was convicted and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for seven years in 1942. He was, therefore, disqualified for being chosen as and for being a member of the Legislative Assembly under art. 191(1)(e) read with s. 7 of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, for a period of five years since his release on August 15, 1947. He was elected a member of the Madras Legislative Assembly before that period had elapsed. The question arose whether he was disqualified and could be allowed to sit and vote in the Assembly. As aforesaid, it was held that arts. 190(3) and 192(1) provided a remedy when a member incurred a disqualification after he was elected. His Lordship Patanjali Shastri C.J. observes (p. 1158):

"Not only do the words 'becomes subject' in article 190(3) and 'has become subject' in article 192(1) indicate a change in the position of the member after he was elected, but the provision that his seat is to become thereupon vacant, ... further reinforces the view that the article contemplates only a sitting member incurring the disability while so sitting."

But the disqualification which their Lordships of the Supreme Court had to deal with was of a different nature than the one before us. The disqualification there was that the member was convicted and sentenced in 1942, and by reason of that conviction, he was prohibited under s. 7 of the Representation of the People Act from becoming a member for a period of five years. In other words the statutory disability had already occurred once for all in 1942 and was, therefore, a pre-existing one. In the case before us, however, the disqualification is not a personal one as in the case before the Supreme Court, but on the ground of a likely conflict of interest and duty of respondent No. 2. That ground would continue to remain till the employment of respondent No. 2's wife continued. Every day she continues in service, there arises a conflict between interest and duty of respondent No. 2. Every day, therefore, he becomes subject to the disqualification referred to above. Therefore the disqualification not only existed at the time of the nomination of respondent No. 2 as a candidate, but continued thereafter even after he was elected. In this view, the bar of s. 28(1) of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act must apply to the case of respondent No. 2 as the disqualification was not only a pre-existing one but one which continued after the election and still continues. The construction, which we are placing on the section, also appears to us to be in consonance with the intention of the Legislature. Indeed the Legislature could not have intended that a person who is disqualified for standing as a candidate should serve and continue to serve as a councillor even though he continues to be subject to the same disqualification.

In the result the petitioner's contention must be upheld in the interest of purity of municipal administration which is the primary object of ss. 12 and 28 of the Act. We, therefore, set aside the order passed by the Government of Bombay and restore the order of the Collector. There will be no order as to costs.

Application allowed.

THE STATE OF BOMBAY v. THE ESTATE INVESTMENT CO. LTD., BOMBAY.²

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 44, 45, 48, 60, 61, 85(1)—Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Rules, 1956, Rule 33—State Government taking over management of lands belonging to landholder—Whether State Government liable to render account of its management during pendency of management—Suit filed by landholder for such rendition of accounts whether can be entertained by civil Court.

The State Government, where it has taken over management of lands belonging to a landholder under Chapter IV of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, is liable to render an account of its management to the landholder during the pendency of the management and to pay the balance left, after making provision for the payment of items mentioned in s. 48 of the Act, at the end of the year.

The ownership of lands taken under management under Chapter IV of the Act does not vest in the State Government. The only thing that vests in the State Government or in the Manager appointed is the right to possession and of management together with all powers for the purposes of such management which the landholder, but for the notification issued under s. 44 of the Act, could have exercised.

*F. & V. Merchants Union v. Improvement Trust, Delhi,*¹ referred to.

A suit filed by a landholder against the State Government for rendition of accounts of its management and for the payment of balance can be entertained by a civil Court and is not barred by s. 85(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948.

Under s. 85(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, a civil Court is barred from entertaining questions dealing with the exercise of powers conferred upon the Manager by Chapter IV of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

C. C. Vaidya, Assistant Government Pleader, for the appellant.

G. S. Gupta (Sr.) and P. B. Mridul, for the respondent.

SHELAT J. This appeal raises two questions under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948. They are, whether the State Government, where it has taken over management of lands belonging to a landholder under Chapter IV of the Act, is liable to render an account of its management during the pendency of the management, and secondly whether a suit filed by a landholder for accounts can be entertained by a civil Court.

By an Indenture of grant and demise dated November 7, 1870, the Secretary of State in Council granted and demised certain lands, hereditaments and premises therein described to one Ramchandra Laxmanji of Bombay for a term of 999 years on certain terms and conditions therein contained. By diverse transfers made subsequently the plaintiff-company became the owner of part of these lands, situate at Bhayandar, Mira and Ghodbunder, aggregating in all to about 7000 acres. The plaintiff-company took over possession of these lands in 1949 and thereafter managed them as the owner thereof and recovered rents and profits arising therefrom.

Under the powers reserved under s. 88(2) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, the Government of Bombay issued a notification dated July 14, 1949, whereunder the provisions of the Tenancy Act were made applicable to all Crown Leases in the State. Consequently the lands belonging to the plaintiff-company became subject to the provisions of the Act. By a notification dated December 19, 1949, (exh. 21) the State Government declared the plaintiff-company to be a 'landholder' within the meaning of s. 2(9) of the Act. By the said notification the State Government also assumed management of this property under s. 44 of the Act. The notification declared that management of the said lands was being assumed by the State Government for the purpose of improving the economic and social conditions of the peasants and to ensure full and efficient use of these lands for agriculture. Thereafter the Government appointed first the Collector of Thana and after sometime the Prant Officer of Thana as the Manager. Since December 19, 1949, the lands in suit have been in the possession and management of the Manager appointed as afore-said by the State Government.

On January 17, 1955, the plaintiff-company gave a notice (exh. No. 22) to the State of Bombay under s. 80 of the Civil Procedure Code calling upon them to render an account of the management of these properties and declaring therein its intention to file a suit. The State of Bombay did not choose to give any reply to this notice nor to comply with the demands made therein. On April 11, 1955, the plaintiff-company filed the present suit, being Suit No. 123 of 1955, in the Court of the learned Civil Judge (Senior Division), Thana, for rendition of accounts and payment of the balance left in the hands of the State Government.

The State of Bombay contended in the written statement inter alia that it was not liable to render any account during the continuance of the management of these lands, that the property in the lands by virtue of the notification dated December 19, 1949, and the provisions contained in Chapter IV of the Act had vested in the Manager, that ownership in these properties had passed to the State of Bombay, that there was no provision in the Act whereby a claim for the rendition of accounts could be made against the State of Bombay while the management was still continuing and finally that by virtue of s. 85(1) of the Act, a civil Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit.

The trial Court raised three issues, viz. whether the plaintiff-company was entitled to ask for accounts from the defendant, whether the plaintiff-company was debarred from claiming such accounts or the balance due during the pendency of the management, and lastly whether the Court was barred under s. 85(1) of the Act from trying the suit. The trial Court answered all the three issues in favour of the plaintiff-company and decreed the suit.

Aggrieved by the said decree and judgment the State of Bombay filed an appeal in the Court of the District Judge of Thana being Civil Appeal No. 288 of 1956. The learned Assistant Judge, Thana, who heard the appeal, confirmed the decree and judgment passed by the trial Court and dismissed the appeal. It is against this order of dismissal that the State of Bombay has preferred this appeal.

The learned Assistant Government Pleader has raised before me the same questions which were raised before the Courts below. The two questions that are raised are (1) that there is no liability of the State of Bombay to render an account to the plaintiff-company during the pendency of the management and to pay the balance and (2) that by virtue of s. 85(1) of the Act, a civil Court has no jurisdiction to try the suit.

On the first question the learned Assistant Government Pleader relied upon ss. 44 to 61 of the Act. It becomes, therefore, necessary to briefly examine these sections. The title of Chapter IV in which these sections are contained is "Management of Estate held by Landholders". Section 44 deals with the power given to the State Government to assume management of lands belonging to a 'landholder' and provides that when the State Government is satisfied that on account of the neglect of a 'landholder' or disputes between him and his tenants, the cultivation of his estate has seriously suffered, or when it appears to the State Government that it is necessary for that reason or for the purpose of ensuring the full and efficient use of land for agriculture to assume management of any landholder's estate, a notification announcing such intention shall be published in the Official Gazette. Section 44 also provides that such a notification shall be conclusive. Section 45 then lays down the effect of such notification and provides that on the publication of such notification, the estate in respect of which the notification has been published, shall, so long as the management continues, vest in the State Government. Such management shall be deemed to commence from the date on which the notification is published and the State Government shall appoint a Manager to be in charge of such estate.

It was under s. 45 that the State Government appointed in the first instance the Collector of Thana as the Manager of the lands in question and thereafter the Prant Officer to manage the lands. The management was in continuance when the plaintiff-company filed the present suit.

Section 46(3) provides:—

"So long as the management continues the holder of the estate shall be incompetent—

- (a) to enter into any contract involving the estate in pecuniary liability,
- (b) to mortgage, charge, lease or alienate the property under management or any part thereof, or
- (c) to grant valid receipts for the rents and profits arising or accruing therefrom."

Sub-section (4) enacts that so long as the management continues, no person other than the Manager shall be competent to mortgage, charge, lease or alienate such estate or any part thereof. Section 47 deals with the powers of the Manager including the power to receive rents and profits arising from such lands. Section 48, on which considerable reliance was placed by the learned Assistant Government Pleader, provides that the Manager shall make certain payments as provided in cls. (i) to (v) of sub-s. (1) and thereafter he shall retain the residue for the liquidation in the manner provided in the Act of the debts and liabilities other than those mentioned in sub-s. (1) and also for the repayment, either before or after the liquidation of such debts and liabilities of any loan received from Government by the Manager under the Act. Sub-section (2) of s. 48 provides that thereafter "the balance, if any, shall be paid to the holder". Section 49 and the sections thereafter following provide for the settlement of debts and liabilities of the holder of the land incurred by him prior to the management and the liquidation thereof in the manner provided in those sections. Section 54 provides that when the total amount of debts and liabilities including those due and incurred to the Government has been finally determined by the Manager, he shall submit to the Collector a schedule of such debts and liabilities and a scheme, called the liquidation scheme, showing the manner in which it is proposed to pay and discharge the same, whether from the income of the property under management or with the assistance of funds raised under the powers conferred by sections following s. 54. Section 58 no doubt provides that subject to the rules made under this Act the Manager after the liquidation scheme has been sanctioned as provided in these sections shall have the power to sell or grant on lease all or any part of the estate under the management. Section 60 states that even if the holder of the estate were to die after the publication of the order of management, the management shall continue and proceed in all respects as if the holder was still living. Sub-section (2) of that section then provides that:

"Any person succeeding to the whole or any part of the estate under management shall, while such management continues, be subject in respect of such estate to the disabilities imposed under this Act."

Section 61 then deals with the termination of the management and provides that when the State Government is of opinion that it is no longer necessary to continue the management, it shall direct, by an order published in the Official Gazette, that the said management shall be terminated. On the termination of the management, the estate shall be delivered into the possession of the holder or, if he is dead, of any person entitled to that estate together with "any balances which may be due to the credit of the said holder".

The learned Assistant Government Pleader relying upon these sections and particularly the sections dealing with the scheme of liquidation, which inter alia gives powers to the Manager to sell or grant on lease all or any part of the estate under management, contended that as soon as a notification under s. 44 is issued and the Manager is appointed, all rights in the property in question would vest in the Manager appointed by the State Government. In other words, he contended that on the commencement of such management all rights and property in the land would vest absolutely in the State Government and, therefore, the effect of such notification would be to transfer all rights of ownership in such lands to the State Government. Such ownership would remain vested in the State Government so long as the management continues and that, therefore, until such management is terminated, the landholder would not be entitled to call upon the State Government to render account of its management or to recover the balance remaining in the hands of the Manager and referred to in s. 48(2). It is not possible to accept such a wide contention as raised by the learned Assistant Government Pleader. In my view, ss. 48, 60 and 61 clearly show that the effect of the notification issued under s. 44 and the taking over of management of the lands would be to vest only the right to possession and management of the lands in the State Government. It must be remembered that the title of Chapter IV is "Management of Estates held by landholders". If the object of enacting Chapter IV was to transfer ownership of the lands in question, the title of that Chapter would not be "Management" but it would be "Transfer of ownership of estates held by landholders". But the terms of s. 48 make abundantly clear that the only thing that vests in the Manager is the right of possession and management of the lands in question. Under ss. 47 and 48 the Manager has, amongst other powers, the power to receive rents and profits arising from the land and thereafter to make disbursements in the order of priority set out in s. 48. Sub-section (2) of s. 48 then expressly provides that if, after making these disbursements, any balance remains in the hands of the Manager, such balance shall be paid to the landholder. It is clear that if the object in enacting Chapter IV was to transfer rights of ownership in the property either to the State Government or the Manager appointed by it, there would be no necessity for making provision, first, for the payment of debts and liabilities other than those mentioned in sub-s. (1) which means the debts and liabilities incurred on the land by the landholder prior to the management and for the payment of the balance left thereafter in the hands of the Manager to the landholder. This provision is a clear indication that ownership remains vested in the landholder and that the only effect of Chapter IV is that the Manager appointed by the State Government gets the right of possession of the land and the right of management together with all powers for the purposes of such management which the landholder, but for the notification, could have exercised. The provisions of s. 60 furnish even a clearer indication than those of s. 48. Sub-section (2) of s. 60 expressly provides that in the event of a landholder dying while the management is continuing, a person succeeding to the whole or any part of his estate would be subject to the same disabilities as are imposed by Chapter IV upon the landholder. Although sub-s. (2) is primarily enacted for the purpose of imposing these disabilities upon a successor; that sub-section clearly implies that in spite of the notification for management the ownership still remains in the landholder and the rights of such a landholder to such ownership devolve upon his death on his successor. The fact that under s. 61 the State Government has to deliver possession of the lands to the holder thereof after an order of termination has been issued again shows that under Chapter IV the ownership in the property is not transferred to the State Government.

The learned Assistant Government Pleader, however, argued that the ownership is vested in the Government only during the period that the management continues. The concept of an interim ownership is something novel and nothing has been shown to me either in the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, or any other statute whereunder it vests in a party other than the rightful owner for a limited period and thereafter again reverts to the rightful owner. It is no doubt true that under s. 58 a power to sell or grant on lease all or any part of the estate is conferred upon the Manager but rule 33 framed by the State Government under the Act shows that where a Manager proposes to sell any estate or any part thereof under s. 58, he has to give notice to the landholder to show cause why his estate or a part thereof should not be sold and after hearing the landholder or a person acting on his behalf, the Manager has to submit a report to the Collector for permission for the sale. That rule further provides that before giving such permission the Collector has again to hear the landholder or a person acting on his behalf as to why the estate should not be sold. If one were to analyse s. 54 of the Act and the sections following it, it becomes clear that the powers given to the Manager thereunder are powers analogous to those that are given to a Receiver or a Liquidator in winding-up proceedings.

As held in *F. & V. Merchants Union v. Improvement Trust, Delhi*¹ the word "vest" has not a fixed connotation. It does not mean in all cases that the property is owned by the person or authority in whom it vests. Such property may vest in title, or it may vest in possession or it may vest in a limited sense, depending upon the context in which such vesting is enacted. The word 'vest' therefore is a word of variable import. For instance, under s. 56 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, property of an insolvent vests in the receiver for the purpose of administering his estate for payment of his debts. In that case the property of the insolvent vests in the receiver not for all purposes but only for the purpose of the Insolvency Act and the receiver has no interest of his own in the property. On the other hand, under ss. 16 and 17 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, the property acquired thereunder upon the happening of certain events vests absolutely in the Government free from all encumbrances and without any conditions or limitations either as to title or possession.

It is thus clear from the provisions of Chapter IV that ownership of lands taken under management does not vest in the State Government. There is nothing in these sections indicating any such intention or object. On the contrary, as I have pointed out from ss. 48, 60 and 61 and rule 33, the only thing that vests in the State Government or in the Manager appointed is the right to possession and of management, though in the course of such management wide powers have been conferred under Chapter IV on the Manager. The contention raised by the learned Assistant Government Pleader therefore cannot be accepted.

The next contention raised on behalf of the State was that even if the ownership in the property does not vest in the State Government there is nothing in Chapter IV which imposes upon the Manager any obligation to render account of his management or to pay to the landholder the balance that may remain in his hands after making the disbursements provided for in s. 48. It was contended that there being no such provision in Chapter IV the Courts below were in error in holding that the Manager was liable to render an account and to make payment of the moneys lying with him after making provision for the payment of items mentioned in s. 48. Reliance was placed upon s. 61 which provides that on the termination of the management the estate is to be delivered to the holder together with any balance which may be left to the credit of the holder. It was contended that s. 61 shows that it is only on and after the termination of management that there could be any obligation to render an account or to make payment of monies that may be left in the hands of the Manager. The Courts below rejected this contention and held that by virtue of the provisions contained in Chapter IV the position of the Manager was that of a trustee or an agent of the landholder and the Manager was consequently liable to render an account of his management and to pay the balance lying in his hands. In my view, there is considerable justification in the conclusion arrived at by both the Courts below. If ss. 48 and 61 are properly looked at, it becomes apparent that their objects are different. Section 48 deals with payments to be made during the course of the management; whereas s. 61 deals with the things that are to happen on and after the termination of management. If this difference is borne in mind, there would be no difficulty in construing s. 48. As I have pointed out, under s. 48 the Manager has to make payments in the order of priority laid down in sub-s. (1) from the rents and income received by him under s. 47. He has first to make provision for the costs of management, the Government revenue, all debts and liabilities due or incurred to the Government in respect of the property in question, the rent due to any superior holder, periodical allowances allowed to the holder and his family by the Collector from time to time and costs of improvement of the estate. After making these disbursements if there is any residue left then the same is to be utilised for the repayment of debts and liabilities other than those mentioned in sub-s. (1) and if thereafter any balance is still left it has to be paid to the holder. It is true that s. 48 does not expressly state that the Manager has to do all these things at the end of the year or at a particular fixed time. But the section impliedly means that these disbursements and payments are to be made during the year of management and like every other management accounts have to be maintained and made up at the end of the year of management and if any balance is left the same is to be paid to the holder at the end of the year. On the other hand s. 61 shows that if on the termination of management any balances are due to the credit of the holder either as a result of a balance left in the hands of the Manager or otherwise, the same are to be handed over when the lands are delivered to the holder. Considering the scheme of Chapter IV, it is clear that except for certain special powers given to the Manager, the Manager appointed by the State Government is no more than a manager and has all the obligations of a trustee or an agent of the landholder. Consequently he is under all the obligations that such an agent would be except where such obligations are expressly saved by Chapter IV or any other provision of the Act. In that view the Courts below were right in holding that the State Government was liable to render an account of the management of the lands in question and to pay the balance left at the end of the year.

Finally it was contended by the learned Assistant Government Pleader that in any event a civil Court was barred under s. 85(1) from entertaining a claim such as the one made by the plaintiff-company in this case. A somewhat different contention was raised in the Courts below than the one that is now sought to be raised by the learned Assistant Government Pleader. The contention raised before them was that as these matters arise under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, they are triable by the tenancy Courts only, and consequently there is a bar to the jurisdiction of a civil Court. That contention has not been persisted before me. What the learned Assistant Government Pleader now contends is that s. 85(1) provides that no civil Court shall have "jurisdiction to settle, decide or deal with any question which is by or under the Act required to be settled, decided or dealt with by...a Manager."

He, therefore, contends that rendition of accounts and the payment of any balance left in his hands being questions which the Manager is entitled to decide or deal with there is a bar against a civil Court dealing with such questions. In my opinion, such a construction is untenable. This question was neither raised in the lower Courts nor has it been raised in the Memo of Appeal. But the learned Assistant Government Pleader submitted that though it is so, he should be allowed to argue this question as it is a point of law. Mr. Gupte says that he has no objection to the State being allowed to raise this point even at this late stage. It is clear, however, that the Act does not call upon nor does it confer any power upon the Manager "to settle, decide or deal with any question" as to the Manager's obligation to render account of the management or to the payment of the balance. It cannot surely be the intention of the Legislature to invest a Manager with the power to decide questions about his own obligations, in other words, to enable him to act both as a party and as a judge. It is difficult to conceive that the Legislature had such an extraordinary intention while enacting s. 85(1) of the Act. The only construction, and that seems to be the only reasonable construction, that can be placed upon s. 85(1) is that a civil Court is barred from entertaining questions dealing with the exercise of powers conferred upon the Manager by Chapter IV of the Act. The bar of s. 85(1) cannot possibly come in the way of the plaintiff-company, because what it is claiming in the suit is an account of its estate, of which the State Government has taken over management. The question that arises in the suit is whether the plaintiff-company is entitled to the relief of having an account rendered of the management by the State. This obviously is not a question which the Manager is entitled to decide, deal with or settle. Consequently s. 85(1) has no application.

These were the only contentions raised on behalf of the State. In my view, none of them has any substance.

The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. Rule in Civil Application No. 1315 of 1958 for stay is also discharged with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

GANGARAM ICHHARAM PARDESHI v. BHIKASING NATHUSING PARDESHI.*

Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act (Bom. XXVIII of 1947), Secs. 24, 22—Transfer declared to be a mortgage under s. 24(1)—Whether mortgagee liable to account for rents and profits received by him from date of application or from date of award.

Where under s. 24(1) of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1947, a transfer is declared to be a mortgage, the mortgagee will be liable to account for the rents and profits received by him from the date of the institution of the debt adjustment proceedings.

By adjudicating the true nature of a transaction under s. 24 of the Act the Court is not converting a transfer in the nature of a sale or other transfer into a mortgage. The Court being authorised to declare the real nature of the transaction, the declaration operates as from the date of the transaction.

V. V. Divekar, for the petitioner.

M. V. Paranjpe, for respondents Nos. 1 to 3.

SHAH J. The respondents filed Civil Suit No. 169 of 1945 in the Court of the Joint Civil Judge, Junior Division, Bhusaval, claiming that a transaction effected by their father Nathusing on April 30, 1938, in favour of the petitioner, whereby lands S. Nos. 3/5A and 31/3/1 of the village Borkhede, Taluka Raver, were ostensibly sold, was in the nature of a mortgage and for accounts. The suit was transferred under s. 19(b) of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1939, to the Board established in that behalf, and it was numbered as application No. 4874 of 1945. It was heard by the Civil Judge on whom the powers of the Board were conferred by the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1947, with other applications in which the respondents were concerned. The Joint Civil Judge, Junior Division, Bhusaval, by his order dated June 28, 1955, declared the impugned transaction to be in the nature of a mortgage, and directed the transferee Gangaram Ichharam to deliver possession of the lands to the respondents and to pay to the respondents mesne profits from the date of the application. Against that order an appeal was preferred to the District Court at Jalgaon. In appeal, the learned Assistant Judge confirmed the order passed by the trial Court. Gangaram Ichharam has applied to this Court in revision against the order passed by the District Court.

The question whether the transaction, dated April 30, 1938, was in the nature of a mortgage is essentially one of fact and the finding on that question by the Courts below is not liable to be challenged in this revision application. But Mr. Divekar, who appears on behalf of the petitioner, contends that the Courts below were in error in awarding mesne profits from the date of institution of the debt adjustment proceeding against the petitioner. Mr. Divekar contends that the disputed transaction could be regarded as a mortgage from the date on which the award was made by the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Court and the mortgagees' liability to pay mesne profits will arise only from that date and not anterior thereto. Mr. Divekar submits that the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act was passed with the object of relieving debtors of their indebtedness and that once the liability of a debtor under a disputed transaction creating a debt is regarded as discharged, it was not the intention of the Legislature to render the creditor liable to pay to the debtor any amount in which he may be found liable on taking accounts under the special procedure prescribed by the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act. Therefore, Mr. Divekar says, if under a transaction which is found to be in the nature of a mortgage on taking accounts nothing is due by the debtor at the date of the application, the mortgagee will not be required to account for the rents and profits received by him during the period that the application was pending in the Court of first instance. In our view, these contentions cannot be accepted. By s. 24 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act a Debt Adjustment Court is authorised to declare the true nature of a transaction by declaring it to be a mortgage though ostensibly in the form of a sale or of any other nature. The power conferred upon the Court under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act is, however, a power to declare the true nature of a transaction, that is, to ascertain the true intention and agreement between the parties irrespective of the form in which the transaction is clothed and unhampered by any rules of evidence or other law. Section 24(1) of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, in so far as it is material, provides:

"Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any law, custom, or contract, whenever it is alleged during the course of the hearing of an application made under section 4 that any transfer of land by a person whose debts are being adjusted under this Act...was a transfer in the nature of a mortgage, the Court shall declare the transfer to be a mortgage, if the Court is satisfied that the circumstances connected with that transaction showed it to be in the nature of a mortgage."

Even if a transaction is intended by the parties to be in the nature of a mortgage, but is in form otherwise, under the Evidence Act the Court will not be entitled to declare such a transaction to be in the nature of a mortgage. The only effect of s. 24 is to do away with the restrictions placed by the Evidence Act or other laws upon the powers of the Court if from the circumstances connected with the transaction it is shown to be in the nature of a mortgage. We are, therefore, unable to agree with the contention raised by Mr. Divekar that a transaction becomes a mortgage only when it is so declared under the provisions of s. 24. In our view, by its adjudication, the Court declares the true nature of the transaction, and does not impress upon it a character which was not initially intended by the parties thereto.

Reliance was sought to be placed by Mr. Divekar upon an unreported judgment of Chagla C.J. in Ratilal Ranchhodji Davda v. Narsinhadas Jamnadas.¹ In that case, it is true that the learned Chief Justice took the view that only when the declaration is made under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act that the transaction operates as a mortgage and, therefore, mesne profits cannot be awarded from the date of the application but can only be ordered from the date of the award. With respect, we are unable to accept that view. If the power, as we have already observed, under s. 24 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act conferred upon the Court is to declare the real nature of the transaction, the Court is not by adjudicating the true nature of a transaction converting a transfer in the nature of a sale or other transfer into a mortgage. The Court being authorised to declare the real nature of the transaction, the declaration, in our judgment, operates as from the date of the transaction.

The alternative argument advanced by Mr. Divekar cannot also be sustained. It is true that under s. 22 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act an account has to be taken between the parties in the manner prescribed thereby for determining the amount due to the creditor at the date of the application under s. 4. By sub-ss. (2), (3) and (4) of s. 22 it is provided that the account has to be taken till the date of institution of the application; but the Legislature has made no provision for the manner of taking accounts after the date of the application. Undoubtedly, if it be found on taking accounts according to the special mode prescribed by s. 22 that the creditor has at the date of the application been overpaid in respect of a transaction which is declared to be in the nature of a mortgage, the creditor will not be called upon to repay the amount to the mortgagor. But if the creditor remains in possession of the property mortgaged after the date of the application, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, we see no reason why the mortgagee will not be liable to account for the rents and profits received by him since the date of the application.

The view we are taking is supported by a judgment of Mr. Justice Gajendra-gadkar in Daneppa Satveerappa v. Malgouda.² In that case, it was held that under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1947, accounts can be taken between the creditor and the debtor subsequent to the making of the application for adjustment of debts and up to the date when the award is made. In our view, the judgment in Daneppa's case sets out the correct rule. A mortgagee in possession of the mortgaged property is in the position of a trustee for the mortgagor, and when the Legislature has not made any provision relating to the method of taking accounts from the mortgagee under the special statute by which the rights of the mortgagor and the mortgagee are governed, in our view, accounts must be taken under the Transfer of Property Act and the Civil Procedure Code. Absence of an express provision in the special statute about the method of taking accounts since the institution of the debt adjustment proceeding does not justify the inference that there is no liability to account.

Mr. Divekar contends that the rule that the mortgagee after the date of the application for adjustment of the debts is liable to account for the rents and profits received by him must be restricted only to those cases where something is found due to the mortgagee from the mortgagor at the date of the application, and it cannot apply to cases where the mortgage debt is before that date fully satisfied out of the rents and profits. In support of this contention, our attention is invited by Mr. Divekar to a judgment of this Court in Ramchandra v. Kollo.³ It is true that in that case a Division Bench of this Court held that under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, 1879, if it be found on taking accounts that at the date of institution of the suit nothing was due to the mortgagee from the mortgagor, the mortgagee after the date of the suit will not be held liable for mesne profits till the date of the decree. But we are unable to hold that this decision can be regarded as binding in interpreting the provisions of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act. The scheme of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act and the scheme of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act are not identical. Whereas the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act makes provision for taking accounts between a debtor and his individual creditor and for assessing his liability according to the procedure and in the manner prescribed thereby, the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act is intended to provide for a scheme of settlement of the liability of the debtor qua all his creditors. The Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act provided for taking accounts on terms favourable to the agriculturist debtor and for other facilities such as paying the debt by instalments and exemption from liability for personal arrest and exemption from attachment and sale of unencumbered property. Under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, the Court has to assess the liability of the debtor and to ascertain the assets of the debtor and his paying capacity, and to prepare a scheme under which the liability is scaled down and related to his paying capacity. It is evident that the accounts of all transactions of the debtor are required to be taken by the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Court and the assets and liabilities have then to be assessed and related. If liability of a creditor to account for the rents and profits received by him after the application is to depend upon the accidental circumstance whether the debt due to him before the date of the application has been satisfied, in our judgment, the rule suggested will be inequitable and unjust and may operate to the prejudice of the debtor as well as the general body of creditors. We are, therefore, unable to hold that the decision in Ramchandra's case can be pressed into service in construing the provisions of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act. It may be observed that even under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act this Court has taken the view that a mortgagee in possession since the date of institution of the suit is liable to account for the rents and profits received by him since the date of institution of the suit and that the account has to be taken under the Civil Procedure Code and the Transfer of Property Act (see *Dattatraya v. Mahomedkhan*⁴). It may be that to the principle enunciated in Dattatraya's case the principle in Ramchandra's case is an exception. But we do not see any reason why any similar exception should be engrafted in interpreting the provisions of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, in the absence of any compelling ground of justice or equity or binding authority.

We are, therefore, of the view that the Courts below were right in directing the creditor to pay mesne profits from the date of institution of the proceeding. It is true that the Courts below should, strictly speaking, have directed the creditor to account for the rents and profits received by him. But whether the Court directs the creditor to account for the rents and profits received by him or to pay mesne profits for the period during which he is in possession, it will make no substantial difference in the extent of the ultimate liability incurred by the creditor. On the view taken by us, the rule is discharged with costs.

Rule discharged.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 304—Sessions Judge finding verdict of jury wrong due to their making a mistake on question of law—Whether Sessions Judge competent to re-charge or give further directions to jury.

If the Sessions Judge finds that the verdict of the jury is wrong due to their misunderstanding or making a mistake on a question of law, he is competent, under s. 304 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, to invite the attention of the jury to that mistake and to give his reasons therefor. To that extent alone he can re-charge or give further directions to the jury.

BEFORE the Court of Session of Greater Bombay four persons were charged for committing offences under s. 392 read with s. 34, under s. 392/394 read with s. 34, under s. 392 read with s. 34, and under s. 392/394 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, respectively, for robbery alleged to have been committed by them in furtherance of the common intention of all, of eight gold bangles and one gold chain from the person of one Padma, wife of Kishanchand Shamdas Bhatia; for causing hurt in the course of the same transaction and in furtherance of the common intention of all, to the said Padma; for committing robbery in furtherance of the common intention of all of a wrist-watch from the person of Kishanchand Shamdas Bhatia; and voluntarily causing hurt in the course of the same transaction and in furtherance of the common intention of all to Kishanchand Shamdas Bhatia. The Additional Sessions Judge delivered a detailed charge to the jury on the evidence and the law. The jury brought in against accused No. 1 a unanimous verdict of guilty for the offences under s. 392 read with s. 34, and under s. 392/394 read with s. 34 in respect of robbery of property belonging to Padma and voluntarily causing hurt to her, and also in respect of robbery of property belonging to Kishanchand Shamdas Bhatia and voluntarily causing hurt to him. Similarly, in respect of accused No. 2 they brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty on all the four charges. When the Additional Sessions Judge asked the Foreman of the jury about the verdict in respect of one Rodrigues (accused No. 3) on the first charge under s. 392 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, he stated that the jury were unanimous in holding him guilty for robbery of property from the person of Bai Padma. But on the second charge against accused No. 3 under s. 392/394 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, i.e., for the charge of causing hurt to Bai Padma in the course of the same transaction and in furtherance of the common intention of all, the Foreman told the learned Judge that the jury were unanimous in holding him not guilty. At that stage, the Additional Sessions Judge felt that there was some confusion in the mind of the jury. He, therefore, re-charged the jury. He told them:

"...Let there be no confusion in your mind. Gentlemen, if you come to the conclusion that s. 34, I.P.C., applies and that a particular accused was present, then it does not matter as to what was done by which accused. What you have to consider is whether s. 34 applies or not and then whether the particular accused person was present or not. If s. 34 applies, then even if a little thing is done by the accused and actually the removal of ornaments was done by another accused, even then he will be equally responsible with others, even though he himself did not do it. It is only when you come to the conclusion that s. 34 does not apply that you have to consider what offence, if any, the individual accused has done. If you come to the conclusion that accused No. 3 was there and s. 34 applies, then even if the hurt was caused by one of the accused and it was caused during the course of the robbery then he will be equally guilty as if he has himself caused the hurt. Therefore, consider your verdict as a whole with regard to all accused in the light of what I have stated."

The jury again retired and reconsidered the matter. The Judge, when the jury reappeared, asked them whether they had reconsidered their verdict, and they confirmed their verdict previously recorded against accused Nos. 1 and 2 in respect of all the charges against them, and also against accused No. 3 in respect of the first head of the charge. But, on re-consideration of their verdict, they stated that they wanted to vary their verdict in so far as accused No. 3 was concerned on the second charge. In answer to the further question by the Court the Foreman stated that the jury were unanimous that accused No. 3 was guilty on the second charge under s. 392/394 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code. The Judge then proceeded to record the verdict of the jury on the third and fourth heads of charge against accused No. 3 and also on the four heads of the charge against accused No. 4. The Judge then proceeded to convict all the accused for the offences charged against them. Accused Nos. 3 and 4 were sentenced by the Additional Sessions Judge to suffer rigorous imprisonment for three years on each head of the charge, and the sentences were directed to run concurrently. Both these accused appealed against the order of conviction and sentence passed against them. At the hearing for admission the High Court summarily dismissed the appeal of accused No. 4, but admitted the appeal of accused No. 3.

The appeal came up for hearing before Shah and Shelat JJ. A question was raised in the appeal whether the Sessions Judge had jurisdiction to re-charge the jury and to ask them to reconsider their verdict. Their Lordships referred this question to a larger bench. The referring judgment was delivered by Shah J. on September 25, 1958, who after stating the facts as above, proceeded:—

SHAH J. Mr. Mirchandani, who appears on behalf of accused No. 3, contends that there was a serious irregularity in the procedure followed by the learned Additional Sessions Judge and that the verdict of the jury cannot be regarded as binding upon this Court. Mr. Mirchandani points out that the jury had, on the second charge against accused No. 3, i.e., on the charge under s. 392/394 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, brought in a unanimous verdict of "not guilty", and that if the learned Judge was of the view that the verdict could not be sustained, i.e., the verdict was so perverse that no reasonable body of men could have arrived at that verdict, it was his duty to act under s. 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and to make a reference to this Court, but he had no jurisdiction under the Code of Criminal Procedure, on the assumption that there was some confusion in the mind of the jury, to re-charge the jury and to ask them to reconsider their verdict. Mr. Mirchandani says that the procedure followed by the learned Additional Sessions Judge is in direct violation of the terms of s. 304 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Mr. Mirchandani also relies upon a judgment of this Court in Emperor v. Kondiba,¹ in support of the contention raised by him.

Section 300 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that after the Judge has concluded his charge, the jury may retire to consider their verdict, and that, except with the leave of the Court, no person other than a juror shall speak to or hold any communication with any member of such jury. Section 301 provides that when the jury have considered their verdict, the Foreman shall inform the Judge what their verdict is, or what the verdict of the majority is, or that the jurors are equally divided in opinion. Section 302 provides that if the jury are not unanimous, the Judge may require them to retire for further consideration, and that after such period as the Judge considers reasonable, the jury may deliver their verdict, although they are not unanimous, or the Foreman may inform the Judge that the jurors are still equally divided in opinion. Section 303 provides that the jury shall return a verdict on all the charges on which the accused is tried, and the Judge may ask them such questions as are necessary to ascertain what their verdict is. Section 304, on which Mr. Mirchandani relies, provides that when by accident or mistake a wrong verdict is delivered, the jury may, before or immediately after it is recorded, amend the verdict, and it shall stand as ultimately amended. Mr. Mirchandani says that under s. 303 the Court is entitled only to ask the jury such questions as are necessary to ascertain what the verdict of the jury is, and if by reason of an accident or mistake a wrong verdict is delivered, then under s. 304 the jury are entitled, before or immediately after the verdict is recorded, to amend the verdict. Mr. Mirchandani contends that the mistake or accident must be in the delivery of the verdict by the jury and not in the consideration of the evidence or law. Even if by reason of a confusion in the mind of the jury about the evidence on the law applicable a wrong verdict is brought, it is not open to the jury, contends Mr. Mirchandani, to amend their verdict, and much less is it open to the Judge to ask the jury to amend their verdict. The only provision, Mr. Mirchandani contends, for rectifying the erroneous verdict is to be found in s. 307 under which where the Judge disagrees with the verdict of the jury, he has to make a reference to the High Court recording the grounds of his opinion. In the present case, evidently there was an inconsistency in the verdict of the jury in so far as it related to the first head of the charge against accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3 and the second head of the charge against them; and the question which falls to be determined is, whether, on the view that there was some confusion in the mind of the jury in understanding the law, the learned Additional Sessions Judge was entitled to ask them to reconsider their verdict which was already delivered and recorded?

In Emperor v. Kondiba certain persons were tried for counterfeiting coins and having in their possession implements and materials for counterfeiting coins, i.e., offences punishable under ss. 232 and 235 of the Indian Penal Code. They were tried by the Sessions Judge with a jury. The jury brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty under s. 235, part 2, and a unanimous verdict of not guilty under s. 232 in respect of all the accused. The Judge did not agree with the verdict of the jury on the charge under s. 232, and he then asked the jury the reasons for holding that the accused were not guilty under s. 232. The answer given by the jury was that the accused were not actually caught in the act of coining. What followed then was recorded by the Sessions Judge as follows (p. 418):

"The commentary of section 232 (which had already been read to the jury by the Public Prosecutor when summing up the case) is again read to the jury, as it appears to me probable that their verdict of 'not guilty' under section 232 is the result of a mistake, and the jury are asked to retire and reconsider their verdict in the light of the commentary on s. 232."

Now, that case was substantially of the same type as the present. The jury brought in what apparently was an inconsistent verdict and the Judge thought that there was some confusion in the mind of the jury on the true effect of s. 232 of the Indian Penal Code. After the jury reconsidered the verdict and stated to the Judge that they were under a mistake, and that they had not properly understood "the commentary on s. 232" and that their verdict after reconsideration was that all the accused were guilty under s. 232 also, the learned Sessions Judge accepted the amended verdict of the jury and sentenced each accused to undergo rigorous imprisonment for five years. Against that conviction an appeal was preferred to this Court, and this Court observed that the ground upon which the Judge asked the jury to reconsider their verdict was that it appeared to him that the first verdict of 'not guilty' was the result of a mistake, and that s. 304 of the Code of Criminal Procedure enabled the jury to amend their verdict, if it was wrongly delivered on account of an accident or mistake. It was then observed (p. 314):

"...But that section (s. 304) obviously contemplates cases where the verdict delivered is not in accordance with what was really intended by the jury. Here there was no accident or mistake in the delivery of the verdict, for the jury having arrived at the conclusion that the accused were not guilty gave the verdict in accordance with it. The mistake was in their misunderstanding the law under section 232. If such mistake has resulted in an erroneous verdict, it can be corrected only by the Judge disagreeing with the jury and referring the case under s. 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code to the High Court. There is no provision in the Code which empowers the Judge to question the jury as to their reasons for a unanimous verdict when there is nothing ambiguous in the verdict itself and no lurking uncertainty in the minds of the jury themselves regarding it."

If this were the only authority of this Court, there can be no doubt that the procedure followed by the learned Judge in the Court below was erroneous. But our attention was invited to another decision of this Court in Queen-Empress v. Madhavrao.² In that case, the accused was tried with the aid of a jury for the offence of rape. The jury announced through their Foreman that the accused "did the act with consent". The Sessions Judge, thereupon, without requiring the jury to reconsider their verdict or giving them any fresh directions, asked them whether they found the accused guilty or not-guilty. The jury again retired and brought in a verdict of guilty, upon which the Sessions Judge sentenced the accused to imprisonment for three years. The order of conviction was reversed in appeal to this Court. In the view of this Court, the first verdict of the jury was a "special verdict" and there being no real ambiguity about it, the Court of Session was bound under s. 302 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to record the verdict and apply the law thereto. That case has, it is true, no direct application to the present case. But it appears to have been assumed in that case by Mr. Justice Jardine, who delivered the judgment of the Court, that it was open to the Court, even after the verdict of the jury was delivered, to re-charge the jury and to reconsider the verdict. It was observed in that case (at p. 736) criticising the procedure of the trial Judge, that—

"...The learned Judge for some reason, not apparent on the record, then required the jury to say whether Madhavrao was guilty or not guilty. It does not appear that he required them to re-consider their first verdict, as has been held to be a legal course in England—Reg. v. Meany,³ or that he gave them any fresh directions or explained to them that a finding that the woman consented was tantamount to acquittal."

Relying upon these observations, the learned Assistant Government Pleader contends that in the absence of an express provision in the Code of Criminal Procedure prohibiting re-charging the jury and asking them to reconsider their first verdict, it is open to the Judge to re-charge the jury and ask them to reconsider their verdict even after the verdict is delivered and recorded, if the Judge is of the view that the verdict is the result of confusion in the mind of the jury. In the present case, the verdict, it is true, was not ambiguous or indefinite, nor can it be regarded as a "special verdict". The verdict on the second charge, though clear, was inconsistent with what was implicit in the verdict against accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3 on the first charge. The question which falls to be determined is, if an apparently unambiguous verdict is delivered by the jury, but that verdict is inconsistent with the rest of the verdict qua the same accused or other accused, is it open to the Court to ask the jury to reconsider the verdict after giving them further directions on questions of law or fact? The observations made in the case of Emperor v. Kondiba, to which we have already referred, appear definitely to hold that such a course is not justified. But in Queen-Empress v. Madhavrao, it seems implicit that it is open to the Court in certain circumstances to re-charge the jury and ask them to reconsider their verdict apart from the provision of s. 302 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Our attention was also invited to a recent judgment of the Calcutta High Court in Sadar Sheikh v. State.⁴ It appears to have been the view of the Calcutta High Court (see *Rafat Sheikh v. Emperor*⁵) that where a Sessions Judge is not minded to accept what obviously is an inconsistent verdict he is competent to address a further charge to the jury and he need not deal with the matter by referring the case to the High Court for consideration. In the later decision—Sadar Sheikh v. State, to which our attention was invited, the Calcutta High Court extended the principle and held that if it appeared from their verdict that the jury had not understood the charge, it was open to the Court to re-charge the jury and to ask them to reconsider the verdict.

As the question raised is of some importance and the observations made in the judgment in Emperor v. Kondiba are emphatic, we are of the view that this question may be considered by a larger Bench. We, therefore, order that the papers of this case be placed before the learned Chief Justice for constituting a larger Bench to decide the question.

"Whether it is open to a Court of Session trying a case with the aid of a jury, after recording the opinion of the jury, which is ex facie not ambiguous, to re-charge the jury, because the Judge feels that the verdict is the result of confusion in the minds of the jury, and to obtain the verdict of the jury after so re-charging the jury?" After the opinion of the Full Bench is received, the appeal to be placed for hearing.

The question was considered by a full bench composed of Chainani C.J. and Mudholkar and Shelat JJ.

V. K. Mirchandani, with B. K. Vasvani, for the appellant-accused No. 3.
Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, for the State.

CHAINANI C.J. The question referred to the full bench is:

"Whether it is open to a Court of Session trying a case with the aid of a jury, after recording the opinion of the jury, which is ex facie not ambiguous, to re-charge the jury, because the Judge feels that the verdict is the result of confusion in the minds of the jury, and to obtain the verdict of the jury after so re-charging the jury."

In order to answer this question, it is necessary to consider the provisions contained in the Code relating to trial of cases tried by jury. Section 297, Criminal Procedure Code, provides that in cases tried by jury, when the case for the defence and the prosecutor's reply are concluded, the Court shall proceed to charge the jury, summing up the evidence for the prosecution and defence, and laying down the law by which the jury are to be guided. Section 298, Criminal Procedure Code, lays down that in such cases it is the duty of the Judge to decide all questions of law. Section 299 states that it is the duty of the jury to decide which view of the facts is true and also all questions, which according to law, are to be deemed questions of fact.

Under ss. 298 and 299, Criminal Procedure Code, there is, therefore, a division of functions between the Judge and the jury. All questions of fact are to be decided by the jury, while questions of law must be decided by the Judge himself. Section 300 states that after the Judge has finished his charge, the jury may retire to consider their verdict. Section 301 states that when the jury have considered their verdict, the foreman shall inform the Judge what is their verdict, or what is the verdict of a majority or that the jurors are equally divided in opinion. Section 302, Criminal Procedure Code, provides that if the jury are not unanimous, the Judge may require them to retire for further consideration. Section 303, Criminal Procedure Code, empowers the Judge to ask such questions to the jury as are necessary to ascertain what the jury really meant by their verdict. It can, therefore, be used only in cases in which the verdict of the jury is ambiguous. When, however, the verdict is free from ambiguity, no questions can be put under s. 303, Criminal Procedure Code. Section 304 provides that when by accident or mistake a wrong verdict is delivered, the jury may, before or immediately after it is recorded, amend the verdict, and it shall stand as ultimately amended. Section 306 provides that when the Judge does not think it necessary to express disagreement with the verdict of the jurors or of a majority of the jurors, he shall give judgment accordingly. Section 307, Criminal Procedure Code, states that if in any such case the Judge disagrees with the verdict of the jurors or of a majority of the jurors and is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court, he shall submit the case accordingly.

It will be seen from these provisions that the Code does not contain any specific provision empowering the Judge to re-charge the jury. The learned Government Pleader has urged that in the absence of any provision to the contrary in the Code, it is open to the Judge to re-charge the jury, whenever he finds it necessary to do so in the interest of justice. This argument cannot be accepted, because the Code lays down in detail the procedure, which is to be followed in trial of sessions cases tried by jury. It is, therefore, not open to the Judge to follow any procedure other than that laid down in the Code.

The question, which we have to decide in this case, is whether a Judge can re-charge the jury, when he finds that the verdict is the result of confusion in the minds of the jury. As I have stated, there is no express provision in the Code empowering a Judge to re-charge the jury. Section 304, Criminal Procedure Code, however, provides that when by accident or mistake a wrong verdict is delivered, the jury may, before or immediately after it is recorded, amend the verdict, and it shall stand as ultimately amended. This section, therefore, enables a wrong verdict to be corrected, when it is due to an accident or a mistake. The verdict would be wrong due to an accident, when, for instance, the foreman while informing the Judge of the jury's verdict, accidentally makes a slip and mentions a wrong section of law. The other case, in which a wrong verdict can be corrected, is when it is due to a mistake. The mistake may be discovered either by the jury itself or by the Judge. This section does not say that it can be used only when the mistake is discovered by the jury itself. In the absence of any such provision in the section, it will be reasonable to hold that this section can be used even when the mistake is discovered by the Judge. Consequently, under this section the Judge can point out the mistake to the jury, and if he has the power to point out the mistake to the jury, it is necessarily implied that he can also give reasons, on account of which he thinks that there is a mistake. The power of the Judge to point out the mistake and give reasons therefor is, therefore, in our opinion, implicit in the provisions of s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code. The mistake may be a mistake of fact or a mistake of law. So far as questions of fact are concerned, they are entirely within the province of the jury, for under s. 299, Criminal Procedure Code, they have to decide all questions of fact. Unless the Judge makes a reference under s. 307, Criminal Procedure Code, to the High Court, he is bound by the view taken by the jury on questions of fact. The various sections laying down the procedure for trial of sessions cases by jury must be read together. Section 304, Criminal Procedure Code, must, therefore, be read along with ss. 298 and 299, Criminal Procedure Code. The finding of the jury on questions of fact being binding upon the Judge, it necessarily follows that it will not be open to the Judge to tell the jury that their finding is incorrect due to a mistake of fact. Consequently, if the wrong verdict of the jury is due to a mistake of fact, the Judge cannot point out such a mistake to the jury under s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code. On the other hand, if it is a mistake of law, he is perfectly competent to draw the attention of the jury to it, for under s. 298, Criminal Procedure Code, all questions of law have to be decided by him. In our opinion, therefore, if the Judge finds that the jury has delivered a verdict, which is wrong due to a mistake of law, it would be competent for him to point that mistake to the jury and also to give his reasons therefor. To that extent alone he can re-charge the jury.

It will now refer to various cases, which have been cited in the course of arguments. Mr. Mirchandani, who appears on behalf of the accused, has relied on *Emperor v. Kondiba*¹ in support of his argument that s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code, contemplates only those cases, in which there is a mistake in the actual delivery of the verdict, i.e., where the verdict is different from what the jury actually intended to deliver. In that case the accused were tried before the Sessions Court on charges under ss. 232 and 235, Indian Penal Code. The jury returned a unanimous verdict of guilty under s. 235, Indian Penal Code, and a unanimous verdict of not guilty under s. 232, Indian Penal Code. The learned Judge questioned the jury as to the reasons for holding that the accused were not guilty under s. 232, Indian Penal Code. The jury answered that the accused were not actually caught in the act of coining. The learned Judge then explained to them the law under s. 232, Indian Penal Code, and asked them to reconsider their verdict. Accordingly, the jury reconsidered the matter and returned a unanimous verdict that the accused were also guilty under s. 232, Indian Penal Code. It was held that s. 303, Criminal Procedure Code, limits the power of the Judge to question the jury only to cases in which it is necessary to ascertain what the verdict of the jury is, i.e., where the verdict delivered is in ambiguous terms or with uncertain sound so that their meaning is not clear. As there was no ambiguity in the unanimous verdict of not guilty under s. 232, Indian Penal Code, it was not necessary to put any question under s. 303, Criminal Procedure Code, in order to ascertain what the jury's verdict was. Consequently, the only course left for the Judge, if he disagreed with the verdict of the jury, was to refer the case under s. 307, Criminal Procedure Code, to the High Court. In this view it was really not necessary in that case to consider the provisions of s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code. The learned Judges, however, referred to this section and observed that this section contemplates cases where the verdict delivered is not in accordance with what was really intended by the jury. With respect, it is difficult to see why the provisions of s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code, should be limited in this manner. The section provides for the correction of a wrong verdict, when such wrong verdict is due to an accident or a mistake. There does not appear to be any sufficient reason why the words "accident" or "mistake" must be confined only to cases, in which the verdict actually delivered is different from what the jury intended to give.

A different view was expressed in Queen-Empress v. Madhav Rao.² In that case the verdict of the jury was that the accused, who was tried for rape, did the act with consent. The Sessions Judge then asked the jurors whether they found the accused guilty or not guilty. The jury again retired and brought in a verdict of guilty. Accordingly, the Sessions Judge convicted the accused. The conviction was set aside on the ground that as there was no ambiguity in the verdict of the jury, the Sessions Judge was bound to record the verdict and apply the law thereto. It was also held that the second verdict could not be sustained, as there was nothing to show that the Sessions Judge gave the jury any fresh directions or explained to them that a finding that the woman had consented was tantamount to an acquittal. The learned Judges, therefore, appear to have been of the opinion that the Sessions Judge could give fresh directions to the jury. This case was followed in Empress v. Bharmia.³ In that case, the jury, by a majority of four to one, found the accused, who was charged with murder, guilty of voluntarily causing grievous hurt. The Sessions Judge thereupon put several questions to the jury. Thereafter the learned Judge, disagreeing with the verdict of the jury, referred the case to the High Court. It was held that questions put to a jury by the Sessions Judge, demanding their reasons for acquitting the accused on the charge on which the jury had delivered a unanimous verdict without any uncertain sound, exceeded the limits of questioning which the law contemplates. It was further held that if the jury were not unanimous, the proper course open to the Judge was to require them, under s. 302, Criminal Procedure Code, to retire for further consideration. It was also observed that the Sessions Judge might, at the same time, have given further directions on matters of law. In these two cases, therefore, the view taken was that the Judge can give further directions to the jury, in case he finds that the jury has delivered a wrong verdict due to misunderstanding of law.

The Calcutta High Court has in a series of cases taken the view that it is open to the Sessions Judge to re-charge the jury on specific points, in the absence of anything in the Criminal Procedure Code, which prevents him from doing so. (See Hamid Ali Haldar v. King-Emperor,⁴ Rafat Sheikh v. Emperor,⁵ and *Sadek Mandal v. Emperor*⁶). These cases have been followed by the Patna High Court in Janak Singh v. Emperor.⁷ With respect, it seems to us that the power of the Sessions Judge to charge the jury must be derived from the provisions of the Code, which lay down the procedure to be followed in trial of Sessions cases and that unless these provisions expressly or impliedly confer a power upon the Sessions Judge to re-charge the jury, he cannot do so.

The other case, which has been cited in the course of arguments, on which Mr. Mirchandani has relied, is Sundaram Ayyar, In re.⁸ In that case, the decision in Emperor v. Kondiba was followed, and it was held that when a Sessions Judge thinks that the jury had, by committing an error of law, committed an error of judgment but not that they had delivered a verdict, which they did not intend to deliver, he cannot address another charge to the jury on the law and request them to reconsider their verdict in the light of the same, but should, if he disagrees with the verdict of the jury, submit the case to the High Court under s. 307, Criminal Procedure Code. It was observed in the same case that s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code, has no application where there is no accident or mistake in the delivery of the verdict and the mistake lies in the misunderstanding of the law by the jury. For the reasons, which I have already given, it seems to us, however, that where a verdict of the jury obviously appears to be due to a misunderstanding or mistake of law, the Sessions Judge can, under s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code, draw the attention of the jury to that mistake.

Our reply to the question, which has been referred to the full bench, is that if the Sessions Judge finds that the verdict of the jury is wrong due to their misunderstanding or making a mistake on a question of law, he is competent, under s. 304, Criminal Procedure Code, to invite the attention of the jury to that mistake and to give his reasons therefor. To that extent alone he can re-charge or give further directions to the jury.

Answer accordingly.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chaudhary, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Shelat.

THE MAHARANA MILL KAMDAR UNION v. N. L. VYAS.*

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947); Secs. 3(b), 20(3), 33, 33A, 15—Parties to industrial dispute, pending references to Industrial Tribunal under s. 10, arriving at settlement to refer disputes to private arbitration—Application by such parties to Tribunal for permission to withdraw pending cases—Terms of settlement, stating that disputes should be referred to specified arbitrators, attached to application—Tribunal by order giving "award as per terms of settlement"—Order published in Official Gazette—Complaint made by party to dispute under s. 33-A of dismissal within one month of publication of award—Whether order made by Tribunal, award within meaning of Act—Effect of the order passed by Tribunal.

During the pendency of certain references made to the Industrial Tribunal under s. 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, the parties arrived at a settlement, by which they agreed to refer the dispute between them to private arbitration. Accordingly the parties applied to the Industrial Tribunal for permission to withdraw the cases pending before it and to this application they attached the terms of the settlement which stated that the disputes should be referred for decision to certain specified arbitrators. On this application the Industrial Tribunal made the following order:—"The terms of agreement have been filed by the parties. I, therefore, give my award as per terms of settlement appended herewith." This order was published as an award in the Government Gazette. Thereafter complaints were made to the Industrial Tribunal under s. 33-A of the Act by the petitioners, one of the parties to the dispute, in which they contended that as they had been dismissed within one month from the date of the publication of the award, there had been a contravention of the provisions of s. 33 of the Act:—

Held, that the effect of the order passed by the Industrial Tribunal was that the proceedings before it came to an end when it passed the order, but the disputes still continued and there was no determination thereof by the Tribunal and consequently the order made by the Tribunal was not award within the meaning of the Act, and that as no proceedings were pending before the Tribunal when the petitioners were dismissed, the provisions of s. 33 could not, therefore, be said to have been contravened.

State of Bihar v. D. N. Ganguly and Krishnakutty Nair v. Industrial Tribunal,² referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

K. K. Singhi, for the petitioners in all the five applications.

I. M. Nanavati, with Vithalbai B. Patel and J. B. Patel, for opponent No. 2 in all.

CHAUDHARY C.J. The petitioners in these five applications were employees of the Maharana Mills Ltd. at Porbandar, respondent No. 2, to whom I will hereinafter refer to as 'the respondent'. In 1954-55 there were disputes between the respondent and its workmen represented by the Maharana Mill Majoor Mahajan Sangh. Three references were then made by the Saurashtra Government under s. 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act to the Industrial Tribunal. These were References Nos. 47 of 1954, 91 of 1955 and 102 of 1955. During the pendency of these references before the Industrial Tribunal the parties arrived at a settlement, by which they agreed to refer the disputes between them to private arbitration. On June 8, 1956, an application signed on behalf of both the parties, that is to say, the respondent and the workmen represented by the Maharana Mill Majoor Mahajan Sangh was made to the Industrial Tribunal the Industrial Tribunal; the Tribunal had not issued general notice to persons employed in the mills. It was, therefore, contended on the part of the respondent that the petitioners were not parties to or concerned in the dispute referred to the Tribunal or bound by the award made by the Tribunal. These contentions were accepted by the Industrial Tribunal, which dismissed the applications made by the petitioners. The orders of the Tribunal dismissing the applications of the petitioners have been sought to be set aside in these five special civil applications.

*Decided, December 10, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 2358 of 1958 (with Special Civil Applications Nos. 2359, 2360, 2361 and 2362 of 1958).

In order to appreciate the arguments, which have been advanced in support of the petitioners, it is necessary to consider the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. The references had been made to the Industrial Tribunal as they were made before the coming into force of the Act. Section 2(b) of the Act defines the word "award" as a decision or final determination by an Industrial Tribunal of any industrial dispute or of any question relating thereto. Section 10 provides for a reference of an industrial dispute being made by the appropriate Government to the Industrial Tribunal for adjudication, it shall hold its proceedings expeditiously and shall submit its award as soon as practicable on the conclusion thereof, to the appropriate Government. Section 17 provides for publication of the award in the Official Gazette. Section 17A states that the award of the Tribunal shall become enforceable on the expiry of thirty days from the date of its publication in the Official Gazette. Section 18 provides that an award, which has been made, shall be binding on all parties to the industrial dispute and on all persons employed in the establishment to which the dispute relates, on the date of the award and on all persons who subsequently become employed in the establishment. Sub-section (3) of s. 20 states that proceedings before a Tribunal shall be deemed to have concluded on the date on which the award becomes enforceable under s. 17A, i.e., on the expiry of one month from the date of publication of the award in the Official Gazette. Section 33 states that during the pendency of proceedings before a Tribunal in respect of an industrial dispute, an employer shall not dismiss any workman concerned in such dispute without the express permission in writing of the Tribunal. Section 33-A, which was inserted in the Act by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act, 1952, states that where contravention of the provisions of s. 33 during the pendency of proceedings before a Tribunal, any employee aggrieved by such contravention may file a complaint in writing to such Tribunal and on receipt of such complaint the Tribunal shall adjudicate upon the complaint as if it was a dispute pending before it in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

The orders made by the Industrial Tribunal on the three references which it has described as awards, were published on June 13, 1956. They were dismissed within a week thereafter. The petitioners' case is that the proceedings before the Tribunal must under sub-s. (3) of s. 20 be deemed to have concluded on the date on which the award becomes enforceable under s. 17A, i.e., on the expiry of one month from the date of publication of the award in the Official Gazette. The respondent contended that the provisions of s. 33 have been contravened. The respondent on the other hand, is that the orders made by the Tribunal on the three references were not awards within the meaning of the Act, that the proceedings before the Tribunal were concluded when the Tribunal passed its orders on June 9, 1956, and June 11, 1956, allowing the disputes to be withdrawn. It is contended that consequently no proceedings were pending before the Tribunal when the orders were dismissed on and after June 14, 1956. The material question for consideration, therefore, is whether the orders passed by the Tribunal were awards within the meaning of the Act. According to the definition given in the Act, an award must be (1) a determination, (2) by the Industrial Tribunal, and (3) the determination must be of an industrial dispute or any question relating thereto. Where a Tribunal allows a dispute to be withdrawn, in order that it may be referred to a private arbitration, there is no determination of the dispute itself, the dispute is instead of being decided by the Industrial Tribunal, it is to be decided by private arbitration. There is, therefore, no determination of the dispute in such cases; much less is it a determination by an Industrial Tribunal.

Mr. Singhvi has contended that the three references could not be withdrawn, as these references had been made to the Tribunal by the State Government and as under s. 15 the Tribunal was bound to proceed with the references until it had made the awards. He has relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in *State of Bihar v. D. N. Ganguly*¹, in which it was held that Government has no power to cancel or supersede a reference made by it under s. 10 of the Act. That case does not, however, decide that the parties, between whom the dispute is to be adjudicated upon by the Industrial Tribunal, cannot withdraw the dispute from adjudication by the Tribunal. It is, however, not necessary to decide this point in these applications, because the question before us is not whether the withdrawals were legal, but whether the orders permitting the withdrawals amount to awards.

The orders passed by the Tribunal on the applications for withdrawal made to it were that it was giving awards as per terms of the settlements. The terms of the settlements show that the disputes between the parties had not been resolved; all that had been agreed was that these disputes should be referred for decision to certain specified arbitrators. There was no decision by the Tribunal on the matters in dispute. Consequently, there was no determination of the disputes within the meaning of the Act. Even though, therefore, the orders made by the Tribunal are described as awards and were published as such in the Official Gazette, they were not awards within the meaning of the Act. The position might have been different, if the disputes had been settled on merits by private agreements and the Tribunal had been asked to make awards in terms of the agreements, but that is not the case here.

Mr. Singhvi has relied on the decision of a single Judge of the Kerala High Court reported in Krishnakutty Nair v. Industrial Tribunal.² In that case, during the pendency of a reference before an Industrial Tribunal, the parties agreed to refer the matters in dispute to arbitration of certain persons. An application was then made to the Tribunal for permission to withdraw the dispute. The Tribunal after holding an inquiry came to the conclusion that the terms of the settlement were fair and beneficial to the workers. The Tribunal then made an award accepting the terms of settlement and holding that there was no subsisting dispute to be decided by the Tribunal. The question then arose whether parties by agreement between them could withdraw a reference made to an Industrial Tribunal. It was held that they could do so, and that the Industrial Tribunal was competent to allow the withdrawal of the dispute. The judgment shows that the learned Judge was inclined to regard the order made by the Tribunal as an award. He has observed that the expression "determination" in the definition of "award" indicates only coming to an end, which may be in any way whatever. With respect, it seems to us however that the definition clearly contemplates determination of the dispute by an Industrial Tribunal. Where a dispute is withdrawn from the purview of an Industrial Tribunal, the proceedings before the Tribunal come to an end by the Tribunal allowing the dispute to be withdrawn, but there is no determination of the dispute by it. A distinction must be drawn between the determination of an industrial dispute and the determination or termination of proceedings before a Tribunal. In the present cases, the effect of the orders passed by the Tribunal was that the proceedings before it came to an end, but the disputes still continued and there was no determination thereof by the Tribunal. Consequently, the orders made by the Tribunal are not awards within the meaning of the Act.

Section 15 of the Act provides that where an industrial dispute has been referred to a Tribunal, it shall, on the conclusion of proceedings before it, submit its award. Mr. Singhvi has, therefore, contended that in case we hold, as we are inclined to do, that the orders made by the Tribunal cannot amount to awards, the proceedings must be held to be still pending before the Industrial Tribunal. This argument cannot be accepted, because rightly or wrongly the Tribunal allowed the parties to withdraw the matters in dispute from adjudication by it. After the Tribunal passed orders sanctioning the withdrawals, the proceedings before the Tribunal came to an end. The orders allowing the matters in dispute to be withdrawn were passed on June 9 and 11. The petitioners were dismissed thereafter. Consequently, no proceedings were pending before the Tribunal, when the petitioners were dismissed. The provisions of s. 33 cannot, therefore, be said to have been contravened.

The view taken by the Industrial Tribunal is, therefore, correct. The rules issued on the five applications will, therefore, be discharged. There will be no order as to costs.

Rules discharged.

Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890), Secs. 74-B, 74-C—Goods consigned in open wagon and booking done at Railway Risk Note I—Goods found short in weight when received by consignee—Suit by consignee against railway for loss of goods—Whether railway protected under s. 74-B—Whether words "destruction, deterioration or damage" in s. 74-B includes loss.

The words "destruction, deterioration or damage" in s. 74-B of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, do not include "loss". Therefore, the section does not grant immunity to the railway in case of loss where the goods are carried in open wagons.

Bengal and North-Western Rly., Co., Ltd. v. Tupon Dass, explained.

G. G. in Council v. Patal Paul & Co., referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Abidali, for the applicant.

P. N. Rudra, for the opponent.

KOTVAL J. On March 30, 1955, the Tata Iron and Steel Company, Ltd. consigned one wagon-load of mild steel angle iron bars from the Kumardubi railway station under railway receipt No. 259507, invoice No. 2, dated March 30, 1955. The consignee was the plaintiff who is an iron and steel merchant at Nagpur. When the consignment was received at Nagpur, it was found short in weight, i.e. the goods weighed 20 tons and 3 cwts. when sent, but they were found to be only 19 tons and 3 cwts. on reweighment at Nagpur. The plaintiff sued the defendant, the Union of India, representing the South-Eastern Railway, for the loss of the goods.

Now, there is no dispute as to the findings on the question of fact. Both the parties have accepted the findings of the trial Court which are as follows:—

"The following facts are now too clear to be disputed (as seen from the evidence on record): (i) that the consignment was loaded in an open wagon, not by the defendants' men or under their supervision though the booking was done at the railway risk note I, (ii) that on reweighment at Nagpur, the consignment did weigh only 19 tons and 4 cwts. as against the original weight of 20 tons and 3 cwts., (iii) that the plaintiff did protest on account of the shortage though he did not do so promptly, (iv) in the absence of any cogent evidence from the defendants' side I see no reason to disbelieve the plaintiff."

Notwithstanding these findings the trial Court dismissed the plaintiff's claim, because it held that the defendant railway was protected under s. 74-B of the Indian Railways Act.

Section 74-B runs as follows:—

"When any goods which, under ordinary circumstances, would be carried in covered vehicles or vessels and would be liable to damage if carried otherwise, are, at the request of the sender or his agent recorded in the forwarding note, tendered for carriage by railway in open vehicles or vessels, the railway administration shall not be responsible for any destruction, deterioration or damage which may arise only by reason of the goods being so carried."

The view which prevailed with the trial Court was that since the goods were carried in an open wagon, the railway was completely protected and was not responsible for any destruction, deterioration or damage, which presumably includes loss.

On behalf of the plaintiff it is now urged that s. 74-B does not afford any protection to the railway if the goods are lost because it only protects the railway against "destruction, deterioration or damage". Mr. Rudra on behalf of the railway has urged that loss of the goods is included in the word "deterioration" in s. 74-B and he relies upon a decision of the Patna High Court in Bengal and North-Western Rly., Co., Ltd. v. Tupan Dass.¹

In that case the division bench of the Patna High Court was concerned with the interpretation of s. 75 of the Railways Act and the words used in s. 75 are "the railway administration shall not be responsible for the loss, destruction or deterioration of the parcel or package". In interpreting the word "deterioration" the division bench held upon a reference to the meaning of the word in the Oxford Dictionary that it meant impairment in quality or value, and the division bench concluded that if any goods are abstracted from a parcel, the parcel was impaired in value and therefore the loss is included in the word "deterioration". Mr. Rudra on behalf of the railway urges that the word "deterioration" as used in s. 74-B is indicative of the same connotation. Section 75 of the Railways Act is curiously worded and the wording is peculiar to itself. It differs from the new s. 74-B with which I am here concerned. Section 75 speaks of "articles...contained in any parcel or package" and indemnifies the railway in the following words "the railway administration shall not be responsible for the loss, destruction or deterioration of the parcel or package". In my opinion it is important to notice that the emphasis is on the loss, destruction or deterioration of the "parcel or package" as distinct from the articles contained therein. It is this peculiar dichotomy which induced the Patna High Court to hold in Bengal and North-Western Rly., Co., Ltd. v. Tupan Dass (cit. sup.) at p. 467 that "the parcel was impaired in value by the abstraction of these articles and consequently there was deterioration of the parcel".

Section 74-B, however, does not refer to the parcel or package in which the goods are contained but speaks directly of the goods themselves. In the different context of s. 74-B it seems to me difficult to hold that "deterioration" of the goods is the same thing as loss of the goods.

The provisions of s. 74-B were based upon the provisions incorporated in the old Risk Note in form C which were similar in language. Considering the provisions of Risk Note C, the Calcutta High Court in *G. in Council v. Patal Paul & Co.*² held that the words "destruction, deterioration or damage" do not include loss. In para. 6 of the judgment at p. 286 Mr. Justice Mookerjee observed as follows:—

"In risk note C, no indemnity is given in case of loss as distinct from cases of destruction, deterioration or damage. This is clear from a comparison of risk note 'C' with the other risk notes where the word 'loss' is also included."

One finds the same distinction also made in the provisions of the railways Act if one compares s. 74-B with s. 74-C, sub-s. (3). In that the word "loss" is used in contradistinction to the words "destruction or deterioration of or damage to". Having regard to the provisions of not too much to suppose that if the Legislature had intended to railway administration against such loss, they would have used the in s. 74-B in addition to the words "destruction, deterioration, or they have done in s. 74-C. Moreover, the opening words of s. 74-B make such an interpretation possible. The opening words are:

"When any goods which, under ordinary circumstances, would be carried vehicles or vessels and would be liable to damage if carried otherwise are of the sender or his agent recorded in the forwarding note etc." (Italics as The section intended to provide a protection for the railway when are carried in an open wagon which ordinarily would be carried vehicles and would be liable to damage if carried otherwise.

The emphasis is more upon the damage to quality of the goods to the quantity, and therefore I am not prepared to hold that the "destruction, deterioration, or damage" include "loss". It does not the judgment of the trial Court that it considered this aspect of. It assumed that the section granted immunity to the railway in where the goods are carried in open wagons.

As to the quantum of damages, the trial Court found that the de be Rs. 724-14-0. The quantum of damages was not disputed before.

I allow the application for revision, set aside the judgment of the trial Court dismissing the plaintiff's suit and instead pass in favour of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of with costs throughout.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE

Before Mr. Justice Datar and Mr. Justice Tarkunde.

KRISHNA NAYAR RAM NAYAR v. STATE.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 264—Bombay Prohibition Act of 1949, Sec. 116—Substance of evidence required to be recorded under their substance of evidence embodied in judgment from memory or when evidence given amounts to compliance with s. 264—Substance of meaning of expression—Whether in trial under Bombay Prohibition Act upon magistrate to record substance of evidence of witnesses.

Under s. 264 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the substance of is to be recorded at the time when the evidence is given in Court. The the substance of the evidence is embodied in a judgment from memory notes made at the time when evidence was given it does not amount with s. 264 of the Code.

The expression "the substance of the evidence" occurring in the Criminal Code, 1898, implies that all the important or substantial part of the deposition should be recorded by the presiding authority.

In a trial under the Bombay Prohibition Act, 1949, by virtue of s. 116 it is incumbent upon the magistrate to record the substance of the evidence when the evidence is led in Court. Failure to record such evidence generally vitiates the trial.

*Decided, September 11/12, 1953. Criminal. Unsekar, Presidency Magistrate Appeal No. 887 of 1953, from the orders of Mulund, Bombay, in Case No conviction and sentence passed by H. S. of 1957.

These facts appear in the judgment; no question of no question as to the facts.

K. B. Joshi, for the appellant-accused.

V. H. Gurnasie, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

TAKKUNDU J. The appellant was convicted by the Presidency Magistrate, 27th Court, Mulund, Bombay, under ss. 65(b), 65(f) and 36(b) of the Bombay Prohibition Act and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for six months and a fine of Rs. 500; in default rigorous imprisonment for three months. He has come in appeal from the order of conviction and sentence. The prosecution case was that on November 2, 1957, a police party had gone for patrolling in the Chandivali jungle, that they came across a working still for the manufacture of illicit liquor at about 7 p.m. on that day, and that the appellant was found operating that still and was arrested on the spot. The police party seized a quantity of illicit liquor, some wash, and certain utensils for the manufacture of liquor. The appellant pleaded that he was not guilty of the offences charged against him, that he was not arrested in Chandivali jungle, and that he was picked up from his house at Kurla Road at about 5-30 p.m. on that day.

The prosecution evidence consisted of the depositions of two police constables who were in the police party that was patrolling the Chandivali jungle on the day of the offence. As the still was found in a jungle, no panchnama was made about it. The accused examined two witnesses to prove that he was arrested at about 5-30 p.m. on that day from his house at Kurla Road. The learned Magistrate relied upon the evidence of the police constables, rejected the evidence of the defence witnesses, and came to the conclusion that the alleged offences were established beyond a reasonable doubt.

We find that, although this was a case under the Prohibition Act, the learned Presidency Magistrate has not recorded the substance of the evidence of the witnesses examined on behalf of the prosecution and on behalf of the accused. The learned Magistrate has stated in his judgment that the two police constables were cross-examined in the minutest details and for some length of time, but we do not find the substance of that cross-examination from the record of the case. The evidence of the first police constable examined on behalf of the prosecution, Sampat Atmaram, consists, according to the record, of only a few lines. Regarding the other prosecution witness, Balkrishna Yeshwant, the learned Presidency Magistrate has noted that in his examination-in-chief the witness corroborated the earlier prosecution witness Sampat Atmaram, but the substance of the examination-in-chief is not mentioned in the notes maintained by the learned Presidency Magistrate. The record of his cross-examination consists of two short lines with many crosses. It is clear that this record consists of some stray notes which the learned Presidency Magistrate made of the evidence led before him, and does not purport to be the substance of the evidence of the witnesses. It appears further that towards the end of the case the learned Magistrate was requested on behalf of the accused that an appealable sentence should be passed against him. The learned Magistrate says in that connection that he had initially intended to pass a non-appealable sentence and proceeds to say:

"I may add that it is due to last minute request coming from the defence that detailed notes of evidence are not on record, though the sentence I am going to impose is an appealable one."

We are of the opinion that irrespective of whether the learned Magistrate intended initially to impose an appealable sentence or not, it was incumbent upon him to record the substance of the evidence of each witness when the evidence was led in Court. The procedure to be ordinarily followed by Presidency Magistrates in regard to the recording of evidence is mentioned in s. 362 of the Criminal Procedure Code. According to that section, no evidence need be recorded where the Presidency Magistrate does not propose to impose an appealable sentence on the accused. It appears that the learned Presidency

Magistrate was acting on the assumption that the procedure laid down in s. 362, Criminal Procedure Code, is to be followed even in cases under the Bombay Prohibition Act. Section 116 of the Bombay Prohibition Act, however, requires a somewhat different procedure to be adopted. That section says:

"In all trials for offences under this Act, the magistrate shall follow the procedure prescribed in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, for the trial of summary cases in which an appeal lies."

The procedure for the trial of summary cases is to be found in Chapter XXII of the Criminal Procedure Code consisting of ss. 260 to 265. Out of these sections, s. 263 applies to cases where no appeal lies, and s. 264 to cases in which an appeal lies. Under s. 263, the Magistrate is not required to record the evidence of witnesses or to frame a formal charge, but has to enter certain particulars in a prescribed form. Section 264, as amended by Parliamentary Act XXVI of 1955, provides:—

"In every case tried summarily by a magistrate or bench in which an appeal lies, such magistrate or bench shall record the substance of the evidence and also the particulars mentioned in section 263 and shall, before passing any sentence, record a judgment in the case."

Now, none of the sections in Chap. XXII of the Criminal Procedure Code, including s. 264, apply normally to trials conducted by Presidency Magistrates. Section 116 of the Bombay Prohibition Act, however, makes it clear that the procedure mentioned in Chap. XXII of the Criminal Procedure Code, in so far as it relates to cases in which an appeal lies, has to be followed even by Presidency Magistrates in the trial of cases under the Prohibition Act. This is clear from the fact that s. 116 provides the procedure for "all trials for offences under this Act." The learned Presidency Magistrate not having recorded "the substance of the evidence" in this case, the trial of the appellant was clearly irregular.

The learned Assistant Government Pleader argues that inasmuch as the judgment of the learned Presidency Magistrate embodies the substance of the evidence in the case, we should hold that s. 264 has been substantially complied with. We are unable to accept this argument. When s. 264 provides that the Magistrate shall record the substance of the evidence, it is implied that the substance of the evidence is to be recorded at the time when the evidence is given in Court. To embody the substance of the evidence in a judgment from memory or from short notes made at the time when evidence was given does not amount to compliance with s. 264. This is further clear when we consider the wording of the original s. 264 which was replaced by the amendment brought about by Parliamentary Act XXVI of 1955. That section as it originally stood required that the Magistrate "shall, before passing sentence, record judgment embodying the substance of the evidence and also the particulars mentioned in section 263." The purpose of amending this section was obviously to require that the record of the substance of the evidence shall be separate from the judgment delivered by the Magistrate.

The learned Assistant Government Pleader has also argued that in this case the learned Presidency Magistrate has in fact recorded the substance of the evidence of witnesses at the time when the evidence was given in his Court. We find that what the learned Presidency Magistrate has done is to record a few notes, and no attempt was made by him to record the substance of the evidence. The expression "the substance of the evidence" occurs in several sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and what is implied by that expression is that all the important or substantial part of the deposition of each witness should be recorded by the presiding authority. That obviously has not been done in this case.

It was further argued by the learned Assistant Government Pleader that, at the time when the Prohibition Act, including s. 116 therein, was passed by the Bombay Provincial Legislature in 1949, s. 264 of the Criminal Procedure Code as it then stood required the Magistrate merely to embody the substance of the evidence in his judgment, and that the Bombay Provincial Legislature must have intended that the procedure which is to be followed in cases under the Bombay Prohibition Act is the procedure laid down in s. 264 of the Criminal Procedure Code as it then was and not the procedure of the section as substituted by the amending Parliamentary Act XXVI of 1955. This argument is clearly untenable, because the intention of the Legislature is to be gathered from the language used in the legislation. The language used in s. 116 of the Bombay Prohibition Act shows that the Legislature intended that the same procedure shall be followed for the trial of offences under that Act as is followed in the "trial of summary cases in which an appeal lies". It is clear that the Magistrate who tries a case under the Prohibition Act has merely to apply the same procedure which is applicable at the time of the trial to "summary cases in which an appeal lies". If we were to accept the argument of the learned Assistant Government Pleader, we would have to come to the conclusion, which appears to us absurd, that the provisions which now apply to the trial of warrant cases after the amendments brought about by Parliamentary Act XXVI of 1955 would also be inapplicable to all cases under the Prohibition Act.

It was further urged by the learned Assistant Government Pleader that the alleged irregularity in procedure of the learned Presidency Magistrate has not caused any prejudice to the appellant and that, therefore, we should not interfere with the order of conviction. It is obvious to us that the case of the appellant has been prejudiced by the irregular procedure, the reason being that in the absence of an adequate record of the substance of the evidence in the case, it is not possible for us in appeal to decide whether the conviction of the appellant was justified.

We must, therefore, set aside the order of conviction and sentence. We have considered whether we should order a retrial of the appellant, but have come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances of the case, a retrial would expose the appellant to unmerited harassment. The alleged offence took place nearly a year back. After his conviction the appellant was in jail for about three weeks before he was released on bail. The prosecution evidence consists of two police constables only. Under the circumstances, we hold that the appellant should not be retried, but should be acquitted of the offences of which he was charged.

In the result, we allow the appeal, set aside the order of conviction and sentence, and acquit the accused. The bail bond is cancelled. Fine, if paid, should be refunded.

Appeal allowed: Conviction and sentence set aside.

S. M. JAKATI v. S. M. BORKAR.*

Hindu law—Debts—Debt by father—Avyavaharika debt, what is—Father, managing director of bank drawing salary, incurring liability as result of negligence in discharge of his duties as such director—Whether such liability incurred an Avyavaharika debt—Pious obligation of sons to discharge debts of father not tainted with immorality or illegality whether comes to an end on partition of joint family property—Partition taking place after decree and pending execution proceedings—Sale of whole joint family estate in execution—Whether partition saves shares of sons or impairs rights of creditors—Sons not challenging the liability of their interest in execution of decree against father and Court ordering sale of whole estate—Whether auction-purchaser's right defeated on ground that sons not brought on record—What passes to auction-purchaser where right, title and interest of judgment-debtor are sold—Words "right, title and interest" in s. 155 of Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V of 1879).

Under Hindu law an Avyavaharika debt is any debt for a cause repugnant to good morals.

Where as a result of certain proceedings taken against a father, who was a managing director of a co-operative bank receiving a salary, by the liquidator of the bank, a payment order for a certain amount was made against him by the Deputy Registrar of Co-operative Societies, held that the liability incurred by the father as a result of negligence in the discharge of his duties as a managing director was not an Avyavaharika debt.

Hemraj alias Babu Lal v. Khem Chand¹ and Toshanpal Singh v. District Judge of Agra,² referred to.

Under Hindu law the liability of the sons to discharge the debts of the father which are not tainted with immorality or illegality is based on the pious obligation of the sons which continues to exist in the lifetime and after the death of the father and it does not come to an end as a result of partition of the joint family property. All that results from partition is that the right of the father to make alienation comes to an end.

Pannalal v. Mst. Naraini,³ Sidheshwar Mukherji v. Bhubneshwar Prasad Narain Singh,⁴ and Bankey Lal v. Durga Prasad,⁵ referred to.

Where the pious obligation exists and partition takes place after the decree and pending execution proceedings, the sale of the whole estate in execution of the decree cannot be challenged except on proof by the sons of the immoral or illegal purpose of the debt and partition cannot relieve the sons of their pious obligation or their shares of their liability to be sold or be a means of reducing the efficacy of the attachment or impair the rights of the creditor.

pays for the whole estate, the mere fact that the sons were so nomine not brought on the record would not be sufficient to defeat the rights of the auction-purchaser or put an end to the pious obligation of the sons.

Where the right, title and interest of a judgment-debtor are set up for sale as to what passes to the auction-purchaser is a question of fact in each case dependent upon what was the estate put up for sale, what the Court intended to sell and what the purchaser intended to buy and did buy and what he paid for.

The words "right, title and interest" occurring in s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, have the same connotation as they had in the corresponding words used in the Civil Procedure Code existing at the time the Bombay Land Revenue Code was enacted.

In execution proceedings it is not necessary to implead the sons or to bring another suit if severance of status takes place pending the execution proceedings because the pious duty of the sons continues and consequently there is merely a difference in the mode of enjoyment of the property.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

A. V. Viswanatha Sastri, with M. S. K. Sastri, for the appellants.

A. S. E. Chari, with Bawa Shrivcharan Singh and Govindsaran Singh, for respondents Nos. 2-4.

KAPUR J. This is an appeal against the judgment and decree of the High Court of Bombay varying the decree of the trial Court decreeing the plaintiff's suit for possession by partition of joint family property.

The facts of the case lie in a narrow compass. M. B. Jakati defendant No. 1 was the managing director of Dharwar Urban Co-operative Bank Limited which went into liquidation, and in that capacity he was receiving a yearly remuneration of Rs. 1,000. As a result of certain proceedings taken against defendant No. 1 M. B. Jakati by the liquidator of the bank, a payment order for Rs. 15,100 was made by the Deputy Registrar of Co-operative Societies on April 21, 1942. In execution of this payment order a bungalow belonging to M. B. Jakati, defendant No. 1, was attached by the Collector under the Bombay Land Revenue Code on July 27, 1942. Notice for sale was issued on November 24, 1942, and the proclamation on December 24, 1942. The sale was fixed for February 2, 1943. On January 16, 1943, M. B. Jakati defendant No. 1 applied for postponing the sale which was rejected. The auction sale was held on February 2, 1943, and was confirmed on June 23, 1943,—the purchaser was S. N. Borkar defendant No. 7 now respondent No. 1. On February 10, 1944, respondent No. 1 sold the property to defendants Nos. 8 to 10 who are respondents Nos. 2 to 4.

On January 15, 1943, Krishnaji, a son of defendant No. 1 brought a suit for partition of the joint family property and possession of his separate share alleging inter alia that the purchase by respondent No. 1 of the bungalow was not binding on the joint family as "it was not liable to be sold for the illegal and immoral acts on the part of defendant No. 1 which were characterised as misfeasance"; that the auction sale was under s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code under which only "the right, title and interest of the defaulter" could be sold and therefore the right, title and interest of only the father, defendant No. 1, was sold and not that of the other members. The plaintiff claimed $\frac{1}{3}$ share of the property and also alleged that he was not on good terms with his father who had neglected his interest; that he was staying with his mother's sister and was not being maintained by his father and mother. On January 12, 1944, appellant No. 1 (Srinivas) filed his written statement supporting the claim for partition and claiming his own share. He supported the claim of the then plaintiff that the sale in favour of respondent No. 1 was not binding on the joint family. Defendant No. 2, now appellant No. 2, the mother, also supported the plaintiff's claim and on the death of Krishnaji, she claimed his $\frac{1}{3}$ share as his heir. After the death of the original plaintiff Krishnaji, Shrinivas (appellant No. 1) was substituted as plaintiff on June 28, 1944.

The suit was mainly contested by respondents Nos. 1 to 4. Respondent No. 1 pleaded that plaintiff's suit for partition was collusive having been brought at the instance of defendant No. 1 M. B. Jakati and it was not bona fide; that defendant No. 1 was made liable at the instance of the liquidator of the Dharwar Urban Co-operative Bank Ltd., for misfeasance because he acted negligently in the discharge of his duties as managing director of the bank; that the debt was binding on the family as defendant No. 1 M. B. Jakati had been receiving a yearly remuneration from the bank and the properties were sold in payment of a debt binding on the family and, therefore, the sale in execution of the payment order could not be challenged as the sons were under a pious obligation under the Hindu law to discharge the debts of their father; that the sale could only be challenged on proof of the debt of defendant No. 1 being for an "immoral or illegal" purpose. These pleadings gave rise to several issues.

The learned Civil Judge held that the suit was collusive; that the liability which defendant No. 1 incurred was Avyavaharika and was, therefore, not binding on the sons and thus appellant No. 1 would have $\frac{1}{3}$ share in the joint family property, defendant No. 1, $\frac{1}{3}$ and appellant No. 2 also $\frac{1}{3}$. He, therefore, declared the shares as above in the whole of the joint family property including the bungalow which is the only property in which the respondents are interested and which is in dispute in this appeal.

On appeal the High Court held that the debt was not Avyavaharika as there was no evidence to support the finding of the trial Court, the order of the Deputy Registrar being in the nature of a judgment to which neither the sons nor the auction purchasers were parties and, therefore, it was not "evidence of anything except the historical fact that it was delivered". In regard to the question as to what interest passed to the auction-purchaser on a sale under s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, it held that the whole estate including the share of the sons was sold in execution of the payment order and, therefore, qua that property the sons had no interest left. The High Court varied the decree to this extent and the plaintiffs have come up in appeal to this Court by certificate of the High Court of Bombay.

The case of the appellants is (1) that the debt was Avyavaharika and therefore in an auction sale the interest of the sons and other members of the joint family did not pass to the auction-purchaser; (2) that even if the debt was not Avyavaharika the institution of the suit for partition operated as severance of status between the members of the family and, therefore, the father's power of disposition over the son's share had come to an end and consequently in the auction sale the share of the sons did not pass to the auction-purchaser; and

(3) that what could legally be sold under s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code was the right, title and interest of the defaulter i.e. of the father alone which could not include the share of the other members of the joint family.

The first question for decision is whether the debt of the father was Avyavaharika. This term has been variously translated as being that which is not lawful or what is not just or what is not admissible under the law or under normal conditions. Colebrooke translated it as "a debt for a cause repugnant to good morals". There is another track of decision which has translated it as meaning "a debt which is not supported as valid by legal arguments". The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in *Hemraj alias Babu Lal v. Khem Chand*²⁶ held that the translation of the term as given by Colebrooke makes the nearest approach to the true conception of the term used in the Smriti texts and may well be taken to represent its correct meaning and that it did not admit of a more precise definition.

In *Toshanpal Singh v. District Judge of Agra*²⁷ the Judicial Committee held that drawings of monies for unauthorised purposes, which amounted to criminal breach of trust under s. 405 of the Indian Penal Code, were not binding on the sons, but a civil debt arising on account of the receipt of monies by the father which were not accounted for could not be termed Avyavaharika.

In the case now before us the appellants have attempted to prove that the debt fell within the term Avyavaharika by relying upon the payment order and the findings given by the Deputy Registrar in the payment order where the liability was inter alia based on a breach of trust. Any opinion given in the order of the Deputy Registrar as to the nature of the liability of defendant No. 1 M. B. Jakati cannot be used as evidence in the present case to determine whether the debt was Avyavaharika or otherwise. The order is not admissible to prove the truth of the facts therein stated and except that it may be relevant to prove the existence of the judgment itself, it will not be admissible in evidence. Section 43 of the Evidence Act, the principle of which is, that judgments excepting those upon questions of public and general interest, judgment in rem or when necessary to prove the existence of a judgment, order or decree, which may be a fact in issue are irrelevant. It was then submitted that the pleadings of respondent No. 1 himself show that the debt was of an immoral or illegal nature. In his written statement, respondent No. 1 had pleaded that the liquidator of the bank had charged defendant No. 1 with misfeasance because he was grossly negligent in the discharge of his duty and responsibility as managing director and that after a thorough enquiry the Deputy Registrar held misfeasance proved and ordered a contribution of Rs. 15,100 by him. As we have said above the translation given by Colebrooke of the term Avyavaharika is the nearest approach to its true concept i.e. "any debt for a cause repugnant to good morals". The managing director of a bank of the position of defendant No. 1 who should have been more vigilant in investing the monies of the bank cannot be said to have incurred the liability for a cause "repugnant to good morals". We are unable to subscribe to the proposition that in the modern age with its complex institutions of banks and joint stock companies governed by many technicalities and complex system of laws the liability such as has arisen in the present case could be called Avyavaharika. The debt was, therefore, binding on the sons.

The effect of severance of status brought about by the filing of the suit on January 25, 1943, has been made the basis of the argument that only the share of the father could be seized in execution of the payment order made against him. This would necessitate an examination into the rights and liabilities of Hindu sons in Mitakshara coparcenary family where the father is the karta. In Hindu law there are two mutually destructive principles, one the principle of independent coparcenary rights in the sons which is an incident of birth, giving to the sons vested right in the coparcenary property, and the other the pious duty of the sons to discharge their father's debts not to morality or illegality, which lays open the whole estate to be payment of such debts. According to the Hindu law-givers²⁸ to pay off the ancestors' debts and to relieve him of the death-toll on non-payment was irrespective of their inheriting any the Courts rejected this liability arising irrespective of inheritance and gave to this religious duty a legal character. *Masit Ull Prasad*²⁹. For the payment of his debts it is open to the father whole coparcenary estate including the share of the sons and it to his creditors to proceed against it; but this is subject to the right to challenge the alienation or protest against a creditor pro their shares on proof of illegal or immoral purpose of the debt. Positions are well settled and are not within the realm of controversy. *v. Mst. Narain*²⁹; Girdharee Lall v. Kantoo Lall; *Muddan Thall*³⁰; *Suraj Bansi Koer v. Sheo Proshad Singh*³¹; *Brij Narain Sad*³². In the last mentioned case the Privy Council said:—

"...Nothing clearer could be said than what was said by Lord Ho the judgment of the Board in Musamat Nanomi Babussein v. Modun quoted: destructive as it may be of the principle of independent coparcenary the sons, the decisions have, for some time, established the principle that set up their rights against their father's alienation for an antecedent debt creditor's remedies for their debts, if not tainted with immorality. (The question of the liability of the joint estate, their Lordships think that it is of authority."

There is no discrepancy of judicial opinion as to the pious duty. In Pannalal v. Mst. Naraini (supra) this Court approved the finding of Sulaiman A.C.J., in *Bankey Lal v. Durga Prasad*³⁴:

"The Hindu Law texts based the liability on the pious obligation of the father's power to sell the sons' share."

So great was the importance attached to the payment of debts that the law-givers gave the non-payment of a debt the status of sinfulness. Such payment was wholly repugnant to Hindu concept of son's right. In Bankey Lal v. Durga Prasad, Lal Gopal Mukherji J. said (

"...A perusal of the texts of Smṛiti dealing with debts will show that under Hindu law the non-payment of a just debt was regarded as a very heinous sin. The liability of the Hindu son based on his pious obligation against his father's debts has received the approval of this Court in *Sidheshwar Mukherjee v. Bhubneshwar Singh*³⁵, where the following observation made in Pannalal's case

"The father's power of alienating the family property for payment of his debts may be one of the consequences of the pious obligation which the Hindu law imposes upon the sons; or it may be one of the means of enforcing it, but it is not a measure of the entire obligation" was reiterated. And again at page 183 Mukherjee J. (as he then was) said:

"...It is a special liability created on purely religious grounds and is enforceable only against the sons of the father and no other coparcener. The liability has its basis entirely on the relationship between the father and the son. Therefore unless the son succeeds in proving that the decree was obtained which was for an immoral or illegal purpose the creditor's right to the execution of his decree the whole coparcenary property including the share of the son remains unaffected, because except where the debt is for an immoral or illegal purpose it is open to the execution-creditor to sell the whole estate of the father. The finding of the judgment obtained against the father alone. (

*Tagore*³⁶. The necessary corollary which flows from the pious obligation imposed on Hindu sons is that it is not ended by the partition of the family estate unless a provision has been made for the payment of the just debts of the father. This again is supported by the authority of this Court in Pannalal's case where Mukherjea J. said at p. 559:—

"Thus, in our opinion, a son is liable, even after partition for the pre-partition debts of his father which are not immoral or illegal and for the payment of which no arrangement was made at the date of the partition."

The liability of the sons is thus unaffected by partition, because the pious duty of the sons to pay the debt of the father, unless it is for an immoral or illegal purpose, continues till the debt is paid off and the pious obligation incumbent on the sons to see that their father's debts are paid prevents the sons from asserting that the family estate, so far as their interest is concerned, is not liable to purge that debt. Therefore, even though the father's power to discharge his debt by selling the share of his sons in the property may no longer exist as a result of partition the right of the judgment-creditor to seize the erstwhile coparcenary property remains unaffected and undiminished because of the pious obligation of the sons. There does not seem to be any divergence of judicial opinion in regard to the Hindu son's liability to pay the debts of his father after partition and by the mere device of entering into partition with their father the sons cannot get rid of this pious obligation. It has received the approval of this Court in Pannalal v. Mst. Naraini and Sidheshwar Mukherjee v. Bhubneshwar Prasad Narain Singh where Mukherjea J., observed in the latter case at p. 184:—

"...It is settled law that even after partition the sons could be made liable for the pre-partition debts of the father if there was no proper arrangement for the payment of such debts at the time when the partition was effected, although the father could have no longer any right of alienation in regard to the separated share of the sons."

The question then arises how the liability of the sons is to be enforced. Another principle of Hindu law is that in a coparcenary family the decree obtained against the father is binding on the sons as they would be deemed to have been represented by the father in the suit: *Kishan Sarup v. Brijraj Singh*³⁷. As was pointed out in Sidheshwar Mukherjee's case, the sons are not necessary parties to a money suit against the father who is the karta, but they may be joined as defendants. The result of the partition in a joint family is nothing more than a change in the mode of enjoyment and what was held jointly is by the partition held in severalty and, therefore, attachment of the whole coparcenary estate would not be affected by the change in the mode of enjoyment, because the liability of the share which the sons got on partition remains unaffected as also the attachment itself which is not ended by partition. (Section 64, Civil Procedure Code, is a useful guide in such circumstances).

Dealing with the question as to how the interest of the sons in joint family property can be attached and sold, Mukherjea J., as he then was, observed at p. 185 in Sidheshwar Mukherjee's case:—

"...Be that as it may, the money decree passed against the father certainly created a debt payable by him. If the debt was not tainted with immorality, it was open to the creditor to realise the dues by attachment and sale of the sons' coparcenary interest in the joint property on the principles discussed above. As has been laid down by the Judicial Committee in a series of cases, of which the case of Mussumut Nanomi Babuasin v. Modun Mohun may be taken as a type, the creditor has an option in such cases. He can, if he likes, proceed against the father's interest alone but he can, if he so chooses, put up to sale the sons' interest also and it is a question of fact to be determined with reference to the circumstances of each individual case whether the smaller or the larger interest was actually sold in execution."

But it was contended that a partition after the decree but before the auction sale limited the efficacy of the sale to the share of the father even though the sale in fact was of the whole estate, including the interest of the sons, because after the partition the father no longer possessed the right of alienation of the whole coparcenary estate to discharge his debts. But this contention ignores the doctrine of pious obligation of the sons. The right of the pre-partition creditor to seize the property of the erstwhile joint family in execution of his decree is not dependant upon the father's power to alienate the share of his sons, but on the principle of pious obligation on the part of the sons to discharge the debt of the father. The pious obligation continues to exist even though the power of the father to alienate may come to an end as a result of partition. The consequence is that as between the sons' right to take a vested interest jointly with their father in their ancestral estate and the remedy of the father's creditor to seize the whole of the estate for payment of his debt not contracted for immoral or illegal purpose, the latter will prevail and the sons are precluded from setting up their right, and this will apply even to the divided property which, under the doctrine of pious obligation continues to be liable for the debts of the father. Therefore, where the joint ancestral property including the share of the sons has passed out of the family in execution of the decree on the father's debt the remedy of the sons would be to prove in appropriate proceedings taken by them the illegal or immoral purpose of the debt, and in the absence of any such proof the sale will be screened from the sons' attack, because even after the partition their share remains liable. Girdharee Lall v. Kantoo Lall; Muddan Thakoor v. Kantoo Lall (supra)⁶; Suraj Bansi Koer v. Sheo Proshad Singh (supra)⁷; *Mussamut Nanomi Babuasin v. Modun Mohun*³⁸; *Chandradeo Singh v. Mata Prasad*³⁹; which was approved by the Privy Council in *Sahu Ram Chander v. Bhup Singh*¹⁰; *Pannalal v. Mst. Naraini*³ (supra) and Sidheshwar Mukherjee's case (supra)⁴.

Our attention was drawn to two decisions, one by the High Court of Bombay in Ganpatrao Vishwanath v. Bhimrao Sahibrao,⁴⁰ that in order to make the share of the sons liable after partition they should be brought on the record and the other of the Madras High Court in Kameswaramma v. Venkata Subba Row,⁴¹ that the creditor has to bring another suit against the sons, obtain a decree against them limited to the shares allotted to them on partition and then attach and sell their share unless the partition was not bona fide in which case the decree could be executed against the joint family property. But the decision in these cases must be confined to their own facts. It is true that the right of the father to alienate for payment of personal debt is ended by the partition, but as we have said above, it does not affect the pious duty of the sons to discharge the debt of their father. Therefore, where after attachment and a proper notice of sale the whole estate including the sons' share, which was attached, is sold and the purchaser buys it intending it to be the whole coparcenary estate, the presence of the sons eo nomine is not necessary because they still have the right to challenge the sale on showing the immoral or illegal purpose of the debt. In our opinion, where the pious obligation exists and partition takes place after the decree and pending execution proceedings as in the present case, the sale of the whole estate in execution of the decree cannot be challenged except on proof by the sons of the immoral or illegal purpose of the debt and partition cannot relieve the sons of their pious obligation or their shares of their liability to be sold or be a means of reducing the efficacy of the attachment or impair the rights of the creditor.

Reliance is placed on the judgment in *Khierajmal v. Daim*⁴² where the Privy Council held that the sale cannot be treated as void on the ground of mere irregularity, but the Court has no jurisdiction to sell the property of persons "not parties to the proceedings or properly represented on the record". There two such persons were Alibux and Naurex. As against Alibux there was no decree. He was not a party to the suit and it was held by the Privy Council that his interest in the property "seems to have been ignored altogether". He was not even mentioned as a debtor in the award on the basis of which the decree, which was executed, was made. Similarly, Naurez was not represented in either of the suits and, therefore, there was no decree against him and the sale of his property also was, therefore, without jurisdiction and null and void. This case cannot apply to sons in a joint Hindu family where a father represents the family and the decree is executable against the shares of the sons while the coparcenary continues and the liability of their shares continues after partition. *Sat Narain v. Das*⁴³ is equally inapplicable to the present case. There the Privy Council was dealing with the father's power of disposal of property before and after partition which power vests in the Official Assignee on his bankruptcy, the question of the right of the judgment-creditor to proceed in execution against the divided shares of sons which had been attached before partition was not a point in controversy. There was no decision on the powers of an executing Court to proceed against the shares of the sons but the question related to voluntary alienations by a father for payment of his debts not incurred for an immoral or illegal purpose.

In cases where the sons do not challenge the liability of their interest in the execution of the decree against the father and the Court after attachment and proper notice of sale sells the whole estate and the auction-purchaser purchases and pays for the whole estate, the mere fact that the sons were eo nomine not brought on the record would not be sufficient to defeat the rights of the auction-purchaser or put an end to the pious obligation of the sons. As was pointed out by Lord Hobhouse in Malkarjun Bin Shidramappa Pasare v. Narhari Bin Shivappa:⁴⁴

"...Their Lordships agree with the view of the learned Chief Justice that a purchaser cannot possibly judge of such matters, even if he knows the facts; and that if he is to be held bound to inquire into the accuracy of the Court's conduct of its own business, no purchaser at a Court sale would be safe. Strangers to a suit are justified in believing that the Court has done that which by the directions of the Court it ought to do."

In Mussamat Nanomi Babuasin v. Modun Mohun Lord Hobhouse said at p. 18:—

"...But if the fact be that the purchaser has bargained and paid for the entirety, he may clearly defend his title to it upon any ground which would have justified a sale if the sons had been brought in to oppose the executing proceedings."

The question which assumes importance in an auction sale of this kind, therefore, is what did the Court intend to sell and did sell and what did the auction purchaser purport to buy and did buy and what did he pay for. One track of decision, of which *Simbhunath Panday v. Golab Singh*⁴⁵ is an instance, shows when the father's share alone passes. In that case the father alone was made a party to the proceedings. The mortgage, the suit of the creditor and the decree and the sale certificate all purported to affect the rights of the father and his interest alone. It was, therefore, held that whatever the nature of the debt, only the father's right and interest was intended to pass to the auction-purchaser. In *Meenakshi Naidu v. Immudi Kanaka Rammaya Kounden*⁴⁶, which represents the other track of decision, the Privy Council held that upon the documents the Court intended to sell and did sell the whole of the coparcenary interest and not any partial interest. The query in decided cases has been as to what was put up for sale and was sold and what the purchaser had reason to think he was buying in execution of the decree. Mussamat Nanomi Babuasin v. Modun Mohun (supra); *Bhagbut Persad v. Mussamat Girja Koer*⁴⁷; Meenakshi Naidu v. Immudi Rammaya Kounden; *Rai Babu Mahabir Persad v. Rai Markunda Nath Sahai*⁴⁸ and *Doulat Ram v. In the present case the payment order was made by the Deputy Registrar on April 21, 1942, and after the order had been sent to the Collector for recovery, the property was attached on April 24, 1942, and notice of sale was issued on November 24, 1942, and was published under ss. 165 and 166 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. The proclamation of sale was dated December 12, 1942.

The property put up for sale was plot No. 36-D measuring 6 acres and one guntha and its value was specified as 13,000 rupees. There was a note added:—

"No guarantee is given of the title of the said defendant or of the validity of any of the rights, charges or interests claimed by third parties."

The order confirming the sale also shows that the whole bungalow was sold. It was valued at Rs. 16,000 and there was a mortgage of Rs. 2,000 against it and what was sold and confirmed by this order was the whole bungalow. The sale certificate was in regard to the whole bungalow i.e. City Survey No. 67-D measuring 6 acres and one guntha the sale price being Rs. 13,025. There is little doubt, therefore, that what was put up for auction sale was the whole bungalow and what the auction-purchaser purported to buy and paid for was also the whole bungalow and not any fractional share in it. It is a case where not only was the payment order passed before the partition, but the attachment was made and the sale proclamation was issued before the suit for partition was filed and the sale took place of the whole property without any protest or challenge by the sons and without any notice to the Collector or the judgment-creditor of the filing of the suit for partition. In such a case respondent No. 1 is entitled to defend his title upon the grounds which would have justified the sale had the appellants been brought on record in execution proceedings. The binding nature of the decree passed on the father's debts not tainted with immorality or illegality and the pious obligation imposed on the sons under the Mitakshara law would be sufficient to sustain the sale and defeat the sons' suit in the same way and on the same grounds as in the case of execution proceedings. Mussamut Nanomi Babuasin v. Modun Mohun. Consequently whether the sons were made parties to the execution proceedings or brought a suit challenging the sale of their shares the points for decision are the same—the nature of the debts and liability of the sons under Hindu law and these are the determining factors in both the cases i.e. the sons being parties to the execution proceedings or their suit challenging the sale of their shares.

The effect of attachment on the severance of status by the filing of a suit by one of the members of the coparcenary whose share was liable in execution of the decree has not been debated at the bar and how exactly it would affect the rights of the parties need not, therefore, be decided in this case. As a consequence it would not be necessary to discuss the pronouncements of the Privy Council in Suraj Bansi Koer v. Sheo Proshad Singh; *Moti Lal v. Karrabuddin*⁵⁰; *Raghunath Das v. Sundar Das Khatri*⁵¹ and Anantapadmanabhaswami v. Official Receiver of Secunderabad.⁵²

The argument based on the interpretation of the words 'right, title and interest of the defaulter' in s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code was that it was only the share of the defaulter himself which was and could be put up for auction sale. That the whole of the property was put up for sale, was sold and was purchased as such is shown by the documents to which reference has already been made viz., the notice of November 24, 1942, proclamation of sale of December 24, 1942, the order of confirmation of sale dated June 28, 1943, and the sale certificate issued by the Collector.

The Civil Procedure Code at the time of the enactment of the Bombay Land Revenue Code required that the property sold in execution should be described as "right, title and interest of the judgment debtor" and the same words have been used in s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. It is a question of fact in each case as to what was sold in execution of the decree. In Rai Babu

Mahabir Prasad v. Markunda Nath Sahai Lord Hobhouse observed as follows at p. 16:—

"...It is a question of fact in each case, and in this case their Lordships think that the transactions of the 4th and 5th of January, 1875, and the description of the property in the sale certificate, are conclusive to shew that the entire corpus of the estate was sold."

Similarly in Meenakshi Naidu v. Immudi Kanaka Rammaya Kounden the whole interest of the coparcenary was held to be sold taking into consideration the evidence which had been placed on the record. Lord FitzGerald at p. 5 pointed out the difference where only the father's interest was intended to pass:—

"...In Hurday Narain's case, (Baboo Hurday Narain Sahu v. Pundit Baboo Rooder Perakash Misset) all the documents shewed that the Court intended to sell, and that it did sell nothing but the father's share—the share and interest that he would take on partition, and nothing beyond it—and this tribunal in that case puts it entirely upon the ground that everything shewed that the thing sold was 'whatever rights and interests, the said judgment debtor had in the property' and nothing else."

In Sripat Singh v. Tagore the "right, title and interest of the judgment debtor" were sold and there also it was held to convey the whole coparcenary estate and it was remarked that it was of the utmost importance that the substance and not merely the technicality of the transaction should be regarded. What is to be seen is what was put up for sale, what the Court intended to sell and what the purchaser was intending to buy and what he purported to buy.

Counsel for the appellants relied on Simbunath Panday v. Golab Singh where it was held that right and interest of the father meant personal interest, but in that case, as we have pointed out, the documents produced all showed that the father's interest alone was intended to pass.

In *Mulgund Co-operative Society v. Shidlingappa Ishwarappa*⁵⁴ it was held that the sale under Bombay Land Revenue Code has the same effect as the sale by the civil Court. The language used in the Bombay Land Revenue Code and the then existing Civil Procedure Code is similar i.e. "the right, title and interest of the defaulter" in one case and "of the judgment debtor" in the other. This is supported by the observation of the Privy Council in Rai Babu Mahabir Prasad v. Markunda Nath Sahai and as to what passed under the sale does not become any different merely because the sale is held under s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code rather than the Code of Civil Procedure. The effect in both cases is the same.

We hold therefore (1) that the liability of the sons to discharge the debts of the father which are not tainted with immorality or illegality is based on the pious obligation of the sons which continues to exist in the lifetime and after the death of the father and which does not come to an end as a result of partition of the joint family property. All that results from partition is that the right of the father to make alienation comes to an end. (2) Where the right, title and interest of a judgment-debtor are set up for sale as to what passes to the auction-purchaser is a question of fact in each case dependent upon what was the estate put up for sale, what the Court intended to sell and what the purchaser intended to buy and did buy and what he paid for. (3) The words "right, title and interest" occurring in s. 155 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code have the same connotation as they had in the corresponding words used in the Code of Civil Procedure existing at the time the Bombay Land Revenue Code was enacted. (4) In execution proceedings it is not necessary to implead the sons or to bring another suit if severance of status takes place pending the execution proceedings because the pious duty of the sons continues and consequently there is merely a difference in the mode of enjoyment of the property. (5) The liability of a father, who is a managing director and who draws a salary or a remuneration, incurred as a result of negligence in the discharge of his duties is not an Ayavakarika debt as it cannot be termed as "repugnant to good morals".

In the result the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

*Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act (I of 1951), Secs. 43, 17—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XX, r. 15—Preliminary decree declaring partnership dissolved, plaintiff to render accounts and accounts to be taken—Such decree passed before coming into force of M.P. Act, but final decree against plaintiff for payment of specified amount passed after coming into force of M.P. Act—Attachment of plaintiff's sir fields in execution of decree—Applicability of s. 43.*

A preliminary decree for dissolution of partnership and for partnership accounts does not amount to a "debt" within the meaning of s. 43 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950.

*Mahommed Hasan v. Ahmad Hafiz Khan,*¹ referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

G. B. Mudholkar, for the appellant.

N. S. Nandedkar, for the respondent.

KOTVAL J. This second appeal gives rise to a short but interesting question as to whether a preliminary decree for dissolution of partnership and for partnership accounts amounts to a "debt" within the meaning of s. 43 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950 (No. I of 1951).

The facts are not in dispute. The appellant was the plaintiff in Civil Suit No. 124-A of 1948. The suit was a suit for dissolution of partnership between the plaintiff and the two defendants. The plaintiff also claimed the usual decree for rendition of accounts. As a result of the preliminary decree, however, it was the appellant-plaintiff who was found liable to render account.

The preliminary decree was passed on March 18, 1950. Thereafter, the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950, came into force as from April 1, 1951. Next, proceedings for making the preliminary decree final were taken and a final decree was passed on January 15, 1952. By the final decree, the appellant (plaintiff) was made liable to pay to defendant No. 1 Rs. 14,611-2-0. A separate decree was passed against the plaintiff in respect of defendant No. 2, but with that part of the decree we are not here concerned. Defendant No. 1 thereafter assigned his rights under the decree to the respondent Chaturbhui for a consideration of Rs. 12,000. On November 27, 1952, in execution of the decree, the respondent Chaturbhui attached certain sir fields belonging to the appellant and the appellant took objection to the attachment on the ground that the debt having been incurred before the coming into force of the Act, it could not be executed against the sir fields. The first Court upheld the objection but the lower appellate Court has, in appeal, reversed the decision and the judgment-debtor appeals.

*Decided, September 30, 1953. Second Appeal No. 168 of 1957, against the order passed by S. M. L. Alvi, Second Additional District Judge at Bhandara, in Civil Appeal No. 52-A of 1956, reversing the order passed by N. P.

Mishra, Civil Judge, Class II, at Gondia, in Miscellaneous Judicial Case No. 9 of 1955.

Section 43 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950, runs as follows:—

"Any land which immediately before the date of vesting, was held in absolute occupancy or occupancy right or recorded as Sir land, shall not be liable to attachment or sale in execution of a decree or order for the recovery of any debt incurred before the date of vesting except where such debt was validly secured by mortgage of or a charge on the absolute occupancy or occupancy land or the cultivating right in the sir land."

On behalf of the appellant Mr. G. R. Mudholkar submits that the important words are the word "any" which precedes the word "debt" and the word "incurred" which succeeds it, and he says that the question to be decided is when was this debt "incurred". It may be that it became payable after the date of the final decree, but there is no doubt that the liability was "incurred" at least on the date of the preliminary decree, if not before and, therefore, the appellant's lands could not be attached. He also emphasises that the expression used is not "a debt" but "any debt" and that would include even debts arising as a result of a decree.

It seems to me, however, that the crucial word in the clause in dispute is the word "debt". In the Act, the word "debt" is nowhere defined. In s. 17, no doubt, the word "secured debt" is defined, but that expression cannot help to construe the word "debt" simpliciter. But even in s. 17 "decretal debts" and the "excluded debts" are not included. At least, so far as "secured debts" are concerned, it is clear that decretal debts are not included.

We are thus remitted to the ordinary connotation of the word. The word "debt" is defined in Wharton's Law Lexicon to mean "a sum of money due from one person to another". Stroud, in his Judicial Dictionary, defines it as "a sum payable in respect of a liquidated money demand, recoverable by action". The essence of the word is that the amount must be an ascertained or liquidated sum of money which a party is liable to pay. In the instant case, all that was done, when the preliminary decree was passed, was that it was declared under O. XX, r. 15, of the Code of Civil Procedure that the partnership between the plaintiff and the defendants was to stand dissolved from a certain date, that the plaintiff was to render all accounts and the decree directed that such accounts be taken. On that date it was impossible for any of the parties to the litigation to have said that any amount was due to or recoverable from one by the other. On the other hand, it was completely in doubt as to which of the parties was to pay to the other until the final decree was passed on January 15, 1952. Therefore, in my opinion, the liability, whatever it was, did not become a debt till the final decree was passed on January 15, 1952. Thus the debt was incurred after the coming into force of the Act and the bar against attachment created by s. 43 will not be available to the appellant.

The view, which I have taken, is supported in some measure by the decision of a division bench of the Nagpur High Court in *Mohammad Hasan Khan v. Ahmad Hafiz Khan*¹. In para. 14 of the judgment, the division bench observed as follows:—

"The term 'debt' has not been defined in the Act, but evidently it is independent of the liability created by the decree itself. In the absence of any specific definition, it has to be given the ordinary connotation of a loan which, as commonly understood, is an advance of money or in kind at interest. The normal connotation of the word 'debt' does not include a claim for damages but a liquidated money demand. (Jones v. Thompson 120 E.R. 430) and Ex-parte Charles (104 E.R. 576)."

The view I have taken is also borne out by another consideration, namely, what is the true relation of partners to each other. A partner is not merely entitled to rights against his co-partner but he is also under correlative obligations. One of these obligations is to account to his partners in respect of his dealings with the partnership assets. The liability is thus stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. XXIV, at page 481:

"Partners are not, as regards partnership dealings, considered as debtor and creditor inter se until the concern is wound up or until there is a binding settlement of the accounts. It follows that one partner has no right of action against another for the balance owing to him until after final settlement of the accounts."

That being so, it seems to me that the liability of the appellant in the present case did not become a debt until the binding settlement of accounts took place by the final decree. It was only then that the relationship of debtor and creditor arose between the erstwhile partners. It is on that date, therefore, that the debt was incurred within the meaning of s. 43. The decision of the lower appellate Court is upheld.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Bombay Hindu Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorisation) Act (Bom. XXXI of 1956), Secs. 2, 3—Constitution of India, Arts. 25(1), 25(2)(b), 26—Temples belonging to Swaminarayan Sampradaya sect whether come within ambit of Act—Such temples whether Hindu religious institutions and "places of public worship"—Swaminarayan Sampradaya whether distinct religion from Hinduism—Whether Act ultra vires art. 25(1) of Constitution.

The Swaminarayan Sampradaya is not a different religion from Hinduism and, therefore, the temples belonging to the Swaminarayan Sampradaya sect are Hindu religious institutions within the meaning of art. 25(2)(b) of the Constitution of India and are also "places of public worship" within the meaning of s. 2 of the Bombay Hindu Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorisation) Act, 1956.

of the Nar Narayan Temple at Ahmedabad were impleaded to this suit as defendants Nos. 2 and 3 respectively and plaintiffs also prayed for the issue of an injunction directing these two defendants to take steps to prevent defendant No. 1 and other non-Satsangi Harijans from entering and offering worship in the suit temples. Defendants Nos. 5 and 6, who claimed to be Satsangis, appeared and were joined as parties, and on its own application the State of Bombay was also added as a party as defendant No. 4.

It was the case of the plaintiffs that the Swaminarayan temples were for the Satsang congregation or the Swaminarayan sect only, that non-Satsangis had no legal right of entry and worship therein, nor were the said temples dedicated to or meant for the benefit of Hindus in general. The plaintiffs asserted that non-Satsangis were not using the suit temples as places of religious worship and the alleged user, if any, by them was not by custom, usage or otherwise. The temple of Nar Narayan Dev and the temples subordinate thereto formed an institution in which only the Satsangis of the northern diocese were legally interested and these temples were Sampradayaic temples of the sect "entirely distinct from the vast majority of other Hindu temples where Hindus in general have a legal right to go." It was the case of the plaintiffs that the Satsangis were a religious congregation and formed a distinct sect or community with its membership and its peculiar beliefs in Shriji Maharaj as God himself and with its own administrations, scriptures and doctrines. It was also the plaintiffs' case that the Satsangis came from all castes, from Brahmins to Harijans, and they also came from other communities such as Mahomedans, Khojas and Parsis. During the pendency of the suit the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act (XXXV of 1947) was amended by Bombay Act LXXVII of 1948 and the Constitution of India also came into force. The plaintiffs then applied for an amendment of the plaint on November 30, 1950, and that amendment was allowed. In accordance with the amended plaint, the plaintiffs pleaded that the Swaminarayan temples were not temples within the meaning of the Harijan Temple Entry Act (XXXV of 1947) as amended by Act LXXVII of 1948. It was also stated that the Harijan Temple Entry Act was ultra vires of the powers of the State of Bombay, being inconsistent with the Constitution of India and the fundamental rights declared therein. Plaintiffs further contended that the Swaminarayan cult was an institution distinct and different from Hindu religion and, therefore, these two Acts could not affect the temples of this sect. On these grounds the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the Swaminarayan Temple of Shri Nar Narayan Dev at Ahmedabad and all other temples subordinate thereto were not temples within the meaning of the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act, 1947, and also for a declaration that the said Act was ultra vires being derogatory and inconsistent with the Constitution of India. The suit was resisted by defendant No. 1 on the ground that it was not tenable at law or on facts and the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit under s. 5 of the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act (XXXV of 1947). He denied the plaintiffs' right to represent the Satsangis of the Swaminarayan sect and asserted that many Satsangis were in favour of the Harijan entry into the Swaminarayan temples, even though such Harijans were not the followers of the Swaminarayan creed or Sampradaya. He contended further that the suit temples were temples within the meaning of the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act and that non-Satsangi Harijans had a legal right of entry and worship in these temples. It was further contended that the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act was intra vires and the State Legislature had power to enact the Act. Defendant No. 1 denied that the Swaminarayan cult was an institution distinct and different from Hindu religion and submitted that under the new Constitution as also under the earlier Bombay Act the plaintiffs had no right to debar the non-Satsangi Harijans from entry in the suit temples. Defendant No. 2, the Acharya, and defendant No. 3, the Mahant of the temple, filed a purshis stating that they did not object to the plaintiffs' suit. Defendant No. 4, the State of Bombay, and defendants Nos. 5 and 6 filed no written statements.

The trial Judge framed several issues and on the oral and documentary evidence held that the suit was maintainable and was not barred under s. 5 of the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act (XXXV of 1947). He further held that Act XXXV of 1947 was not ultra vires the legislative powers of the Bombay State and did not infringe any of the principles of the Indian Constitution. The trial Court further held that it was not proved by plaintiffs that the Swaminarayan sect was distinct and different from Hindu religion and found that the suit temples were temples which were used as places of religious worship by the congregation of the Satsang which constituted a section of the Hindu community. But the trial Court also found that it was not established that the suit temples were used by non-Satsangi Hindus as places of religious worship by custom, usage or otherwise and consequently the trial Court came to the conclusion that the suit temples did not come with the meaning of the word "temple" under the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act. In accordance with this finding the trial Court passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs giving them a declaration that the Swaminarayan temple of Shree Nar Narayan Dev at Ahmedabad and all the temples subordinate thereto were not temples within the meaning of Bombay Act XXXV of 1947 as amended by Act LXXVII of 1948, and an injunction restraining defendant No. 1 and other non-Satsangi Harijans from entering and worshipping in the Swaminarayan temples of the northern diocese of the Swaminarayan sect. A mandatory injunction was also issued against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 directing them to take such lawful steps to prevent non-Satsangi Harijans from entry and worship in the suit temples, as they thought fit.

Against this decision, the present appeal was filed originally by the State of Bombay (defendant No. 4) and defendant No. 1 and the same was heard by a Bench consisting of Shah and Palnitkar, JJ. on March 8, 1957. On the merits it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the declaration granted to plaintiffs could not be allowed to stand in view of the Untouchability (Offences) Act of 1955 passed by Parliament which came into force on May 8, 1955, and which repealed the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act (XXXV of 1947). That contention was negatived on the ground that the declaration and injunction granted by the trial Court in favour of the plaintiffs were not based on the provisions of Act XXXV of 1947 but the relief was in respect of rights which were not affected by the Act, though the Court at that stage refused to consider whether the view of the trial Court was correct. It was further argued by the learned Advocate General on behalf of the appellants that the injunction would also be bad in view of the provisions of s. 3 of the Untouchability (Offences) Act, which prohibited the practice of untouchability in any form. To this, the reply on behalf of plaintiffs was that they sought to prevent defendant No. 1 and others from entering the temple not on the ground of untouchability but because they were non-Satsangis, and the counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs stated that his clients were prepared to amend the plaint by deleting the word "Harijan" in the prayer clause and claiming injunction against entry into the suit temples by all non-Satsangis. But it was thought not necessary to deal with this point in view of the provisions of s. 3 of the Bombay Hindu Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorization) Act, 1956 (XXXI of 1956), on which reliance was placed on behalf of the appellants. But the plaintiffs challenged the vires of this Act on the ground that it infringed the right of freedom of religion under arts. 25 and 26 of the Constitution and, therefore, it was argued that the Act would be bad under art. 13. In view of this challenge the Court, after directing the issue of notice to the Advocate General under O. XXVIA of the Civil Procedure Code, sent down the case to the trial Court for recording a finding on the issue "whether the Swaminarayan Temple at Ahmedabad and the temples subordinate thereto are Hindu religious institutions within the meaning of Article 25(2)(b) of the Constitution?" Both parties were allowed to lead evidence on this issue. On remand, plaintiffs did not lead any oral evidence, but defendant No. 1 examined two witnesses, Venibhai and Keshavlal.

The second witness failed to appear for his final cross-examination despite adjournments, even though a commission was appointed by the Court to record his evidence. The trial Court recorded a finding that the Swaminarayan temple at Ahmedabad and the temples subordinate thereto were Hindu religious institutions within the meaning of art. 25(2)(b) of the Constitution.

GOKHALE J. [His Lordship after stating the facts of the case, proceeded.] It was not contested before the trial Court after remand that the temples in suit were public religious institutions. The only question that was agitated was whether the temples could be regarded as Hindu temples and it was submitted on behalf of plaintiffs that they were not, as these temples were meant exclusively for the followers of the Swaminarayan creed who, according to plaintiffs, did not profess the Hindu religion. The learned trial Judge held, in view of the definite finding of his predecessor before remand that the congregation of Satsang constituted a section of the Hindu community, that it was not open to the plaintiffs to contend before him that the followers of the Swaminarayan sect were not a section of the Hindu community. As regards the nature of the temples, after considering exhaustively the evidence on the record, the trial Court recorded a finding that the Swaminarayan temple at Ahmedabad and the temples subordinate thereto were Hindu religious institutions within the meaning of art. 25(2)(b) of the Constitution.

This finding is supported by the learned Government Pleader and is challenged strenuously by Mr. M. V. Desai, learned counsel appearing on behalf of respondent-plaintiffs. According to Mr. Desai, members belonging to the Swaminarayan Sampradaya do not profess the Hindu religion and, therefore, their temples are not Hindu temples. It is not disputed before us that the declaration and injunction granted by the trial Court would not stand in case the temples belonging to the Swaminarayan sect come within the ambit of the provisions of the Bombay Hindu Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorization) Act (XXXI of 1956), which will hereafter be also referred to as Act XXXI of 1956. Now, the Bombay Harijan Temple Entry Act, 1947, has been repealed by this Act. Sections 2 and 3 of Act XXXI of 1956 run as follows:—

"2. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) 'place of public worship' means a place, whether a temple or by any other name called, to whomsoever belonging which is dedicated to, or for the benefit of, or is used generally by, Hindus, Jains, Sikhs or Buddhists or any section or class thereof, for the performance of any religious service or for offering prayers therein; and includes all lands and subsidiary shrines appurtenant or attached to any such place, and also any sacred tanks, wells, springs and water courses the waters of which are worshipped, or are used for bathing or for worship;

(b) 'section' or 'class' of Hindus includes any division, sub-division, caste, sub-caste, sect or denomination whatsoever of Hindus.

3. Notwithstanding any custom, usage or law for the time being in force, or the decree or order of a court, or anything contained in any instrument, to the contrary, every place of public worship which is open to Hindus generally, or to any section or class thereof, shall be open to all sections and classes of Hindus; and no Hindu of whatsoever section or class, shall in any manner be prevented, obstructed or discouraged from entering such place of public worship, or from worshipping or offering prayers thereat, or performing any religious service therein, in the like manner and to like extent as any other Hindu of whatsoever section or class may so enter, worship, pray or perform."

Mr. Desai's submission is that under s. 2, cl. (a), the reference to Hindus, Jains, Sikhs and Buddhists is a reference to persons belonging to these religious faiths. He says that Satsangis belonging to Swaminarayan Temple may be members of the Hindu community and therefore Hindus for cultural and social purposes, but they are not persons professing Hindu religion and, til ing to Mr. Desai, Satsangis do not form a section, class or sect of Hindu religion. If that be so, Mr. Desai argues, s. 3 of Act will not apply and there is no question of throwing open the su classes and sections of Hindus. On this basis Mr. Desai conten really necessary for him to challenge the vires of this Ac Mr. Desai, he cannot attribute to the Legislature an intention Swaminarayan sect as a sect professing Hindu religion. In reference was made to the explanation to s. 3 of the Untouchal Act, 1955, which was enacted by Parliament and came into f 1955. Sections 3 and 4 of that Act deal with the subject of enforcing religious and social disabilities on the ground of " and the Explanation to s. 3 says:

"For the purposes of this section and section 4 persons profess Sikh or Jaina religion or persons professing the Hindu religion in ar developments including Virashatvas, Lingayats, Adivasis, followers of E Arya Samaj and the Swaminarayan Sampraday shall be deemed to be As I have already stated, before the remand it was Mr. Desai's s. 3 of this Act would not apply because defendant No. 1 and ot to be prevented from entering these temples not on the grou ability but on the ground that they were non-Satsangis. Tl issue was sent down to the trial Court as to the nature of t the matter in dispute being confined to the question whethe could be allowed to stand in view of the provisions of ss. 2 and of 1956.

Mr. Desai contends that though these temples are religious are not Hindu religious institutions and he has, therefore, dra to certain definitions of 'religion' as well as of an 'institution Mr. Desai, 'religion' is a state of life bound by monastic vo conduct indicating a belief in, reverence for and desire to pleas power; or the exercise or practice of rites or observances impl gion, according to Mr. Desai, would be also recognition on the some higher unseen power as having control of his destiny a titled to obedience, reverence and worship and the general m attitude resulting from this belief, with reference to its effect dual or the community; personal or general acceptance of t standard of spiritual and practical life. These definitions se taken from the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary. Mr. Des on the definition of 'religion' as given in Webster's Dictionar ward act or form by which men indicate their recognition of t God or the Gods having power over their destiny, to whom c and honour are due." This Dictionary defines "institution" : ment or organised society or corporation, an establishment, es public character or one affecting a community; a foundation ferred to these definitions in some detail because Mr. Desai re sised that they were germane to the consideration of the que this appeal and the same was of great importance and affect members of the Satsangi sect. We may say that in our judgm nitions do not essentially differ from the definition of religion sense, viz., a system of divine faith and worship; and in orde should succeed in his contention it will be necessary for him t sons belonging to the Swaminarayan sect follow a system of worship essentially distinct from Hindu religion. Mr. Desai that Swaminarayan was born a Hindu of Hindu parents, bu that the religion which he founded is a distinct religion, firstly narayan considered himself as the Supreme God, secondly, he ples for his own worship, thirdly, he propagated the ideal tha other god was a betrayal of his faith and treason to him, and k ed Acharyas and prescribed a form of 'diksha' (Initiation) in order that his disciples may attain salvation through him. This, in short, is the whole argument of Mr. Desai on this point.

[His Lordship after referring to passages from Vachanamrit, Shikshapatri and Satsangijwan, scriptures of the Swaminarayan sect, proceeded.]

In the plaint itself, reference is made to Swaminarayan Sampradaya as a Sampradaya, congregation, and at numerous places as a sect. All the plaintiffs have described themselves as Hindus. Defendant No. 1 is also described as a Hindu and so also defendant No. 2, the present Acharya, and defendant No. 3, the Mahant. Defendant No. 2, who occupies the highest place in the hierarchy of the Sampradaya of the northern diocese has not chosen to give his evidence in the suit as also defendant No. 3, who is the Mahant of the temple at Ahmedabad. They have contented themselves by filing purshis (exh. 101) stating that they do not object to the plaintiffs' suit. Though this was a representative suit, none belonging to the southern diocese joined in the suit. Two Satsangis, as we have already stated, were added as defendants Nos. 5 and 6 and they filed a purshis on their own behalf, which is exh. 280, and in that purshis they made a statement disagreeing with the contention of the plaintiffs that the Satsangi or Swaminarayan Sampradaya was different from Hindu religion but they asserted that it was a section (vibhag) of Hindu religion. They did not, however, either give evidence themselves nor did they examine any witnesses. Our attention was also invited to two judgments, namely, exh. 81, the judgment of Mr. Knight, District Judge, in Suit No. 22 of 1902 dated June 23, 1905, which refers to the founder of the sect as belonging to Vallabhacharya sect of the Vaishnavas, and the judgment of N. J. Wadia J. in First Appeal No. 430 of 1927 decided on October 10, 1904, (exh. 80) where Swaminarayan is referred to as belonging to the Vallabhacharya sect of Vaishnavites. Mr. Desai says that these descriptions have no value in evidence because the point was not at issue in these prior suits. That is no doubt true, but at the same time it cannot be forgotten that till now no claim was ever made on behalf of the Swaminarayan sect that it constituted a religion different from Hinduism. In the Gazetteer of the Bombay Presidency, Vol. IX, to which reference has already been made above, at pp. 536-537 the Swaminarayan sect has been described as containing amongst its followers, Brahmans, Bhavsars, Charans, Darjis, Ghanchis, Golas, Kanbis, Kathis, Kolis, Luhars, Malis, Rajputs, Salats, Sathvaras, Sonis and Suthars and is described as the most modern of Vaishnav sects. See also Mr. Bhattacharya's Hindu Castes and Sects, pp. 472-475.

It is well known that a census has been held in India every ten years since 1872, and in censuses prior to 1951 religion and community loomed fairly large in the treatment of census data, the primary sorting of the slips being done on the basis of religion. It is only in 1951 that information was extracted in respect of four main religions of Indian origin, namely, Hindu, Sikh, Jain and Buddha, and four main religions of non-Indian origin, namely, Zoroastrian, Muslim, Christian and Jew, and those persons who professed other religions were tabulated as 'others'. See Census of India, 1951, Vol. IV, Bombay, Saurashtra and Kutch, Part I. In the General Report of the Census of the Bombay Presidency, 1872, Part II, census figures based on religion are given both with regard to Indian areas of the Bombay Presidency as well as in the area of Native States. As regards Indian areas, the report reveals that out of every 100 Hindus by religion, no less than 62.19 belonged to "mixed" class, while 26.83 were Saivas and 10.98 were Vaishnavas and in the Vaishnav class the following sects are mentioned: Madhvacharia, Ramanuj, Swaminarayan, Vallabhacharis, Kabir Panthis, Brijmargis, Purnamis, and it appears that Swaminarayan sect comprised 0.56 in the total of 10.98 per cent. In the figures with regard to Native States also Swaminarayans are shown as a Hindu sect. The total number of persons belonging to this sect in 1872 in the Indian area were 72,629 and in the Native States 2,17,080. The census returns are based on slips filled in by individuals and from information collected by the census personnel and it is clear that nearly three lacs of followers of Swaminarayan raised no objection to their being described as belonging to a sect professing the Hindu religion.

Exhibit 257 is a book on Swami Sahajanand written by Shri Manilal L. Bhalja, a pleader who instructed plaintiffs' pleader in the trial Court and was instructing Mr. M. V. Desai throughout in this appeal. At page 69 of that book it is stated:

"Just as Gauranga Prabhu Chaitanya and Ramanand had accepted various non-Hindus in their Vaishnava religion, so Sahajanand had accepted Parsis and Muslims in his Vaishnava religion."

At page 107 the effect of Swaminarayan's teachings is stated as follows:

"Women obtained their rightful place in the society and the Sampradaya and they made progress in religion and knowledge. Non-Hindus were brought within Hindu religion and Sudras adopted the practices of Brahmins and pure Bhagwat Dharma was thus illuminated... Sahajanand was a teacher of Bhagwat religion."

In the preface to the book called "Sri Swami Narayana" by Bhai Manilal C. Parekh, reference is made to the late Mr. Justice Ranade's description of Swaminarayan as "the last of the Hindu Reformers" and it is stated

"One should qualify, however, this description by adding to it the words 'of the old type'. This is undoubtedly what Ranade meant, for he has paid his tribute again and again in unmistakable terms to such men as Ram Mohan, Keshub, Dayananda, etc., as Reformers of Hinduism, and Ranade himself was one of them. But the difference between all these and Swami Narayana lies in the fact that while they were influenced in one way or another by whatever light came from the Western World, he was wholly untouched by any alien influence and was as purely Hindu in his mental and spiritual constitution as any in the long roll of Teachers and Reformers of the past. This constitutes his uniqueness among the reformers of our times, for in him we see Hinduism in its purest and most indigenous form."

Mr. M. V. Desai at one stage questioned the authority of this book, but when his attention was drawn to the fact that exh. 257 written by Shri Bhalja itself refers to "Sri Swami Narayana" written by Bhai Manilal C. Parekh as one of the source books, Mr. Desai was good enough to make available to us a copy of Mr. Parekh's book on "Sri Swami Narayana" which contains at the end a complete translation of the Shiksha-patri. Mr. Justice Marten, as he then was, in his judgment in Appeal No. 62 of 1919 decided on November 9, 1922, part of which is reported in *Shripatprasad v. Lakshmidas*¹ has referred to Mr. Monier Williams' writing in the journals of the Royal Asiatic Society, Vol. 14, at page 311, where the essence of Swaminarayan's teachings was described as "devotion to Shri Krishna—as the Supreme Being—with observance of duty, chastity and purity of life." In his account of the religions of the Indian people entitled "Religious Thought and Life in India", Mr. Monier Williams has devoted a few passages to the sect founded by Swaminarayan and has stated his conclusion about that sect, after studying its system and having discussions with Pandits of the Sampradaya, as follows:—

"Without doubt the tendency of their doctrines is towards purity of life, which is supposed to be effected by suppression of the passions (udasa), and complete devotion to the Supreme Being in his names of Narayana, Vishnu and Krishna. In an honest desire to purify the Vaishnava faith this sect has done and is doing much good; but there can be no question that its doctrines, like its gods, its idols, and its sectarian marks, are part and parcel of genuine Vaishnavism."

The passages from the scriptures of the Sampradaya to which reference has already been made seem to confirm the view that the teaching of Swaminarayan Sampradaya was an attempt at purifying Vaishnavism and was not intended to constitute a separate religion from Hinduism.

[His Lordship after dealing with the oral evidence in the case, proceeded.]

This oral evidence does not, in our opinion, establish that Swaminarayan Sampradaya is a distinct religion from Hinduism. It is well known that Hinduism is a religion not only based on the Vedas but other scriptures as well. Every tradition which has sought to purify Hinduism has been absorbed by it with the result that Hindu religion cannot be described as a definite dogmatic creed, but in its essence is very elastic in its scope. The evidence discloses that Swaminarayan was born of Hindu parents and started his career as a devotee of Krishna and that admittedly an overwhelming majority of Satsangis have been drawn from the ranks of Hindus, i.e., persons professing Hindu religion. Satsangis are known as belonging to the Swaminarayan as also to the Udhav Sampradaya and Udhav was a well known devotee of Shri Krishna. The essence of the teachings of Shikshapatri is based on Hindu religion. Shikshapatri mentions Shri Krishna as Ishta Dev (tutelary deity) of the Sampradaya and other Hindu Gods, like Vishnu, Shiva, Ganapati, Parvati and Surya, are mentioned as fit to be worshipped. The four castes of Hinduism, namely, Brahmins, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Sudras, are recognised and eight religious books are mentioned as scriptures of the Swaminarayan faith. The main temple of Nar Narayan at Ahmedabad contains below the dome Hindu idols. Hindu non-Satsangis, except Harijans, have freely visited and worshipped the idols in this temple without any let or hindrance whatsoever. The learned trial Judge, before remand, has remarked that not even a single man came forward to say that he disclosed that he was a non-Satsangi and after that he was allowed to visit the suit temple as a place of religious worship. To some extent this is true; but, as we have already seen, witness Trikamlal Patel was asked whether the right of entry in the suit temple had been asserted by any non-Satsangi non-Harijan Hindu, to which his reply was that such a right was being enjoyed daily and it had never been denied, and our attention has not been invited to any evidence to the contrary. Considerable stress was laid on the fact that persons belonging to other religions, that is to say, Muslims and Parsis, have been initiated as Satsangis and have been admitted to the Swaminarayan fold and it is contended that a Sampradaya which admits persons professing other religions cannot be regarded as Hindu religion. But this contention fails to take into account the fact that these persons of other religions who have been initiated as Satsangis have thereby admittedly not ceased to belong to their own religion. If that be so, it cannot be argued that the overwhelming majority of Hindus who have joined the Swaminarayan Sampradaya have alone forsaken Hindu religion, as is sought to be made out before us.

The learned Government Pleader has relied on two Privy Council decisions in support of his contention that the Swaminarayan faith is not distinct from Hinduism. In *Rani Bhagwan Kuar v. Jogendra Chandra Bose*², their Lordships of the Privy Council had to consider whether the term 'Hindu' in s. 331 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, and s. 2 of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881, included, on its true construction, a Sikh. The argument before them was that the testator as a Sikh was not included in the term 'Hindu' as used in the Act of 1881 and, secondly, that assuming Sikhs to be Hindus within the meaning of the Act, the testator had before his death ceased to be a Sikh and become a member of the Brahmo Samaj, and so was not a Hindu. On the first point, their Lordships agreed with the view of the Chief Court of the Punjab that a Sikh was included in the term 'Hindu' as used in the Probate and Administration Act. Then they dealt with the second argument as to whether the testator, having become a member of the Brahmo Samaj, had ceased to be either a Sikh or a Hindu. The Chief Court examined the literature bearing upon the Brahmo Samaj and it came to the conclusion that a Sikh or Hindu by becoming a Brahmo did not necessarily cease to belong to the community in which he was born and on evidence the Chief Court found that the testator never became a professed Brahmo at all; and both these conclusions were accepted by the Privy Council. It also dealt with another objection that in matters of diet and ceremonial observance the testator had departed so far from the standard of orthodoxy binding upon him as a Hindu or a Sikh as to exclude him from the term 'Hindu' in the Probate and Administration Act and their Lordships agreed with the Chief Court in thinking that such lapses from orthodox practice, assuming them to be established, could not have the effect of excluding from the category of 'Hindu' in the Act one who was born within it, and who never become otherwise separated from the religious communion in which he was born. The other case on which reliance is placed by the learned Government Pleader is *Ma Yait v. Maung Chit Maung*³. In that case the question was whether persons belonging to the community of Kalais in Burma, who were descendants from Hindus who married Burmese women, as a community were 'Hindus' within the meaning of s. 13 of the Burma Laws Act, 1898, or s. 331 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865. In their judgment, their Lordships of the Privy Council referred to the decision of Sankaran Nair J. in *Muthusami Mudaliar v. Masilamani*⁴, in which Sankaran Nair J. referred to the evolution of sects amongst Hindus and considered certain criteria according to which new castes or classes which have been evolved among the descendants of Hindus are to be considered as having retained Hindu religion. According to the learned Judge's view, the formation of new castes was a process which was constantly taking place. Usage modified old principles and it governed the sects which adopted such usage. Contact with other religions such as Buddhism, Mahomedanism and Christianity evolved sects which discarded many characteristics of orthodox Hinduism, and adopted ideas and rites which were popularly supposed to appertain to other systems. Their Lordships of the Privy Council were of the view, however, that in such cases the test to be applied was whether continuity with the original religion had been retained or broken. In the case of an individual, the question does not become very difficult because considerable latitude of action is extended to him before he is deemed to have deprived himself of the religion which gave him his law until he does anything which amounts to a clear renunciation of that religion. In the instance of a community, the question must always be whether there has been continuity of character, or variations from the regular practices of those who are Hindus, which, though considerable, ought not necessarily to be taken as involving a break in the continuity of relationship. But there is a limit to such processes and the continuity may be so broken that the new sect goes outside the original pale. Dealing with the case before them, viz., the community of Kalais, their Lordships observed as follows (p. 563):

"...The Hindu law which the Courts administer rests on the Shastras, which claim divine sanction and are followed by Brahmins generally. There may have been introduced usages which constitute a departure from the principles of the Shastras so great that the community which has adopted them must be taken to have lost the character of being one in which Hindu religion governs. In the case of a sect at a distance from Hindu centres, where the surroundings are Burman and Buddhist and the mode of life is different from that of the Hindu communities in India proper, popularly known as such, it is easier to determine it as being outside Hinduism than it is in the case of an isolated individual who has merely lapsed into unorthodox practices. It is obvious that few influences can be more potent in producing new communities of this separate kind than the combined operation of migration, intermarriage and new occupations. When these influences have operated for sufficiently long a different community, with its peculiar religion and usages, may well result and be so outside Hinduism in the proper meaning of the word."

The learned Government Pleader also invited our attention to the case of *Nalinaksha Majhi v. Rajanikanta Das Mohanta*⁵. There it was held that under the Bengal School of the Hindu law of inheritance, a Vaishnava of whatever class was entitled to inherit from an ancestor who professed the orthodox Hindu creed and that a person of Vaishnava faith does not renounce the Hindu religion and continues to be a Hindu and professes Hindu religion in his own way, and though he may have seceded from orthodox Hinduism, as Lutherans did from the orthodox Catholic Church, he does not go out of the pale of Hinduism. In our opinion, it cannot be said that the Swaminarayan Sampradaya has taken the overwhelming majority of its Hindu Satsangis outside the pale of Hinduism or that the teachings and principles of the Sampradaya constitute such a departure from Hindu religion that it could be said that the connection between the two has snapped.

Mr. Desai conceded that in case we hold that the Swaminarayan Sampradaya is not a different religion from Hinduism, the conclusion cannot be resisted that the Nar Narayan temple at Ahmedabad and the temples subordinate thereto would be Hindu religious institutions and also "places of public worship" within the meaning of s. 2 of the Bombay Hindu Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorization) Act (XXXI of 1956). Even assuming that these temples are mainly used by Satsangis and are for their benefit only, the fact that an overwhelming majority of the Satsangis are Hindus by religion and use these places for the purpose of religious service and for offering prayers therein should make these temples places of public worship within the Act; and, if that be so, under s. 3 of this Act notwithstanding any custom, usage or law for the time being in force, they would be open to Hindus generally including Harijans and no Hindu of whatever section or class can in any manner be prevented, obstructed or discouraged from entering these places of public worship or from worshipping or offering prayers therein.

That leads me to the alternative argument of Mr. Desai who says that in that case Act XXXI of 1956 would be in conflict with art. 25 of the Constitution of India. He relied strongly on art. 25(1) of the Constitution which provides that:

"Subject to public order, morality and health and to the other provisions of this Part, all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion", and Mr. Desai contended that the Satsangis or members belonging to the Swaminarayan Sampradaya have got the right to profess, practise and propagate their faith, and that right would be interfered with if non-Satsangi Hindus including the Harijans are allowed entry into the suit temples. He says that these temples contain idols of Swaminarayan and his parents which are unknown to Hindus and for these idols non-Satsangi Hindus cannot be expected to have any reverence, and he contends that in case non-Satsangi Hindus are allowed to worship in these temples, that would come in the way of Satsangis freely professing, practising and propagating their Sampradaya. We are not prepared to accept this argument. Religious freedom contemplated under art. 25(1) of the Constitution is subject to the provisions of art. 25(2) as also art. 26. Under art. 25(2)(b), the State is empowered to make any law providing for social welfare and reform or the throwing open of Hindu religious institutions of a public character to all classes and sections of Hindus. Religious freedom as envisaged in the Constitution is not unrestricted and unlimited religious freedom. For instance, it will be competent to the Legislature to pass a law dealing with the administration of property belonging to any religious denomination or any section thereof and that would not infringe the right of that denomination to manage its own affairs in matters of religion as contemplated in art. 26(b) of the Constitution. See *Batilal Panachand v. State of Bombay*⁶. In *Venkataramana Devaru v. State of Mysore*⁷, the Supreme Court was dealing with the challenge made to the Madras Temple Entry Authorization Act and it held that art. 25(2)(b) of the Constitution applied in terms to all religious institutions of a public character without any qualification or reserve. Public institutions would mean not merely temples dedicated to the public as a whole but also those founded for the benefit of sections thereof and denominational temples would be comprised therein. According to their Lordships of the Supreme Court, the language of this article being plain & it was not open to the Courts to read into it limitations which were based on a priori reasoning as to the probable intention of the Legislature. The Court would be gathered only from the words actually used in the case their Lordships laid down the following propositions:—art. 25 of the Constitution declares the right of all persons to freedom of conscience and the right to freely profess, practise and propagate religion. cl. (1) itself that right was subject to the other provisions in the Rights Chapter and one of the provisions to which the right conferred by art. 25(1) was subject was art. 25(2). A law, therefore, which art. 25(2)(b) would control the right conferred by art. 25(1) and art. 25(1) does not apply to that law. (2) The true nature of the right conferred by art. 25(2)(b) was that the State Legislature would have power to make laws by legislation on all classes and sections of Hindus the right to enter a public temple and such a right would be available whether it was exercised against an individual under art. 25(1) or against a corporation under art. 26(b). (3) Article 25(1) deals with right of individual and art. 25(2) was much wider in its contents and has reference to the community and controls both art. 25(1) and art. 26(b). None of the members of the Temple Committee in this case to manage the affairs of the temple matters of religion and it is not Mr. Desai's contention that the Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorization) Act in any way infringes art. 26(b) of the Constitution. His only contention is that the right of Satsangis to freely profess, practise and propagate religion conferred by art. 25(1). That contention, in our opinion, cannot be accepted. The right conferred by art. 25(1) is subject to the power of the State, under art. 25(2), to make any law providing for social welfare and reform or to regulate the affairs of Hindu religious institutions of a public character to all classes of Hindus. The alternative argument of Mr. Desai, therefore, that the Places of Public Worship (Entry Authorization) Act, 1956 is ultra vires the provisions of art. 25(1) of the Constitution cannot succeed.

These were the only contentions raised before us by Mr. Desai. The finding recorded by the trial Judge after remand and in support of the injunction granted by the trial Court before remand cannot be accepted as valid.

The result is that this appeal will be allowed, the decree of the trial Court will be set aside and the plaintiffs' suit will be dismissed with costs.

PATEL J. I agree with my learned brother that the plaintiffs' suit should be dismissed with costs throughout.

Before Mr. Justice Kotval.

RADHAKISHAN RAMNATH v. THE STATE.*

Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Act (VI of 1930), Secs. 2(a), 5(3)—Factories Act (LXIII of 1948), Sec. 2(m)—General Clauses Act (X of 1897), Sec. 8(1)—Central Provinces and Berar General Clauses Act (I of 1914), Sec. 7—Factory as defined in s. 2(a) of C. P. & Berar Maternity Benefit Act, 1930, whether means factory as defined in s. 2(m) of Factories Act of 1948—Construction of s. 8(1) of General Clauses Act.

References to the Factories Act, 1934 in s. 2(a) of the Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Act, 1930, must be construed as references to Factories Act, 1948, by virtue of s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act, 1897. Therefore, the definition of "factory" contained in s. 2(m) of the Factories Act, 1948, must be read into s. 2(a) of the Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Act, 1930.

The words "unless a different intention appears" in s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act, 1897, qualify the precedent words of the section viz., "references in any other enactment or in any instrument" or "this Act or any Central Act or Regulation." Therefore, the contrary intention must be found in the repealing Act or in the other enactment or instrument, and it is not permissible to turn to circumstances outside those Acts or instruments to find whether a contrary intention appears or not.

*National Sewing Thread Co. Ltd. v. James Chadwick and Bros. Ltd.*¹ and Khuda Bux v. Manager, Cal. Press,² referred to.

M. N. Phadke and V. M. Golwalkar, for the applicants-accused.

G. R. Mudholkar, Additional Special Government Pleader, for the State.

KOTVAL J. The applicants are the proprietor and manager respectively of the Ramkrishna Ramnath Bidi Factory at Kamptee. Both have been convicted under s. 9 of the Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Act, 1930, read with s. 5(3) and under r. 10 read with r. 4 of the Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Rules, 1930, for not paying maternity benefit to a female employee in their factory, and for failing to maintain a muster roll of female employees. Both the applicants have been fined Rs. 200 and Rs. 25 respectively on each of the above counts, or in default, ordered to undergo simple imprisonment for 8 weeks each.

The merits of the convictions have not been challenged before me nor was the evidence referred to. But Mr. M. N. Phadke on behalf of the applicants has raised several contentions.

In order to show the nature of these contentions it is necessary to state certain facts. The Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Act is Act VI of 1930. Though published in the Central Provinces and Berar Gazette Extra-ordinary, of March 22, 1930, it was brought into force on January 1, 1931 by a notification of the then Government of the Central Provinces and Berar, dated December 16, 1930, Notification No. 3308-1740-XIII, issued under the powers vested in the State Government by s. 1(c) of the Act. By virtue of s. 2(a) of the Act as originally enacted "factory" was defined as follows:—

"'factory' means a factory as defined in section 2(j) of the Factories Act, 1911."

After the enactment of the Maternity Benefit Act the Factories Act of 1911 was replaced by the Factories Act of 1934 (Act XXV of 1934), and in consequence of the enactment of that Act s. 2 of the Maternity Benefit Act was amended. The amendment of s. 2 was made by the Central Provinces Mater-

*Decided, October 10, 1958. Criminal Revision Application No. 297 of 1958, against the order passed in Criminal Appeal No. 337 of 1957, by T. P. nity Benefit (Amendment) Act, 1955, (Act 22 of 1935). As amended, s. 2(a) defines "factory" as follows:—

"'factory' means a factory as defined in section 2(i) of the Factories Act, 1934, or any premises declared to be a factory under section 5 of that Act;"

It will be noticed that the definition remained in substance the same except that instead of reference to s. 2(j) of the Factories Act of 1911, s. 2(j) of the Factories Act of 1934 was referred to and a clause added permitting a factory to be declared a factory.

The amendment of s. 2(a) came into force on November 15, 1935. After the Maternity Benefit Act was thus amended in 1935, the then existing Factories Act of 1934 was repealed and re-enacted. It is now Act LXIII of 1948. The Factories Act of 1948 came into force on April 1, 1949. When the new Factories Act came into force, it is to be noted that the definition of "factory" in s. 2(a) of the Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Act of 1930 was not amended, with the result that even to day the Maternity Benefit Act in defining "factory" refers to s. 2(j) of the Factories Act of 1934, and makes no reference to the Factories Act of 1948. Mr. Phadke's argument is founded upon this failure to amend the Maternity Benefit Act in consequence of the enactment of the Factories Act of 1948.

The Factories Act of 1948 made sweeping changes in the definition of "factory" as contained in s. 2(m) of that Act. I need not stress the points of difference but it is sufficient for the purposes of this revision to state that if the definition of "factory" in s. 2(m) of the 1948 Factories Act is considered, the applicants' premises would be included in the definition of "factory" whereas under s. 2(j) of the Factories Act of 1934, it is conceded, it would not fall within the definition of "factory". Now, Mr. Phadke contends that the omission to amend s. 2(a) of the Maternity Benefit Act shows that reference was deliberately intended only to the definition of "factory" in the old Factories Act of 1934 and that the new definition contained in s. 2(m) of the Factories Act of 1948 was not intended to be brought into force so far as payment of maternity benefit was concerned. Therefore, he urges that the applicants' premises admittedly would not be a "factory" and the conviction under the Maternity Benefit Act of 1930 and its rules cannot be sustained.

On behalf of the State reliance was placed by the Additional Special Government Pleader on s. 8 of the General Clauses Act which is the same as s. 7 of the Central Provinces and Berar General Clauses Act and s. 38 of the English Interpretation Act. Section 8(1) of the Central General Clauses Act runs as follows:—

"Where this Act, or any Central Act or Regulation made after the commencement of this Act, repeals and re-enacts, with or without modification, any provision of a former enactment, then references in any other enactment or in any instrument to the provision so repealed shall, unless a different intention appears, be construed as references to the provision so re-enacted."

No doubt, if s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act were applicable, it is clear that the repeal of the Factories Act of 1934, followed by its re-enactment as the Factories Act of 1948, would have this effect, that in the Central Provinces and Berar Maternity Benefit Act the reference to the Factories Act of 1934 would have to be read as a reference to the Factories Act of 1948. This of course would be subject to the governing clause of s. 8(1) "unless a different intention appears".

Mr. Phadke relied upon those words and urged that such a different intention does appear in the present case. He urged that that would be so for three reasons. Firstly, that the nature of the change brought about in the definition of "factory" in the Factories Act of 1948 is so fundamental and sweeping that it would include within its ambit several business premises which were never factories in the accepted sense of that term and could never have been intended to be included in the definition of "factory". Therefore, according to him, a contrary intention appears. Secondly, he urged that when the Factories Act of 1911 was repealed and re-enacted in 1934, s. 2(a) of the Maternity Benefit Act was soon after amended in order to bring it in conformity with the Factories Act of 1934, but it is of great significance that when the new Factories Act of 1948 was brought into force and the Factories Act of 1934 was repealed, no corresponding change was made in the Maternity Benefit Act. He contends that this omission was deliberate and it shows a clear intention on the part of the Legislature, so far as payment of the maternity benefit is concerned, to define "factory" with reference to the Factories Act of 1934 and not with reference to the Factories Act of 1948. Thirdly, Mr. Phadke urged that when the Factories Act was re-enacted in 1948 there was extant in the former territory of the Central Provinces and Berar an Act known as the Central Provinces and Berar Unregulated Factories Act, 1937 (XXI of 1937). That Act no doubt was later on repealed by the Madhya Pradesh Unregulated Factories Repealing Act, 1952, which came into force on July 25, 1952, but in 1948 Act XXI of 1937 was in force. Mr. Phadke's further contention was that the Unregulated Factories Act was in force at the time when the Factories Act of 1948 was brought into force, and therefore at that time the Legislature advisedly did not amend the Maternity Benefit Act because they probably took the view that the provisions of the Unregulated Factories Act were sufficient to deal with the case of unregulated factories under which class the applicants' factory fell and that it was not necessary to apply the wider definition in the Factories Act of 1948 to such unregulated factories so far as maternity benefit was concerned. He urged that the omission was deliberate and, therefore, a contrary intention appears within the meaning of s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act.

Now, in the first place it seems to me that the words "unless a different intention appears" in s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act must be read in the light of the precedent words of the section and they cannot be isolated from their context. The precedent words are:

"Where this Act, or any Central Act or Regulation made after the commencement of this Act, repeals and re-enacts...any provision of a former enactment then references in any other enactment or in any instrument to the provisions so repealed shall"

and the succeeding words are:—

"be construed as references to the provision so re-enacted."

The words "unless a different intention appears" therefore qualify the words "references in any other enactment or in any instrument" or "this Act or any Central Act or Regulation". The effect of this is, therefore, that the contrary intention must be found in the repealing Act or in the other enactment or instrument, and we cannot turn to circumstances outside those Acts or instruments to find whether a contrary intention appears or not. All the three contentions raised by Mr. Phadke refer to such circumstances outside the enactment namely, the Factories Act, 1948, and the Minimum Wages Act, in the present case and, in my opinion, having regard to the terms of s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act we cannot look to those circumstances. It was conceded that there was nothing in the Maternity Benefit Act as such to indicate a contrary intention.

Apart from this there is no doubt that when the Factories Act of 1934 was repealed and its provisions were re-enacted in the shape of the Factories Act of 1948, by virtue of s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act the references to the Act of 1934 must be taken as references to the Act of 1948. Even if s. 8 would not strictly apply, still the principle of construction enunciated in that section would apply. It has been held by the Supreme Court of India to be a principle of general application in construing statutes in *National Sewing Thread Co. Ltd. v. James Chadwick and Bros., Ltd.*¹

When the rule of interpretation was clearly laid down in s. 8 of the General Clauses Act, it is to be presumed that the Legislature had in mind the provisions of that law when they re-enacted the Factories Act in 1948 and the alleged failure to correspondingly amend the Maternity Benefit Act must be construed in the light of that provision of law. In this view it seems to me that it was entirely unnecessary to have amended cl. 2(a) of the Maternity Benefit Act because references to the Factories Act of 1934 in that clause would, without further amendment of the Maternity Benefit Act, be construed as references to the Factories Act of 1948, by virtue of s. 8(1) of the General Clauses Act, and, therefore, no amendment was made.

No doubt, when the Factories Act was brought into force in 1934, an amendment was made in the Maternity Benefit Act, but if such an amendment was made, one can only hold that it was made by way of abundant caution. At any rate, I am unable to hold that mere omission on the part of the Legislature to amend an Act can be indicative of a contrary intention as required by s. 8 of the General Clauses Act. The drawing of any such inference would render the provisions of s. 8 of the General Clauses Act largely otiose. The second of the contentions raised by Mr. Phadke, therefore, fails.

I am also not impressed by the third contention founded upon the provisions of the Unregulated Factories Act. That Act has now been repealed, and the effect of the repeal without re-enactment is that that law had never existed. Therefore, no advantage can be taken of such a law. Even if reference could be justified to the Unregulated Factories Act, I do not think that I can speculate as to what must have been the intention of the Legislature, in the face of provisions of s. 8 of the General Clauses Act. Nor can I presume that because the Unregulated Factories Act was then in force, the Legislature did not amend the Maternity Benefit Act.

As to the first argument that the amendment of the definition of "factory", as contained in the Factories Act of 1948 makes sweeping changes and indirectly lays a liability upon the applicants for the first time by amending the Factories Act rather than the Maternity Benefit Act, it is only necessary to say that if the Legislature clearly has the power to make an amendment and its terms are clear it is not for the Courts to speculate upon its possible effect or the so-called hardship to the citizen. The Maternity Benefit Act is a necessary and very salutary measure of social amelioration and any hardship upon factory owners like the applicants is far outweighed by the benefits thereby conferred upon their female employees.

On a question similar to the second contention of Mr. Phadke as to the applicability of the definition of "Factory" contained in the Factories Act of 1948 to the Workmen's Compensation Act, a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court ruled in *Khuda Bux v. Manager, Cale. Press*² that s. 8 of the General Clauses Act would apply. With reference to an argument similar to the one advanced in this case, Chief Justice Chakravartti held as follows:—

"(7) In my opinion, this contention is plainly unsound. The Factories Act of 1934 was repealed and re-enacted by the Act of 1948 and therefore by virtue of s. 8, General Clauses Act, references in the Workmen's Compensation Act to the Act of 1934 must be construed as references to the Act of 1948. There is nothing from which a different intention appears. Had the Workmen's Compensation Act been amended after 1948, and had the reference to the Act of 1934 yet remained, there would be reason for saying that it was the Act of 1934 which was intended to be regarded, but there has been no amendment of the Workmen's Compensation Act after the Factories Act of 1948, nor is there any other indication that the new Act is not to be read for the old, as required by s. 8, General Clauses Act.

(8) As against these considerations, it was urged that the Factories Act of 1948 was not a repealing and amending Act, but was an Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to labour in factories, as the preamble showed, and, consequently, s. 8, General Clauses Act would not apply. That argument was founded on a misconception. Section 8, General Clauses Act, does not require that the later Act repealing and re-enacting an earlier Act, should be a repealing and amending Act. All that it requires is that a Central Act should repeal and re-enact a former enactment."

I am in respectful agreement with this view. It seems to me that there is no doubt in the present case that the definition of "factory" contained in the Factories Act of 1948 must be read into the Maternity Benefit Act of 1930. The contentions raised by Mr. Phadke on behalf of the applicants fail and the convictions of the applicants must be upheld. The sentences of fine in the circumstances were proper. The application for revision fails and is dismissed.

Application dismissed.

The words "information received from a person accused of any offence" in s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, cannot be read to mean that he must be an accused when he gives the information but would include a person if he became subsequently an accused person, at the time when that statement is sought to be received in evidence against him.

THE prosecution case was that one Ahmed Ibrahim was the son of the eldest step-sister of Mohamad and Umar (accused Nos. 1 and 2), i.e. accused Nos. 1 and 2 were the maternal uncles of Ahmed. After the death of Ismail, the father of accused Nos. 1 and 2, Ahmed was looking after the management of the estate of Ismail, in which he or his mother had a share. There were some disputes between Ahmed and accused Nos. 1 and 2 with regard to this property. After separation Ahmed started a shop in the Sanghedia Bazar in Bhavnagar wherein in the opposite row the accused also had their shop. On September 11, 1957, Ahmed went to the shop of the accused at about 7 p.m. and when he went there, he was asked by accused No. 1 to come to the shop in the night as there was some work. At about 10-30 or 11 p.m. at night Ahmed went to the shop of accused Nos. 1 and 2 and that was the last that was seen of Ahmed. Ahmed did not return to his home thereafter and his wife Hanifa sent their daughter Aysha to enquire at the house of the accused and she was told that he had not gone there. In the meanwhile a rumour started about the disappearance of Ahmed and some persons with whom he was associated enquired at the house of Ahmed and found both the accused along with members of their family at the house of Ahmed. They persuaded Hanifa to lodge a complaint with the police and as a result of that Hanifa, the associates of Ahmed and accused Nos. 1 and 2 went to the police station, "C" Division, Bhavnagar. At the "C" Division police station Sub-Inspector Jadeja took down the statements of Hanifa and of accused No. 1. He then took the party to the "A" Division police station where the police officer one Unnadkat questioned accused No. 1. As a result of the information given by accused No. 1 and as a result of the discovery made by him, it was found that the dead body of Ahmed was buried in the Naveli belonging to the accused. A regular panchnama was drawn with regard to the discovery. On this discovery a formal arrest was made and a complaint filed by Unnadkat at the Police Station. Further investigation was thereafter carried out, during the course of which on the same day accused No. 1 made a statement and pointed out the cap and the shoes belonging to Ahmed from under a cupboard in his own bed room. He also made a statement and made the discovery of a bag of salt concealed amongst the bags of grain in the back portion of the rows and at the bottom, the relevance of this bag of salt being that when the dead body was taken out of the pit in the Naveli, it was found that there was salt along with the body in the pit. Statements of important witnesses were recorded. Thereafter the accused were charge-sheeted before the Judicial First Class Magistrate, Bhavnagar, for having committed the offence of murder punishable under s. 302 read with s. 24 of the Indian Penal Code or in the alternative for causing the evidence of the murder to disappear with the intention of screening the offender, an offence punishable under s. 201 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code. The accused were committed for trial to the Court of Session.

The Sessions Judge convicted accused Nos. 1 and 2 under s. 201 read with s. 34 and each of them was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 7 years. Both the accused were acquitted of the charge of the offence under s. 302 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code. The accused appealed (Appeal No. 491 of 1958) against their conviction and sentence and the State appealed (Appeal No. 784 of 1958) against the acquittal of the accused under s. 302 read with s. 34, Indian Penal Code.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts of the case, proceeded.] Before dealing with the evidence, at this stage I might dispose of the contention with regard to the admissibility of exh. 29 containing some admissions and of statements made by the accused and reproduced in the panchnama regarding the discovery of the body. So far as the question of exh. 29 is concerned, an objection to its admissibility was raised at the time when that document was put in and has been renewed in this Court at the time of arguments, though not very seriously. It would appear that the said statement would be admissible under s. 8 of the Evidence Act as showing the conduct of the accused subsequent to the death of the deceased in any event. It would also appear that it is not hit by the provisions of s. 25 at all in this case. In order that s. 25 should be operative to prevent an admission being received in evidence, it must amount to a confession, for it is provided therein that no confession made to a police officer shall be proved as against a person accused of any offence. It has been observed in *Pakala Narayana Swami v. The King-Emperor*¹ (p. 81):—

"...a confession must either admit in terms the offence, or at any rate substantially all the facts which constitute the offence. An admission of a gravely incriminating fact, even a conclusively incriminating fact, is not of itself a confession,..."

This being so the statements in exh. 29 not being confession, cannot be excluded by provisions of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. It would further appear that since this statement happens to have been made to the Police prior to the commencement of the investigation in the case it could not possibly be hit by s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code: vide Sital Chandra v. State.² We are, therefore, of the view that exh. 29 is admissible not being a confession.

With regard to the panchnama exh. 54, or what will be more appropriate to state the statements of accused reproduced in the panchnama or deposed to by witnesses which are sought to be proved, it is argued that these are not admissible under s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act. The learned counsel argues that s. 27, which says:

"...when any fact is deposed to as discovered in consequence of information received from a person accused of any offence, in the custody of a police officer,..."

would show that the information must be given or a statement must be made by a person who at that time is accused of any offence and is in the custody of the police. If these two conditions are not satisfied then even if it satisfied the other conditions of the section it is not admissible. For the proposition that at the time of making the statement he must be an accused person the learned counsel has relied on *Deonandan Dusadh v. King-Emperor*³ and Jalla v. Emperor.⁴ In Deonandan Dusadh v. Emperor, it was held that a statement made by a person who was not accused of an offence at the time of making the statement, was not admissible under that section. In coming to this conclusion reliance was placed on the case of *Queen-Empress v. Babu Lal*⁵ which is a full bench case. The question referred to the full bench was whether or not s. 27 was a qualification to both ss. 25 and 26 or only to s. 26. It appears there was some difference of opinion in the cases decided in that Court; in one of the cases Mr. Justice Mahmood had held that s. 27 was merely a proviso or a qualification to s. 26 and had no bearing on s. 25; and which resulted in making every statement made to a police officer inadmissible in evidence even if it satisfied the conditions laid down in s. 27. The other view was that it was a proviso to both ss. 25 and 26. The majority of the Judges constituting the full bench held that s. 27 was applicable as a proviso to both ss. 25 and 26. Mr. Justice Oldfield does not construe the section in this manner, nor does Mr. Justice Brodhurst. It would appear that the learned Judge states at p. 519, after giving an illustration of a person immediately after committing a murder going to the police station and giving himself up to the police officer and making a statement before that officer and his subordinates of all the facts and pointing out the body of the victim and giving up the weapon with which he had committed the murder, that s. 27 would still be applicable to a case like that. The learned officiating Chief Justice held that s. 27 is applicable as a proviso to both ss. 25 and 26, and Mr. Justice Duthoit expressed a general opinion without expressing any opinion as to the construction of s. 27 itself. It is only Mr. Justice Mahmood who construed s. 27 in the manner suggested while dealing with the argument as to whether it is a qualification to s. 26 or to s. 25 as well. That case, therefore, cannot be regarded as an authority for the suggested construction. The Lahore case seems to construe the section in the same way.

In s. 24 of the Evidence Act, words precisely similar to those used in s. 27 are used; it refers to a confession made by an accused person and if the contention that is now made is accepted it might introduce a great deal of injustice to persons accused of an offence, because all confessions made by a person before he became an accused, would be admissible even if they were obtained by inducement, threat or promise. Section 24 is considered in the case of Emperor v. Cunna.⁶ Sir Lallubhai Shah at page 1261 says that that section will be applicable to a confession made by a person, who becomes subsequently accused of an offence. The other Judges in effect accept this, but they differed from the learned Chief Justice on the question of fact as to whether the confessions were made by inducement, threat or promise. The phrase has been used in both sections and it must be interpreted in the same manner in both sections. No possible reason can be suggested why it should have a different meaning. We are, therefore, of opinion that the words information received from "a person accused of any offence" in s. 27 cannot be read to mean that he must be an accused when he gives the information but would include a person if he became subsequently an accused person, at the time when that statement is sought to be received in evidence against him.

So far as the further requirement of being in the custody of the police is concerned the words of the section are there. The object and reason of the rule, which excludes confessions and statements as inadmissible in evidence if they are made in the presence of or to police officers or where investigation is going on, is that there is likelihood of their having been obtained by unjustifiable means. The reason of the exception contained in s. 27 would appear to be that though they might have been improperly obtained, if a discovery of facts is made then there is great likelihood of the statements being true, and if this is so, it is difficult to see the reason or the sense of the rule requiring that when that statement is made the person who makes that statement should and ought to be in custody before it could be received in evidence. If the reason of admitting this statement is what I have stated before, it would be much more likely to be true when made by a person who is not in custody as it would be without any pressure at all and being voluntary cannot offend any rules of moral justice. One way out of the difficulty of the words in the statute would be to disregard those words as being superfluous and not intended by the Legislature in the sense in which they appear and that is the justifiable procedure. The other way is to read the words "even if" before the words "in the custody of police" which is also permissible to give sensible meaning to the section. James Stephen, the draftsman of the Indian Evidence Act, in his Introduction to the Indian Evidence Act while discussing confessions at page 165 of the 1892 edition (which is a reprint of the 1872 edition) says:—

"Admissions in reference to crimes are usually called confessions. I may observe upon the provisions relating to them that sections 25, 26, and 27 were transferred to the Evidence Act verbatim from the Code of Criminal Procedure, Act XXV of 1861."

Section 150 of the Criminal Procedure Code, Act XXV. of 1861, reads as under:—

"When any fact is deposed to by a police officer as discovered by him in consequence of information received from a person accused of any offence, so much of such information, whether it amounts to a confession or admission of guilt or not, as relates distinctly to the fact discovered by it, may be received in evidence."

It appears in 1869 in Act VIII of 1869 this section was modified by the addition of the words "or in the custody of a police officer" after the words "a person accused of any offence". If the intention was to reproduce the provisions contained in s. 150 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1861, it is apparent that the intention was to make the statements admissible even if a person were in custody. It appears, therefore, that it would be the better way of reading the provisions of the section which course is permissible in order to make the meaning of the section sensible. See Maxwell on Statutes pp. 236, 237 (9th edn.). If that is the correct view, then all these statements were made as a result of which facts mentioned were discovered and would, therefore, be admissible in evidence.

Even assuming however that it will not be permissible to disregard the words of the section or read "even if" as suggested then, we are clearly of the view that the case falls within the authority of cases *Santokhi Beldar v. King Emperor*⁷ and *Legal Remembrancer v. Lalit Mohan Singh Roy*⁸, with the conclusion of which we agree. The ratio of those cases is that where a person goes to a police officer and makes a statement which shows that an offence has been committed by him, he accuses himself and though he is formally not arrest-

ESTATE DUTY REFERENCE.

Estate Duty Act (XXXIV of 1953), Secs. 5, 12, 10—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. Ch. 30), Secs. 1, 2(b)—Settlement of property where interest reserved by settlor for life and settlement not taking effect as will—Lesser part of property i.e. interest reserved could pass by application of general rule laid down in s. 5—Whether whole of settled property to be deemed to pass—Applicability of s. 12—"Property passing on the death," definition of—Decisions of English Courts on analogous provisions of English law how far to be adhered to—Rule of construction relating to provisions of enactments in pari materia.

Section 12 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, lays down the special rule that in case of a settlement of any property with reservation to the settlor of any interest in such property for life, although less may pass by application of the general rule laid down in s. 5 of the Act (i.e. only the interest which was reserved), the whole of such property of the settlor, the subject-matter of the settlement in which he has reserved interest for life, must be deemed to pass on the settlor's death.

The object of the Legislature in enacting s. 12 of the Act was that where an interest, however small, is reserved by a settlor under any settlement not taking effect as a will for life or any other period determinable by reference to death, the whole of the property would be deemed to pass even though otherwise a lesser part thereof might pass, and that if he has reserved to himself the right by the exercise of any power to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property, the whole property would pass whether he has reserved any aliquot share in the income of any other interest in the property or not.

By a wakf-al-ulad certain properties were transferred to Mutavalls by the settlor, a Sunni Hanafi Mohammedan, who reserved for the maintenance during her lifetime 62½ per cent. of the net income of the property and the remaining income was given in certain proportion to her daughter and her children for their maintenance. Under this deed it was further provided that after the death of the settlor the entire income of the property was to be paid in certain proportion to her daughter and her children from generation to generation. There was, in the deed, an ultimate provision for the benefit of the poor or for any other purpose recognised by the Mussalman law as a religious, pious or charitable purpose of a permanent character. After the death of the settlor, the Collector of Estate Duty included all the properties in the estate duty assessment under s. 12 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953. On the question whether the entire Wakf property or only 62½ per cent. of the Wakf was chargeable to estate duty, it was contended that there was actual passing of the interest of the settlor on her death which was 62½ per cent. of the income of the properties, and that, therefore, the property that could be brought to estate duty under s. 5 of the Act could only be 62½ per cent. of the corpus and the fact that the case was wholly covered by the language and scope of s. 12 of the Act which expressly deals with such a settlement and such reservation of interest, was of no consequence:—

Held, that s. 12 in terms applied to the settlement in the case and, therefore, the entire Wakf property was chargeable to estate duty.

To ascertain whether a property has passed on the death of a person within the meaning of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, the comparison must be made between the persons beneficially interested the moment before the death and the persons so interested the moment after the death.

Sir S. E. Scott, Br., and Coutts and Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, referred to.

The scheme of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, is substantially the same as the scheme of the English Finance Act of 1894.

On analogous provisions of the Indian law unaffected by the specialities of the English law and on fundamental concepts and on broad general principles, decisions of Courts in England can be useful and of considerable guidance if utilised with due care and caution. Danger, however, lies in phrases used aptly enough in a particular context and opinions weighty and useful in their own sphere and context being treated as expressing doctrines of universal application or adopting those principles as riders to the actual statutory language. Rigid adherence to decisions of Courts in England must be deprecated and particularly when they have some bearing on the English law of property with its highly technical and overrefined rules affecting reality which operated when the English enactment came into force.

The rule of construction relating to provisions of enactments in pari materia is one of great convenience and aid from outside may legitimately be derived when any doubtful point of interpretation of any provision has to be solved. But reference to it simply on the ground of similarity has to be avoided.

THE facts appear fully in the judgment of S. T. Desai J.

S. T. DESAI J. This reference under the Estate Duty Act raises a question of considerable importance and interest affecting the levy of estate duty on property which may be the subject of a wakf-al-ulad. The settlement, we have to consider, was created by Aishabai, a wealthy Memon lady who was a Hanifa Mohammedan. The facts are simple and we shall only give a broad outline of the relevant facts supplementing it if occasion demands. The deed of wakf, which we shall presently examine, was made on March 31, 1951. It accords with the requirements of the statute on the subject. There is permanent dedication of property for the benefit of the poor and other purposes recognized by the Musalman law as religious, pious or a charitable purpose of a permanent character. The ultimate benefit to the charity is postponed until the extinction of the descendants of the Wakif. There is the usual provision relating to maintenance and support of the settlor during her life-time and for the maintenance and support of her family consisting of her daughter and the children of that daughter from generation to generation. Mutavallis were appointed, the settlor herself being one, and the property was conveyed and transferred to them. The property settled by the Wakifnama consisted of 12 immoveable properties of large value and a sum of Rs. 1 lac. It is the provisions for maintenance contained in the deed that have given rise to the dispute between the Revenue and those who represent the estate of Aishabai. The settlor reserved for her maintenance during her lifetime 62½ per cent. of the net income, 3½ per cent. of the income was given to her daughter Khatizabai for her maintenance and the remaining 34½ per cent. was given for the maintenance of Khatizabai's children, the share of each male child being double that of each female child. Clauses 5 and 6 of the deed are material and relate to reservation and dispositions after the demise of the settlor:

"5. From and after the demise of the Wakif, the Mutavalis shall out of the said 62½ per cent. of the net income hereinabove directed to be paid to the Wakif set apart 9½ per cent. and add the same to the said 3½ per cent. of the income hereinabove directed to be paid to the said Khatizabai and shall add the remaining 53½ per cent. to the said 34½ per cent. . . . to be distributed among the children of the said Khatizabai and their descendants so that after the death of the Wakif, 12½ per cent. of the nett income shall be paid to the said Khatizabai and the remaining 87½ per cent. of the nett income shall be distributed among the children and descendants of the said Khatizabai in the same manner and to the same extent as hereinabove mentioned in clauses 4(b) and 4(c) hereof for the benefit of the said Khatizabai and her children and their descendants respectively.

6. From and after the death of the survivor of them the Wakif and the said Khatizabai, the whole of the nett income shall be dealt with and distributed amongst the children of the said Khatizabai and their descendants in the same manner and to the same extent and in accordance with the same proportion and method of distribution as hereinabove mentioned in clause 4(c) hereof."

Reference may briefly be made to the sum of Rs. 1 lac settled by the deed. The Mutavalis were directed to credit that sum of Rs. 1 lac to an account called "Extraordinary heavy repair fund account" and invest the moneys so credited in such security or securities as they may think fit. The Mutavalis would be at liberty to make use of and apply the moneys to the credit of the said account as may be required.

Aishabai, the settlor, died on August 2, 1954. The Collector of Estate Duty included all the properties in the estate duty assessment under s. 12 of the Act. With regard to the sum of Rs. 1 lac also, he took the view that the sum was credited to an account as directed and the moneys had been invested in Government paper, but the income from the investment had been enjoyed by the deceased and her daughter and grand-children in the same proportion in which they enjoyed the income from the settled properties. Being of that view, he assessed that sum of Rs. 1 lac also to duty under s. 12 of the Act. The matter was carried in appeal to the Central Board of Revenue. The contentions which are pressed before us were raised by the parties before the Board and we shall presently examine them. The Board rejected the appeal and the applicant has come before us on this reference.

The question we are asked to determine is:

"Whether in the facts and circumstances of the case, the entire Wakf property (including the sum of Rs. 1 lakh) or only 62½ per cent. of the Wakf is chargeable to estate duty?"

On this question, numerous points arise for discussion. To state it without refinement, the principal and the crucial question is what property passed on the death of the settlor? The contention in the fore-front of the argument of Mr. Palkhivala, learned counsel for the applicant, has been that there was actual passing of the interest of Aishabai, the settlor, on her death. That interest being 62½ per cent. of the income, the property that can be brought to death duty can only be 62½ per cent. of the corpus and not the whole of it as held by the Board. Reliance has been placed on s. 5 of the Act and the main argument is that s. 12 on which the Revenue has taken its stand—and which is one of the provisions relating to "property which is deemed to pass"—has been erroneously applied by the Board. The archstone of the contention is that the law on the subject laid down in ss. 1 and 2(b) of the English Finance Act, 1894, which deals with estate duty is the same as laid down in the relevant provisions of our Estate Duty Act and in support of the contention counsel has relied on certain decisions of Courts in England and particularly on the case of *Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioners*¹. The contention of the Revenue is that the whole corpus passed on the demise of Aishabai. It is urged that the decision of Courts in England on the question are on sections which are not wholly similar and what is stressed is that though a number of provisions of the English enactment have been adopted in the Estate Duty Act, the scheme of the latter enactment is different. It will facilitate the appreciation of the rival contentions if we start with an examination of the scheme of our Act. Before turning to the decisions of Courts in England very strongly relied on by Mr. Palkhivala, it seems convenient and indeed necessary to gather the meaning and effect of the relevant provisions of our Act read in their proper context and having regard to the scheme of the Act. The material language of the sections has always in these matters to be borne in mind before seeking aid and guidance from observations made in the course of interpretation of analogous provisions even though they are in pari materia. Of this more hereafter.

To turn to the scheme of the Act and the provisions with which we are mainly concerned on this reference. The estate duty is imposed by s. 5, which is the charging section and the relevant part of it is in the following terms:

"5. (1) In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, settled or not settled, including agricultural land situate in the States specified in the First Schedule to this Act, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called 'estate duty' at the rates fixed in accordance with section 35."

The section applies to the case of every person dying after the Act came into operation. It speaks of the imposition of levy and payment of the same which is to be upon the principal value of property to be ascertained in accordance with certain other provisions of the Act. It embraces property settled as well as not settled and it touches property on the death of a person. The expression "property" is defined in s. 2(15) as including "any interest in property, movable or immovable, the proceeds of sale thereof and any money or investment for the time being representing the proceeds of sale and also includes any property converted from one species into another by any method;"

The expression "settled property" is defined in s. 2(19) to mean:

"Property which stands limited to, or in trust for, any persons, natural or juridical, by way of succession, whether the settlement took effect before or after the commencement of this Act;"

The expression "Property passing on the death" has been defined in s. 2(16) which is as under:

"'Property passing on the death' includes property passing either immediately, on the death or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and 'on the death' includes 'at a period ascertainable only by reference to the death';"

It will be noticed that the word "passing" has not been defined in the Act, and what is the meaning of the word "passing" is perhaps the only point about which there is no controversy in this reference. Learned counsel for the applicant and learned counsel for the Revenue are agreed that the meaning of the expression "passing" in the Indian enactment is the same as has been given to that word in decisions of Courts in England. It is clear that the expression "passing" is not used in the Act in any technical sense. It has been held that the very general word "passes" is not a technical word but one capable of the widest possible meaning and has been used as language to be understood by ordinary people and not in a technical sense. Again it has been said that the expression "passing on death" which is not further defined is evidently used to denote some actual change in the title or possession of the property as a whole which takes place at the death. It has also been said that changing of hands may convey the meaning of passing of property. The oft-quoted meaning of this expression is this: To ascertain whether a property had passed, the comparison must be made between the persons beneficially interested the moment before the death, and the persons so interested the moment after the death. This definition given by Lord Russell in a House of Lords case has not been improved upon by any Judge, and with respect, the identical expression in our enactment has the same meaning.

The purpose and object of Parliament was to impose a levy on property passing on death of a person, and Parliament being fully conscious of human ingenuity and devices that might be adopted to avoid the operation of the imposition has proceeded to lay down a catena of rules headed "property which is deemed to pass". This has been done in sections which immediately follow s. 5. It will suffice at this stage to state some of those sections (6 to 16) to gather an idea of the scheme of the Act and while doing so we shall set out ss. 9, 10 and 12 on which certain arguments have been advanced before us:

"6. Property within disposing capacity.—Property which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose of shall be deemed to pass on his death.

7. (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, property in which the deceased or any other person had a interest ceasing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to pass on the deceased's death to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest, including, in particular, a coparcenary interest in the joint family property of a Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara, Marumakkattayam or Altyasantana law.

8. Gifts mortis causa.—Property taken as a gift made in contemplation of death shall be deemed to pass on the donor's death.

9. Gifts within a certain period before death.—(1) Property taken under a disposition made by the deceased purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, settlement upon persons in succession, or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made two years or more before the death of the deceased shall be deemed to pass on the death:...

(2) The provisions of sub-section (1) shall not apply to gifts made in consideration of marriage or which are proved to the satisfaction of the Controller to have been part of the normal expenditure of the deceased, but not exceeding rupees five thousand in the aggregate.

10. Gifts whenever made where donor not entirely excluded.—Property taken under any gift, whenever made, shall be deemed to pass on the donor's death to the extent that bona fide possession and enjoyment of it was not immediately assumed by the donee and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise:

12. Settlements with reservation.—(1) Property passing under any settlement made by the deceased by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property shall be deemed to pass on the settlor's death:

Provided that the property shall not be deemed to pass on the settlor's death by reason only that any such interest or right was so reserved if by means of the surrender of such interest or right the property is subsequently enjoyed to the entire exclusion of the settlor and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, for at least two years before his death.

Explanation.—A settlor reserving an interest in the settled property for the maintenance of himself and any of his relatives (as defined in section 27) shall be deemed to reserve an interest for himself within the meaning of this section.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1) where property is settled by a person on one or more other persons for their respective lives and after their death, on the settlor for life and thereafter on other persons and the settlor dies before his interest in the property becomes an interest in possession, the property shall not be deemed to pass on the settlor's death within the meaning of this section.

13. Joint investments.—Where a person, having been absolutely entitled to any property or to the funds with which any property was purchased, has caused it to be transferred to or vested in himself and any other person jointly, whether by disposition or otherwise, either by himself alone, or in concert, or by arrangement, with any other person so that the beneficial interest in some part of that property passes or accrues by survivorship on his death to the other person, the whole of that property shall be deemed to pass on the death."

Section 11 deals with limited interest disposed of within a certain period before death. Section 14 deals with policies kept up for a donee. Section 15 relates to annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased. Section 16 relates to annuity or other interest purchased or provided out of property derived from the deceased. Section 17 brings within the field of taxation property transferred to a controlled company. Although, the ss. 6 to 16 were headed "property which is deemed to pass" and proceeded to embrace all types of property and interest in property, there was no express provision in the Act when enacted in 1953 that duty was leviable on property deemed to pass. A plain reading of s. 5 would have meant that the section only touched property which would ordinarily pass on the death of a person under the general law. In a taxing statute this was a serious lacuna and that was amended by the Finance Act of 1954 by adding sub-s. (3) to s. 3:

"For the avoidance of doubt, it is hereby declared that references in this Act to property passing on the death of a person shall be construed as including references to property deemed to pass on the death of such person."

We have examined the scheme of the English enactment and it will be convenient here to dispose of the argument urged on behalf of the Revenue that the scheme of our Estate Duty Act is different from that of the English Finance Act of 1894. Section 5 of the Estate Duty Act is in pari materia with s. 1 of the English statute. Section 2 of that enactment deals with what property is deemed to pass and the initial words are: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say..." Then follow a series of clauses the language of which has been substantially adopted in similar provisions relating to "Property which is deemed to pass" enacted in ss. 6 to 16 of our Act. The reason for enacting s. 3(3) becomes manifest when it is noticed that in the English enactment the initial words of s. 2 clearly brought out the operation of the provisions relating to property deemed to pass. It is not necessary to go into a detailed comparison of all the relevant provisions of the enactments and it will suffice to observe that the scheme of the two enactments is substantially the same. Certain provisions of the two enactments particularly those to which reference has been made in the argument before us and with which we are here concerned are also substantially the same. They are in pari materia. Section 9 of our Act corresponds to s. 38(2)(a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881. Certain provisions of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, were incorporated by reference in s. 2(1)(c) of the Finance Act of 1894. Section 10 of our enactment also has a corresponding provision in the English Act. Section 12 of our Act corresponds with s. 38(2)(c) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1882, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889. Section 13 of our Act corresponds to certain provisions in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act mentioned above. The wording of the relevant sections in the English enactment has been freely, and in most cases bodily, adopted in the Estate Duty Act. On analogous provisions of the Indian law unaffected by the specialities of the English law and on fundamental concepts and on broad general principles, decisions of Courts in England, can, therefore, be useful and of considerable guidance if utilised with due care and caution. While we do not accede to the argument of Mr. Joshi that the scheme of the two Acts is different, we agree that the provisions of our Act must be understood in their background and setting, and in interpreting them regard must be had to the conditions, customs and religious beliefs of those affected by the provisions. In a branch of the law, rules of which are inspired by the broad general principles of the English law on the subject and are so adopted as to be in pari materia, reference to the decisions under that law can be of great importance. Danger, however, lies in phrases used aptly enough, no doubt, in a particular context and opinions weighty and useful in their own sphere and context being treated as expressing doctrines of universal application or adopting those principles as riders to the actual statutory language. The rule of construction relating to provisions of enactments in pari materia is one of great convenience and aid from outside may legitimately be derived when any doubtful point of interpretation of any provision has to be solved. But reference to it simply on the ground of similarity has to be avoided. Rigid adherence to any of those decisions must be deprecated and particularly when they have some bearing on the English law of property with its highly technical and overrefined rules affecting realty which operated when the English enactment came into force.

It is well settled that it is incumbent on the Revenue to establish that its claim comes within the very words used and the subject cannot be taxed unless there are words clear enough to impose taxation. The presumption is that the Parliament has granted precisely that tax to the Revenue which it has described and no more. The burden is upon the Revenue to bring the subject within a charge. This does not mean that there has to be any discrimination against the Revenue or deliberate weighing in favour of the subject. The observations of Rowlatt J. so often quoted in income-tax matters are appropriate to the subject of death-duty and have been cited with approval by the House of Lords in England as equally applicable in Estate Duty cases:

"In a taxing Act one has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment. There is no equity about a tax. There is no presumption as to a tax. Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used."

Nor is there anything like an equitable construction of a statute. It has often been said, and this Court also has often said, that in a taxing statute, we have no governing principles to look at. We have simply to go on the Act itself and see whether the levy claimed under it is that which Parliament has enacted. It is not for us to approach the case with considerations of what is fair and what is equitable or permissible. Of course, the Court will not readily accept that any glaring injustice could have been intended by the law-maker. One safe guide is to see what is the meaning of the words used in the statute when they are plain and unambiguous and do not lead to ambiguity or repugnance. The safest and infallible guide to the interpretation of any legislation is to gather all that the Legislature itself has thought necessary to say about the matter or subject.

It is in the light of these observations that we shall in the first instance proceed to read the vital clauses of the statute relevant to our enquiry and see if we can ascertain the intention of the law-maker in enacting ss. 5 and 12 uninfluenced by any extrinsic evidence. Now, we have already set out s. 3(3) and ss. 5 and 12 of the Act and it is evident that for the purpose of the present reference, they must be read together. It will be convenient to write out the material part of s. 5 with the rule of interpretation enacted in sub-s. (3) of s. 3 and then consider it with s. 12. In that way, the material part of s. 5 would read as under:

"In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Act, there shall ...be levied and paid upon the principal value ascertained...of all property, settled or not settled...which passes on the death of such person—including property deemed to pass on the death of that person—a duty called 'estate duty' at the rates fixed in accordance with section 35."

Sections 5 to 17 are in Part II of the Act and that Part is headed "Imposition of Estate Duty." The heading of s. 5 is "extent of charge" and the heading of ss. 6 to 16 is "property which is deemed to pass." One thing is clear from the incorporation of sub-s. (3) of s. 3 by the amendment made in 1954 that any of the provisions relating to property which is deemed to pass have to be read along with s. 5, and not in any manner divorced from s. 5 or in water-tight compartments. So read, s. 12, to our mind, is plain legislation. There is no ambiguity about it; there is no repugnance about it and there is no expression in it which can be said to cause any difficulty of interpretation, or any doubt about the intention of the law-maker. Read in the context of s. 5, the only meaning that can be given to the part of it relevant for the purpose of this reference seems to us to be this: In case of any settlement made by the deceased by a non-testamentary instrument in respect of any property if the settlor has reserved any interest in such property for life, his absolute interest in such property would be deemed to pass on his death. It is clear that the Legislature has in enacting this section ruled that where in case of settlement of any property made by the settlor he has reserved to himself any interest in such property for life, not merely the interest so reserved, but the whole of such property in which that interest was reserved shall be deemed to pass on his death. We put this to learned counsel for the applicant and the answer was that the language of the corresponding provisions in the English enactment is in pari materia and the general proposition which he has advanced for our acceptance is equally applicable to the provisions of s. 12. It is said that if that general proposition is right, then s. 12 would not govern this case. We shall presently examine that general proposition which is to the effect that if a case falls directly under s. 5 and there is actual passing there is no scope for applying any of the 'deeming' provisions. In the absence of any overriding principle or compelling authority the conclusion would be irresistible that the Legislature has laid down in s. 12 the special rule that in case of a settlement of any property with reservation although less may pass by application of the general rule laid down in s. 5 (only interest which was reserved) the whole of such property of the settlor the subject-matter of the settlement in which he has reserved any interest for life, shall none the less be deemed to pass. The language of the section and the plain, fair and literal meaning of it does not present any doubt or difficulty. We have, therefore, to see if there is any overriding principle which requires that we should depart from the cardinal rule of interpretation according to which the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to unless that would lead to some absurdity or some repugnance or some inconsistency with the rest of the enactment.

The principal contention pressed before us by Mr. Palkhivala, learned counsel for the applicant, is that distinction has to be drawn between "actual passing" of property or any interest in such property and "deemed passing of property". In the former case, it is said, s. 5 must be applied to the exclusion of any of the provisions relating to all property which is deemed to pass under any of the ss. 6 to 16; and this must be so even if the case falls wholly within the ambit of any such provision contained in any of those sections. If the property or any part of the property passes on death, it is not permissible to refer to any of those sections—no matter what they say—because they speak only of what is deemed to have passed. The argument is that in the Act there are two categories of rules: the provisions in s. 5; the other the provisions of ss. 6 to 16; and the two categories, it is emphasised, are mutually exclusive. It has been urged that where under a settlement like the one before us, a specific percentage of income—an aliquot share of the income—of the property is reserved to the settlor under a settlement made by him, what can be brought to charge is not the absolute interest which the settlor had in that property but only a proportionate part of the corpus. Here, the specific percentage of the income reserved was 62½ per cent. and, therefore, 62½ per cent. of the property can be brought to charge under s. 5. The fact that the case is wholly covered by the language and scope of s. 12 which expressly deals with such a settlement and such reservation of interest, it is said, is of no consequence.

The whole argument has rested on the decision of the House of Lords in Earl Cowley's case on which counsel has heavily leaned and we shall now turn to examine the facts of that case and state the ratio decidendi of it. In that case, father and son, tenant for life and tenant in tail respectively, executed a disentailing deed by which they granted the estate to a trustee to hold freed from the estate tail to such uses as they should jointly appoint. In exercise of that power father and son mortgaged the estate in fee simple to a company to secure a loan part of which was advanced for the benefit of the father and part for the benefit of the son. With part of the loan prior incumbrances on the father's life estate were paid off, and the company took an assignment of the debts and all the assignor's rights and powers of recovery as further security for the loan. Father and son then executed a deed of resettlement by which the estates were charged with an annuity to the son payable during the father's life and subject thereto were declared to be held in trust for the father for life and after his death for the son for life with remainders over. Upon the father's death in 1895, the Crown claimed from the son under the Finance Act, 1894, estate duty upon the gross value of the estates without allowing any deduction in respect either of the mortgage to the company or of the annuity which ceased with the father's life. It was held that the settlement which passed to the son on the father's death was not the entire estate but only the equity of redemption and the estate duty was, therefore, payable only on the equity of redemption. The ratio decidendi of that case evidently is that in case of a deed of settlement of the nature which was under consideration, if there were prior encumbrances and an annuity reserved what would pass on the death of the annuitant cannot be the whole estate but only the equity of redemption. In the course of his speech in that case Lord Macnaghten, however, made certain observations which dicta have been considered thereafter in a number of cases. Since so much reliance has been placed on the dicta of Lord Macnaghten in that case, we shall first turn to the observations made by that eminent Law Lord at pp. 212-213 of the report:

"...But s. 2 does not apply to an interest in property which passes on the death of the deceased. That is already dealt with in the earlier section. For property in the lifetime of the deceased subject to a charge or interest which ceased on the death must of course pass free from that charge or interest. And, so passing, it must of course be valued accordingly. That is s. 1. You do not want s. 2 for that. You cannot resort to s. 2. For that would be giving the duty twice over. The Crown cannot have it both ways. Double duty is forbidden by the Act."

Lord Davey agreed in that case with the views expressed by Lord Macnaghten as to the construction of the Act. Lord Chancellor Lord Halsbury observed at p. 207:

"I see no ground for dealing with s. 2, since, for the reasons I have given, I think it is s. 1 to which you must look to see what property real or personal, settled or not settled, passed upon the death of the second to the third Earl; but if I were compelled to give a construction to s. 2 sub-s. 1(b), I should come to the same conclusion in respect of the liability to duty, since I think the benefit accruing or arising to the third Earl was only to the extent of the value of the equity of redemption. But, as I have said, the question must be determined on s. 1 alone."

It will be seen that the Lord Chancellor did not express any view as to the dicta of Lord Macnaghten and confined his opinion strictly to the question whether the duty could be imposed on the whole estate or only on the equity of redemption. Lord Morris also in his speech confined his opinion to the question of equity of redemption passing on the death of the father. Lord Shand also in that case confined his opinion to the same point. It is the dicta of Lord Macnaghten that have been relied upon by Mr. Palkhivala. Now, the history of those dicta of Lord Macnaghten is very interesting and requires to be noted. But before we do so, it will be convenient if we refer to cases to which our attention was drawn by learned counsel on

Section 1 and sub-s. 1(b) of s. 2 of the English enactment all consideration in *Christie v. The Lord Advocate*². In Earl Cowley the sections under consideration were s. 1 and sub-s. 1(b) of s. 2 of the Report, Lord Russell of Killowen referred to the dicta of Lord Macnaghten in Cowley's case and observed that the property which passed on death in that case fell within the ambit of s. 1 of the Act. It was also cited for the purpose of showing that a percentage of income of the subject-matter of the settlement, can be reserved by a settlor necessary that he should reserve to himself any specific parcel of the subject-matter of the trust-deed, to invite the operation of Northcliffe In re: *Arnholme v. Hudson*³ was another decision. That case was also cited for the purpose of showing that a specific percentage of income as residuary may be reserved by a settlor in the settlement of the trust and it was not necessary that any specific parcel of the subject-matter should be reserved.

Another case to which our attention was drawn by Mr. Palkhivala of Norfolk, In re: Public Trustee v. Inland Revenue Commission of that case were somewhat peculiar. One continuing annuity was charged on that property of the annuitant. The dicta of Lord Macnaghten were considered by the Court of Appeal. It was held that an annuity charged on property, nor is it equivalent to an interest in proportion of the capital charged sufficient to produce its yearly amount on the annuitant and the Crown is not entitled to charge duty under s. 38(2)(c) of capital ascertained by means of calculations on the lines prescribed in sub-s. (7). Our attention has been drawn by counsel to observations of the learned Lord Justices and particularly of Lord Macnaghten. Those observations do not carry the matter any further. We point out what Dymond in his treatise on Death Duties has to say on the application of the dicta of Lord Macnaghten to cases of joint tenancies and other provisions where property is deemed to pass.

Before reverting to Cowley's case, we may refer to certain observations of Green's work on Death Duties at p. 127 which were relied on

"If the property actually passes on the settlor's death, duty is payable under s. 38(2)(c) is not in point. Thus in Inland Revenue v. Angus's Trustees settled property on trust during his life to pay an annuity to his wife for life; and after his death, in the events that happened, it passed to the wife for life. It was held that the whole of the settled property passed under s. 1."

There is nothing in these observations of Green which support the observations of Mr. Palkhivala. It is true that the dicta of Lord Macnaghten in Cowley's case were applied in England in some cases where question arose of the application of sub-s. 1(b) of s. 2. But the application of the dichotomy of Lord Macnaghten has not been carried further than that.

There are observations of Lord Dunedin in Attorney-General v. The Trustees of the Scottish Widows' Fund which are very instructive on the question before us and we mention them in extenso (pp. 774-775):

"The paramount enacting section of the Act is undoubtedly to be s. 38(2)(c). The duty which it is the object of the Act to levy is imposed on property, settled or not settled, which 'passes' on the death of any person on the commencement of the Act. Now, although the word 'passes' is what I consider a rather vague word, it is so naturally associated with the idea of 'from the death' so directs attention to the death of a person who leaves propthat had that section stood alone it is reasonably clear that much property would have escaped which the framers of the Act wished to tax. Accordingly we have s. 2. That section was authoritatively discussed in your Lordships' House in the case of Earl Cowley. Whether Lord Macnaghten was strictly correct or not in saying that the two sections were mutually exclusive seems to me to matter little. At any rate—and that is all that is material—s. 2 sweeps into the net various things which s. 1 would have failed to secure, or as Lord Watson put it in the case of Attorney-General v. Beech,⁵ 'it extends it to all cases where a survivor of the deceased takes a succession, or I should say rather, derives a benefit by reason of the death of the deceased dependant upon and emerging upon the death of the deceased.'

How does s. 2 do this? It does not do it by being conceived in the words of a taxing section imposing the duty on certain specified kinds of property. It does it by saying that property passing on the death of the deceased—which is already taxed by virtue of s. 1—shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say—and then follow the various sub-sections.

It seems to me that that is as much as to say that the words, 'property passing on the death', in the 1st section, are to be read as if the words, 'including the property following, that is to say'—(and then all the sub-sections)—had been there inserted. In other words, I do not think that any one can criticize Lord Macnaghten because in Cowley's case he talks of property being 'deemed to pass,' although that expression is not actually used. The net result is that the expression, 'property which passes', in the 1st section, must include property which is deemed to pass by virtue of the 2nd section—for s. 1 is the only taxing section."

We have already made some observations on s. 3(3) of our Act and the effect of that section. We have also pointed that s. 5 is to be read as if ss. 6 to 16 had been inserted in it. The observations of Lord Dunedin, though extremely guarded, are pertinent to the question before us and this much is clear that Lord Dunedin for himself was not prepared to subscribe to the view that ss. 1 and 2 of the English enactment were mutually exclusive.

In a number of other cases observations were made about the dicta of Lord Macnaghten, but it is not necessary to burden this judgment with all those observations. We shall refer to only some of those observations.

In the case of Sanderson v. Inland Revenue Comrs.,⁶ Lord Radcliffe struck a discordant note and found himself unable to agree with the dicta of Lord Macnaghten. He also quoted there certain observations of Lord Haldane in another case to the following effect:

"The principle is contained in s. 1. Section 2 combines definitions of such property with the extension of the application of the principle laid down in s. 1 to certain cases which are not in reality cases of changing hands on death at all..."

He also quoted an observation of Lord Haldane L.C., in Attorney-General v. M'Innes. The observation of Lord Haldane was:

"Section 2 is thus not a definition section but an independent section operating outside the field of s. 1."

Lord Radcliffe wound up his observations on the dicta of Lord Macnaghten by observing:

"I think that we may safely resign these passages to the list of the many minor mysteries of the law."

The passages referred to by Lord Radcliffe are the passages which we have quoted. But the suggestion is that the observations made in those passages were not in harmony with the dicta of Lord Macnaghten and those dicta may desirably be forgotten.

The question cropped up once again in a very recent case before the Court of appeal in Public Trustees v. Inland Revenue Commissioner.⁷ That also we may point out was a case not under cl. (1)(a) of s. 2 or cl. (1)(c) or cl. (1)(d) of s. 2 but cl. (1)(b) of s. 2. Lord Evershed M.R. it seems was considerably impressed with the arguments which went counter to the dicta of Lord Macnaghten. He observes at p. 722 of the report:

"It cannot, I think, be disputed that the argument of counsel for the trustee has formidable and attractive points in its support."

The argument put forward on behalf of the trustees was characterised by the Master of the Rolls as a forceful contention. He also referred to the opinion expressed by Lord Radcliffe in the case to which we have already referred, but ultimately agreed with the view of Jenkins L.J. in Duke of Norfolk in re: that it was not open to the Court to depart from the construction placed on s. 1 and s. 2 over fifty years ago by the House of Lords in Earl Cowley's case. The Master of the Rolls has also observed in this most recent case that on well recognised principles, it would not be right for the Court of Appeal to treat the matter as thrown open by Lord Radcliffe's observation since Lord Macnaghten's speech had been hallowed by those who practised in this branch of the law. He also added that the Court of Appeal was bound by the view expressed in the speech of Lord Macnaghten.

To go back to Cowley's case. Dymond in the 12th edn. of his well-known treatise observes at p. 58:

"Usually, property of which the deceased was competent to dispose actually passes on his death within the meaning of s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, and it has been laid down by the House of Lords that in such cases Estate Duty is payable under s. 1 and not under s. 2(1)(a) of the Act, the latter subsection only applying to property of which the deceased was competent to dispose but which does not actually pass on his death... This is not of much practical importance, since the charge for duty under s. 1 and s. 2(1)(a) is normally the same, and, as regards accountability, the executor is accountable under the Finance Act, 1894..."

At p. 53 there are some pertinent observations made by Dymond. After referring to the principle in Cowley's case, he states:

"...The principle has been applied... to cases of continuing annuities, where the liability to duty of the annuity itself under s. 1 was held to preclude liability to duty under s. 2(1)(b) of the property on which it was charged... It is not altogether clear how far the repercussions of this principle extend."

Dymond observes at p. 94:

"Except where annuities subsisted during the life of a deceased life-tenant, the distinction between s. 1 and s. 2(1)(b) is rarely of practical importance, for the combined effect of s. 2(1)(b) and s. 7(7) of the Act is that the property or 'slice' of property, to which the ceasing interest extended, is not only deemed to pass but is taxed on the same basis as if it actually passed."

It is to be noted that the practical importance of the distinction drawn between s. 1 and s. 2(1)(b) is regarded in England as of little practical importance. It is now treated as of theoretical rather than practical importance. Again at p. 104, Dymond observes in examining the distinction between s. 1 and s. 2(1)(b):

"...It is not entirely clear how far this principle goes, but it does not apply to a life interest in an aliquot share of income..."

There is a case to which we have so far not made any reference and that is the case of *Attorney-General v. Earl Grey*⁸. Mr. Palkhivala himself drew our attention to this case and observed that presumably the Department would strongly rely on the same. In that case s. 38(2)(c) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (and which corresponds to s. 12 of our Act) came up for consideration and at p. 325 of the Report Channel J. said that any reservation of interest however small was sufficient to bring the property within the ambit of s. 38(2)(c) provided the interest issued out of that property. Much has been said about Grey's case in some later decisions in England, but it is not necessary for us to go in any detail over the matter.

At p. 185 Dymond refers to the case of Hey's Settlement Trusts, In re: *Hey v. Nickell-Lean*⁹. In that case the deceased on his marriage settled property on trust to pay the income to his wife for life and on her death for himself for life with an ultimate trust for his children and it was provided that the income paid to the wife was to be used for household expenses and management. The marriage lasted fifty-seven years and the whole income was in fact applied by the wife for her personal purposes. The Court of Appeal confirmed the decision of the Court of first instance and held that on the facts the husband had reserved an interest for his life and Estate Duty was payable under s. 2(1)(c) of the Finance Act, 1894. We have already mentioned that s. 2(1)(c) incorporates in s. 2 inter alia the provisions of s. 38(1)(c) of the earlier Customs and Inland Revenue Act and substantially corresponds to our s. 12.

There is considerable force in the argument tersely and ably pressed for our acceptance by Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, that there is no warrant for introducing in the relevant provisions of our Act—particularly in view of s. 3(3)—the concept of mutually exclusive categories as stated in the dicta in Earl Cowley's case and that on a proper construction of ss. 5 and 12 read together that which is notional passing of property must be treated for all purposes as actual passing of property on death of the settlor. We agree with counsel that the correct approach to the whole matter should be to “look at the Deed of Waqf; look at the disposition; and see under what section the case falls.”

Even the obiter dicta of such an eminent Judge and legal luminary as Lord Macnaghten are entitled to very great respect. In this Court we have read the speeches of Lord Macnaghten with very great respect for the exposition of jurisprudential concepts by that great Judge. But in the case before us we must read his dicta in Lord Cowley's case in the light of all that has been said about them in subsequent years and without in any manner digressing from the language of our enactment.

Now, the ratio decidendi of Cowley's case is that in case of a settlement made by a tenant for life and a tenant in tail of property on which prior incumbrances exist what passes on the death of the tenant for life is not the entire estate but only the equity of redemption and estate duty is payable only on the equity of redemption under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894. The celebrated dichotomy between s. 1 and s. 2(1), it is true, is ‘enshrined’ in the speech of Lord Macnaghten. But the dicta should be confined to a case under s. 1 and s. 2(1)(b) of the English enactment. They were certainly not made in considering or in the context of the other sub-clauses in s. 2. But that is how Mr. Palkhivala wants us to read the English decisions. It has been observed that there are formidable considerations which support the other view that s. 1 and s. 2(1)(b) are not mutually exclusive. In the case reported in Public Trustee v. I. B. Comrs., Lord Evershed speaks of the well-recognised principle of finality for feeling compelled to reach the conclusion that the applicability of the dicta should not be disturbed. The concept is akin to the doctrine of stare decisis.

In this state of the law on the point in England we do not think we would be justified in constraining ourselves to adhere to the binary classification of Lord Macnaghten. It seems impermissible to us to accept that dicta as applicable to all cases of property deemed to pass. In any case there is no warrant for extending that dichotomy even assuming it is to be introduced in interpreting the Finance Act—in our opinion, respectfully, that should not be done—to cases of settlements with reservations which evidently fall under s. 12 of the Act. It is not for us to express any opinion on what is in England a debatable matter, nor is it necessary for us to prefer one view or the other as between the celebrated dicta of Lord Macnaghten on the one hand and on the other hand the contrary view expressed by Lord Radcliffe—to some lawyers in England that view may perhaps seem somewhat radical—when he observed that the time-honoured dicta must be resigned "to the list of many minor mysteries of the law". The observations of Lord Dunedin, which we have quoted in extenso, seem to us to be a surer foundation for cases which fall for determination under s. 12 of our enactment. Section 12, as we read it with the Explanation to it, sweeps wholly into the net of s. 5 property the subject-matter of settlements with reservation there indicated and particularly waqfs of the nature before us.

There is another and an important aspect of the same matter. The argument of Mr. Palkhivala, when analysed comes to this:—(1) The provisions of the two Acts are in pari materia: It is now accepted law in England that s. 1 and s. 2(1)(b) are mutually exclusive; (2) Section 2(1)(b) is a provision relating to property to be deemed to pass on death; (3) the other provisions of s. 2(1)(a), 2(1)(c) and 2(1)(d) are also provisions relating to property to be deemed to pass on death. Therefore, the moment it is shown that in a given case there is actual passing, of the property, none of the provisions relating to property to be deemed to pass can have any application. They must be excluded from consideration because ss. 1 and 2(1)(b) are mutually exclusive. There can be many answers to this syllogism of which the premises themselves are highly debatable. We shall only mention one or two answers since we are only concerned with the interpretation of s. 12 of our Act read with s. 5 of it. Firstly, no such analogy is really permissible in interpretation of statutes. Secondly, the argument assumes many points. Section 12 speaks of property to be deemed to pass and it is of vital importance to note what is it that is to be deemed to pass. The expression "deemed" is used a great deal in many modern statutes and for many purposes. It is at times used to give a special glossary or paraphrase to an expression or an artificial construction to a word or a phrase. It is at times used to introduce artificial conceptions which are intended to go beyond settled legal principles. It is at times used to remove uncertainty or leave no scope for doubts and debates which may involve refined and ingenious points. At times it is used to give extended or restricted operation to a rule which cannot be given to it if it be read as enacted. This last is of considerable importance when the Legislature lays down a rule the extent and operation of which according to ordinary canons of construction would be confined—we shall take an illustration close to the case before us—to property or interest in property of a particular nature or type or class and the intention is that the rule should have wider extent and embrace more than what it states. In such a case the Legislature may well lay down and add that more than what is stated in the rule shall be deemed to be included in the meaning and concept of the words or phrase used in the rule. In such a case the language of the rule notwithstanding the operation and extent of it is widened by the 'deeming' provision. This is precisely what the Legislature has done by enacting s. 12 and the ambit of s. 5, the charging section, has been expressly extended by s. 3(3) to include what is stated in s. 12. We may quote the following observations of the Supreme Court, although they are made in a different context in The State of Bombay v. Pandurang Vinayak Chaphalkar.¹⁰

"...When a statute enacts that something shall be deemed to have been done, which in fact and truth was not done, the Court is entitled and bound to ascertain for what purposes and between what persons the statutory fiction is to be resorted to and full effect must be given to the statutory fiction and it should be carried to its logical conclusion" (p. 778).

Their Lordships of the Supreme Court went on to quote a passage from a judgment of Lord Asquith which has already become locus classicus. It is not necessary in the present context to reproduce that passage.

There is no overriding principle to be spelt out from the decisions of Courts in England under the analogous legislation, and s. 12 of the Estate Duty Act read with section 5 must lead to the inescapable conclusion that the statutory fiction laid down in it must be resorted to and full effect must be given to the language employed. The language does not point to any binary classification. There is no reason why we should deliberately impose upon ourselves any construction of the nature pressed for our acceptance by Mr. Palkhivala. In the course of the arguments before us we put it to Mr. Palkhivala that if his contention were accepted no case of a settlement of the nature before us would invite the operation of s. 12 however large or however small the interest reserved for life by the settlor may be and the answer was that such would be the position wherever there was any actual passing of interest howsoever slight it may be. We do not think that the contention is sound. Nor do we think that the decisions so strongly relied on point to any such broad general principle applicable to all the provisions of our Act enacted in ss. 6 to 16 and in particular s. 12. The intention of the law-maker has been expressed in language of sufficient clarity and precision and effect must be given to it. There is neither principle nor authority for departing from the fundamental rule of interpretation and we see no reason for doing so and launching into a sea of difficulties not easy to fathom. The sure conclusion seems to us to be that s. 12 wholly governs the case before us.

Another contention urged before us by learned counsel for the applicant was that s. 10 and not s. 12 should apply to the settlement before us. The argument here was rather feeble and somewhat involved. It was said that s. 9 in dealing with gifts includes any category of gifts inter vivos, actual gifts as well as those made through the instrumentality of trusts and settlements. Now, s. 9 cannot possibly be relied upon as foundation for any argument of the nature before us. That section clubs under one heading gifts and settlements which are not made bona fide and settlements which are made two years or more before the death of the deceased. Section 10, which we have already set out in the earlier part of our judgment, deals with gifts whenever made where the donor is not entirely excluded. It is true that to an extent ss. 10 and 12 may be overlapping. But in the case before us, as we shall presently point out, reference to s. 10 is impermissible. The argument has proceeded in this way: In s. 9 declarations of trusts and settlement upon persons in succession are dealt with under the head of gifts inter vivos. Therefore, in s. 10 gifts must be read in the same manner that is as including settlements and therefore, s. 10 must be read as applicable both to gifts and settlements with reservation.

The next step of this chain of argument is that since s. 10 must be read as dealing with settlements and since s. 12 also deals with settlements, ss. 10 and 12 apply to all cases of settlements and on those premises the ultimate argument is that the general principle of lighter burden should be applied to the present case. In England the view has been expressed that when on the same facts a case falls under two provisions, the option lies with the Crown to exclude benefit under the provisions imposing lighter duty and proceed under the provision which imposes a larger levy. Mr. Palkhivala has, however, relied on the principle favoured in decisions under the Indian Income-tax Act where it has been laid down that where on the same facts an assessee is liable to be taxed under two separate provisions, tax to be imposed upon him should be under the provisions which impose a lighter tax. In the case before us it is not necessary for us to express any opinion on this question in the context of estate duty since the view we take is that the whole argument is untenable. The argument wholly ignores the position that we are dealing in this case with a wakf-al-ulad and it is impossible to see how a wakf-al-ulad can be called a gift. It is true that under Mussalman law there can be a gift through the medium of a trust and the same conditions are necessary for the validity of such a gift as those for a gift to the donee direct with this difference that the gift should be accepted by the trustees and the possession also should be delivered to the trustees. Life interest and vested remainders are unknown to Muslim law, but life interest can be construed as an interest in the usufruct.

Successive life interests, however, may be created both under the Sunni and the Shia law in favour of even unborn persons by means of a wakf. Wakfs are a speciality of Muslim law. There is no element of gift in a wakf. The primary concept is that it is permanent dedication by a person professing the Mussalman faith of any property for any purpose recognised by the Mussalman law as religious, pious or charitable. The concept of retention or detention is not wholly absent and is even permissible. A wakf extinguishes the right of the wakif and transfers ownership to God. The Mutavali is the manager of the wakf, but the property does not vest in him as it would in a trustee in the case of an ordinary settlement. Of course, as we have already mentioned in the case before us, there is the vesting of the property in the trustees. When we refer to the basic principles of the law of wakf and the provisions of the relevant statute validating certain wakfs, it is extremely difficult to see how it can be said that there is any gift in case of a wakf which gift can be brought within the ambit of s. 10 of the Estate Duty Act. A wakf of the nature before us must necessarily fall within the scope of s. 12 read with the Explanation to the same and that is the only section in the enactment which can apply to a wakf-al-ulad. In the view we take of the matter it is unnecessary to discuss the point in any detail.

It is lastly urged by Mr. Palkhivala that even if it be held that the provisions of s. 12 govern the case before us and the broad general principle enunciated by him is not applicable to it we must hold that in this case there is both actual passing and deemed passing of property. It is said that there is nothing in the Act to prevent any such principle being accepted by the Court. The argument has been that we must first give effect to what is described as "actual passing of property" viz. 62½ per cent. interest of Aishabai and then after carving it out we should take the view that the remaining 37½ per cent passed on the death of Aishabai by operation of the legal fiction enacted in 12. It has been stressed in support of this argument that there is no difference between ss. 10 and 12. Here also we may observe that the argument ignores the real nature of the wakf before us. But furthermore, the argument goes counter to the express language of s. 12. Section 12 states in terms express and explicit that in any case within its purview, it is the absolute interest of the settlor which was the subject-matter of the settlement that is to be deemed to pass on the settlor's death and not only the reserved interest. It is very difficult for us to see how we can introduce in the relevant provisions of the Act any idea of splitting up of the entire absolute interest of the settlor, the subject-matter of the trust, which in its entirety is deemed to pass on the settlor's death. There is no room for any such division. Learned counsel has not been able to point out to us any such procedure having been adopted in any case in England. There is no precedent and we see no principle or reason why there should be any such arbitrary division of the nature now suggested by learned counsel between actual passing and deemed passing in a case which falls under s. 12. This contention also must, therefore, be negatived. No separate argument has been urged in respect of the sum of Rs. one lac mentioned in the deed.

In the result, our answer to the question will be that the entire wakf property including the sum of Rs. one lac is chargeable to estate duty.

Applicant to pay the cost.

K. T. DESAI J. This Reference under s. 64(1) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, raises an interesting question concerning the application of s. 12 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953. One Aishabai widow of Mohamed Saleh Haji Jackeria Patel, a Sunni Hanafi Mahomedan, died on August 12, 1954. Prior to her death, on March 31, 1951, she executed a deed of wakf. By that deed of wakf she appointed herself and two other persons as the Mutavalis and transferred to them 12 immovable properties and a sum of Rs. one lac. By the said deed of wakf she provided that after making all disbursements and meeting all outgoings in connection with the properties, 10 per cent. of the net income of the said 12 immoveable properties was to be set apart every year for repairs that may be required to be done to the wakf properties and was to be credited in an account to be called the "Repairs Fund Account". In connection with the balance of the income, she provided by cl. 4 as under:—

"For and during the life time of the Wakf (Aishabai) the Mutawalis shall distribute and pay the balance of the income which remains after providing for the expenses mentioned in the above clauses hereinafter referred to as "the net income" amongst and to the following persons for their respective maintenance, support and benefit in the manner following, that is to say:

(a) 62½ per cent. of the net income shall be paid to the Wakf (Aishabai) for and during her life time.

(b) 3½ per cent. of the net income shall be paid to the said Khatizabai, the daughter of the Wakf for and during her life-time.

(c) The remaining 34½ per cent. of the net income shall be divided into as many parts as there may be children of the said Khatizabai so that the share of each male child shall be double that of each female and two such parts shall be given to each male child of the said Khatizabai or shall be applied for his maintenance, education, advancement and benefit and one such part shall be given to each female child of the said Khatizabai or shall be applied for her maintenance, education, advancement or benefit. From and after the death of each child of the said Khatizabai the part of the net income which such child was receiving in his or her life-time shall be paid to his or her children or remoter descendants in the same degree of propinquity so that each male child shall receive double the share of each female child for and during his or her life-time and such payment shall be continued to be made in the same manner as aforesaid from generation to generation."

There is an ultimate provision made for the benefit of the poor or for any other purpose recognised by the Mussalman law as a religious, pious or charitable purpose of a permanent character. It is a wakf-al-awlad. Under the said deed of wakf the said sum of Rs. one lac is directed to be set apart and credited to an account called "Extraordinary Heavy Repair Fund Account". The moneys to the credit of that account are required to be applied for effecting and making alterations in and additions to the wakf properties, to meet expenses of constructing a structure or structures on any vacant plot or plots of land forming part of the wakf properties and to effect heavy repairs involving an expenditure exceeding Rs. 10,000. The income of this sum of Rs. one lac and of the investments representing the same has been utilised in the same manner as the income of the immoveable properties settled upon trust. It is not disputed before us that for the purpose of estate duty the said sum of Rs. one lac stands on the same footing as the said 12 immoveable properties settled upon trust.

The Central Board of Revenue considered that all the properties settled upon trust viz. the 12 immoveable properties and the sum of Rs. one lac passed on the death of the said Aishabai and that estate duty was payable thereon. The applicant being the accountable person within the meaning of sub-s. (1) of s. 53 of the Estate Duty, Act, 1953, contends that only 62½ per cent. thereof passed upon Aishabai's death and that estate duty is payable only in respect thereof. Mr. Palkhivala, the learned counsel for the applicant, very ably urged before us all that could possibly be urged in support of the contention that only 62½ per cent. of the corpus of the trust properties existing at the date of death of Aishabai passed on her death and said that it would be inequitable to hold that all the trust properties held under the said deed of wakf should be deemed to have passed on the death of Aishabai and that estate duty was leviable thereon. Now, it is well-known that there is no equity about a tax. The only thing that we have to consider is whether the Legislature has used clear language having regard to which we can fairly say that all the properties settled upon trust are deemed to have passed on the death of Aishabai. As has been observed by Viscount Cave in *Nevill v. Inland Revenue Commissioners*¹ (p. 399):

"If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be admissible, in any statute, what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute."

It will be necessary to examine some of the provisions of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, in order to appreciate the rival contentions that have been advanced in this case. Section 5(1) of the Act, which is termed as the life and soul of the Act or which is sometimes said to constitute the pith and substance of the enactment runs as follows:—

"5. (1) In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, settled or not settled, including agricultural land situate in the States specified in the First Schedule to this Act, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called 'estate duty' at the rates fixed in accordance with section 35."

Section 12 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, on which reliance has been placed by the Controller of Estate Duty, provides as follows:—

"12. Settlements with reservation.—(1) Property passing under any settlement made by the deceased by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property shall be deemed to pass on the settlor's death:

Provided that the property shall not be deemed to pass on the settlor's death by reason only that any such interest or right was so reserved if by means of the surrender of such interest or right the property is subsequently enjoyed to the entire exclusion of the settlor and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, for at least two years before his death.

Explanation.—A settlor reserving an interest in the settled property for the maintenance of himself and any of his relatives (as defined in section 27) shall be deemed to reserve an interest for himself within the meaning of this section.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), where property is settled by a person on one or more other persons for their respective lives and after their death, on the settlor for life and thereafter on other persons and the settlor dies before his interest in the property becomes an interest in possession, the property shall not be deemed to pass on the settlor's death within the meaning of this section."

In view of the fact that the Indian Legislature has followed the pattern of the legislation in England on the subject and of the fact that a large number of authorities that have been cited at the Bar relate to the provisions of the law prevailing in England, it would not be out of place to consider the corresponding provisions of the law in England on the subject. Section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, which corresponds to s. 5 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, provides inter alia as under:—

"1. Grant of Estate duty.—In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Part of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty, called 'Estate duty' at the graduated rates hereinafter mentioned..."

The expression "property" appearing in s. 5 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, has been defined by s. 2(15) of the Act to include

"any interest in property, movable or immovable, the proceeds of sale thereof and any money or investment for the time being representing the proceeds of sale and also includes any property converted from one species into another by any method;"

The section corresponding thereto in the English enactment is s. 22(f) which runs as under:—

"22. (f) The expression 'property' includes real property and personal property and the proceeds of sale thereof respectively and any money or investment for the time being representing the proceeds of sale."

The expression "passes" in connection with property has not been defined either in England or in India. That expression has been used sometimes to denote some actual change in the title or possession of the property as a whole which takes place at the death. In general, the word "passes" may be taken to mean "changes hands". In the case like the present where the property is the subject-matter of a wakf, it would not be out of place to refer to the observations of Lord Russell of Killowen in the case of Sir S. E. Scott, Br. and Coutts and Co. v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue,² where in connection with the question what property "passes" the learned Law Lord observes as follows (p. 183):—

"To answer that question a comparison must be made between the persons beneficially interested in that fund the moment before the death, and the persons so interested the moment after the death."

This view of the matter has not been the subject of any controversy before us. The expression "property passing on the death" has been defined by s. 2(16) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, which runs as under:—

"2. (16) 'property passing on the death' includes property passing either immediately on the death or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and 'on the death' includes 'at a period ascertainable only by reference to the death'."

The corresponding provision in England is contained in s. 22(1) of the Finance Act, 1894, which runs as follows:—

"22. (1)(i) The expression 'property passing on the death' includes property passing either immediately on the death or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and the expression 'on the death' includes 'at a period ascertainable only by reference to the death'."

The properties in question are settled upon the trusts mentioned in the deed of wakf. The expression "settled property" has been defined by s. 2(19) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, as follows:—

"2. (19) 'settled property' means property which stands limited to, or in trust for, any persons, natural or juridical, by way of succession, whether the settlement took effect before or after the commencement of this Act; and 'settlement' means any disposition, including a dedication or endowment, whereby property is settled;"

So far as the English enactment is concerned, s. 22(h) and 22(i) deal with the matter and provide as follows:—

"22. (h) The expression 'settled property' means property comprised in a settlement:

(i) The expression 'settlement' means any instrument, whether relating to real property or personal property, which is a settlement within the meaning of section two of the Settled Land Act, 1882, or if it related to real property would be a settlement within the meaning of that section, and includes a settlement effected by a parol trust."

There is no dispute that the properties covered by the wakf before us are settled properties within the meaning of the Indian enactment.

Section 5 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, is followed by ss. 6 to 16 which deal with property which is deemed to pass on death. Section 2 of the English Finance Act, 1894, deals with property deemed to pass on death. The provisions in England which correspond to s. 6 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, are those contained in s. 2(1)(a) of the English Finance Act, 1894, those which correspond to s. 7 of the Indian enactment with some variations are those contained in s. 2(1)(b) of the Finance Act, 1894; those corresponding of the Indian enactment are those contained in s. 28(2)(a) of the C Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11(1) of the Customs Revenue Act, 1889, read with s. 2(1)(c) of the Finance Act, 1894 corresponding to s. 12 of the Indian enactment are those contained in s. 38(2)(c) of the Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, read with s. 2(1)(c) of the Finance Act, 1894. By s. 4 of the Indian Finance Act, 1954, the Legislature substituted s. 3(3) to the Estate Duty Act, 1953, which runs as under:—

“3. (3) For the avoidance of doubt, it is hereby declared that reference to property passing on the death of a person shall be construed as including property deemed to pass on the death of such person.”

There is no such provision in the English enactment. Under the Indian Act, 1953, s. 5 is the charging section. Under it duty is leviable in respect of all property passing and deemed to pass on the death of a person. The respondent had reserved 62½ per cent. of the net income of the wakf properties during her lifetime, 62½ per cent. of the corpus of the wakf properties on her death within the ordinary natural meaning of the words “property which passes on the death of such person” appearing in s. 5(1) of the Act. It is urged on behalf of the respondent that as Aishabai had reserved an interest in all the properties settled upon trust under the said Act for life, all the wakf properties are deemed to pass on the death of Aishabai under s. 12 of the Act and that estate duty is payable in respect thereof under the provisions of s. 5(1).

The principal argument advanced by Mr. Palkhivala is that as 62½ per cent. of the corpus of the wakf properties passed on the death of Aishabai, the ordinary natural meaning of the words “property settled . . . which passes on the death of such person” appearing in s. 5(1) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, it is not permissible to invoke any other provisions of the Act under which the wakf properties are deemed to pass on death for the purpose of the levy of estate duty and he relied upon several English cases. Mr. Palkhivala cited several authorities to show that where a share of the income of a property is reserved for life by a person, on the death of such person the portion of the property corresponding to that portion of the income would pass on the death of such person. He referred to the case of *Christie v. The Lord Advocate*³ and to *Northcliffe In re: Arnholz v. Hudson*⁴. It is not necessary to refer to other cases as it is not disputed that under the ordinary natural meaning of the words contained in s. 5(1) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, 62½ per cent. of the corpus of the wakf properties would pass.

The bone of contention is that not merely 62½ per cent. but the whole corpus of the trust properties would pass on the death of Aishabai. Mr. Palkhivala's argument has mainly been based upon a decision of the House of Lords in *Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioner*⁵. Mr. Palkhivala relied upon the observations of Lord Macnaghten in that case which have been the subject-matter of discussion in various cases referred to at the Bar. In the case of Earl Cowley, the settlement was executed by father and son. Under that settlement, the estates were charged with an annuity to the son payable during his father's life, and subject thereto were declared to be held in trust for the son for life and after his death for the son for life with remainders over to the Crown after father's death the Crown claimed from the son under the Finance Act, 1894, estate duty upon the gross value of the estates. In that case the House of Lords held that the property settled upon trust was held to pass under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894. In that case, the provisions of s. 2 of that Act were invoked. At page 212 of the report appear the following observations of Lord Macnaghten:

“Now, if the case falls within s. 1 it cannot also come within s. 2. The are mutually exclusive. Section 1 might properly, I think, be headed, 'With regard to property passing on death, be it enacted as follows.' Sect. 2 might with equal propriety be headed, 'And with regard to property not passing on death, be it enacted as follows.' I cannot, therefore, agree with Rigby L.J. when he says that s. 2 is a provision 'explanatory' of s. 1. In my opinion the two sections are quite distinct and s. 2 throws no light on s. 1. But, then, no doubt s. 2 speaks of 'property in which the deceased...had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased.' And that, it may be said, was just the position of the second Earl with regard to the Mornington settled estates. So it was. But s. 2 does not apply to an interest in property which passes on the death of the deceased. That is already dealt with in the earlier section. For property in the lifetime of the deceased subject to a charge or interest which ceased on the death must of course pass free from that charge or interest. And, so passing, it must of course be valued accordingly. That is s. 1. You do not want s. 2 for that. You cannot resort to s. 2. For that would be giving the duty twice over."

He further observes at page 213:

"It is quite plain, I think, that the provisions of s. 2, sub-s. (1)(b) of the Finance Act 1894, have been borrowed and adapted from that section. But they do not, as I said just now, refer to the cesser of an interest in property which passes, but to the cesser of an interest in property which does not pass."

These observations draw a line between s. 1 and s. 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, and the two are considered to be mutually exclusive. Mr. Palkhivala strongly relies upon the observations quoted above and says that in the present case 62½ per cent. of the corpus of the wakf properties passed under s. 5(1) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, and that it is not open to the respondent to invoke the deeming provisions contained in s. 12 of the Act. In Earl Cowley's case the whole of the property resettled upon trust passed under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, without invoking the aid of the deeming provisions. In a case where the whole property passes under the ordinary natural meaning of the words used in a section, it would not be necessary or proper to invoke the deeming provisions in order to bring about the same result. Mr. Palkhivala's contention, however, is that even if the result be different, even if as a result of the deeming provisions greater estate is roped in, it is not proper to invoke the deeming provisions when the case to any extent falls within the ordinary natural meaning of the words used by the Legislature. Earl Cowley's case does not lay down that where a larger slice of property or more properties are roped in as a result of the deeming provisions, you cannot invoke them.

Mr. Palkhivala in support of his contention has relied upon another case, Duke of Norfolk, In re: Public Trustees v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.⁶ That was a case of a single annuity bequeathed to several persons in succession. Upon the death of any annuitant other than the last to die, it was held that estate duty was payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, on the footing that it is the annuity which passes on the annuitant's death. On the death of an annuitant, other than the last to die, no benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of his interest within s. 2, sub-s. (1)(b). In that case the Master of the Rolls, after dealing with some of the earlier cases in England observes as follows (p. 475):—

"...But they are, in my judgment and for reasons which I will later give, no authority for the view that on the death of the first taker of a continuing annuity there is a passing of any part of the corpus of the property out of which the annuity is raised or on which it may be charged."

"Wynn-Parry J. was of opinion that the simultaneous existence of a right to tax under s. 1 and s. 2 was inconsistent with the well-known statement of Lord Macnaghten in Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, and could not, therefore, be sustained. I agree with him. It is true that the actual language used by Lord Macnaghten, and particularly his words: Section 2 does not apply to an interest in property which passes on the death of the 'deceased', was used in reference to a case in which only one possible subject-matter of taxation was under consideration; and that it is of the essence of the Crown's argument in the present case that there are two distinct proprietary interests. Mr. Stamp observed further that the celebrated pronouncement of Lord Macnaghten, which has constituted one of the most significant decisions on the interpretation of the Finance Act, 1894, did not in fact represent the determination of an issue argued in the Cowley case. Nevertheless, I think with Wynn-Parry J. that Lord Macnaghten's opinion ought not to be regarded as subject to such refinement, and that the law (at any rate in the courts of first instance and in this Court) must be taken to be that, as regards any such single benefaction as that with which we are concerned, the application of s. 2 of the Act is necessarily excluded by the application to the annuity itself of s. 1." In making these observations the Master of the Rolls felt himself bound to follow the observations of Lord Macnaghten in Earl Cowley's case.

In this context, it will not be out of place to refer to the following statement in Dymond's Death Duties, 12th edn., at p. 94:

"...The principle of Re Duke of Norfolk's Will Trusts...is not officially regarded as involving the exclusion of the claim at (b) by the claim at (a)."

The claim at (b) is the claim under s. 2(1)(b) of the Finance Act, 1894, and the claim at (a) is the claim under s. 1 of the said Act.

Mr. Palkhivala referred us to *Re Longbourne's Marriage Settlement*⁷. In that case there was an ante-nuptial settlement. The wife directed the trustees to stand possessed of the investments therein mentioned on trust after the intended marriage, to pay out of the annual income of the settled property a yearly sum to the husband during his life and subject thereto to pay the annual income of the settled property to the wife during her life and after the death of the wife and subject to the payment of the yearly sum to the husband for the children or child of the marriage who attained twenty one. It was held that the whole settled property passed under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, and for the purposes of duty a deduction could not be made from the value thereof for the "slice" required to produce the annuity which continued payable to the husband, but, as was conceded, an allowance for the burden of the annuity could be taken equivalent to the actuarial value of the annuity. That again was a case where the whole settled property passed under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. That case is not an authority for the proposition that where the whole settled property did not pass under s. 1, the deeming provisions cannot be invoked. In that case in connection with the deduction that had been allowed, Wynn-Parry J. observes as follows (p. 937):—

"...As the Crown concedes that there should be a deduction, in my view, I can do nothing else but accept the effect of that concession and direct that the value of the deduction must be the value of the annuity at the date of the death calculated on actuarial principles."

The deduction in that case was based on a concession and was not the result of any judicial pronouncement on the subject.

The next case to which reference may be made is that of Sanderson v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.⁸ In that case, the settlor had voluntarily settled on trust for his son and daughter shares in a private company in which he held a controlling interest. It was admitted that on his death estate duty in respect of these shares was payable under s. 2(1)(c) of the Act of 1894. It was held that, on its true construction, s. 55(1) of the Finance Act of 1940 was simply a valuation section applying equally to property which "passes on the death" within s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, and property which is deemed by s. 2 to be "included" in property passing on the death and that accordingly it applied to the shares in question. That case contains some interesting observations made by Lord Radcliffe. At page 498, he observes as follows:—

"Estate duty is not charged by the Act upon two different kinds or classes of property, property which passes in the natural sense and property, which is deemed to pass by virtue of special statutory provision. Strictly speaking, as has often been pointed out, no property at all is 'deemed to pass' under the Act. What section 1 provides is that estate duty is to be charged upon all property passing on death, whether real or personal, settled or not settled. It offers no other clue as to the meaning to be attached to those words. What section 2 provides is that property passing on death is to be deemed to include certain kinds of property or, perhaps more accurately, certain property in certain situations, and is not to be deemed to include certain property in other situations. I have never known it disputed that the exclusion provision which is contained in section 2(3) applies to all property passing, whether it passes under section 1 simpliciter or under section 1 so enlarged or interpreted by section 2(1). But the result of this is that it is section 1 and no other section that imposes the charge of estate duty, that the charge so imposed is imposed upon property that passes on death and no other property, and that the effect of section 2(1) is to give the word "passes" in section 1 a meaning wider and, if you please, less natural than it would have had if section 2(1) had not been enacted. Personally, I find this approach to the general purport of the Act a more satisfactory method than that of dividing the property charged by the Act into two categories consisting in the one case of property actually passing and in the other of property notionally passing, categories which the Act itself does not employ."

At page 500 he further observes as under:—

"I do not see that our decision can be said in any way to conflict with those earlier cases. The most that can be said in that connection is that it will leave unexplained what exactly Lord Macnaghten meant in Cowley when he said of sections 1 and 2 'the two sections are mutually exclusive,' or what Lord Haldane meant in Milne by the words: 'section 2 is thus not a definition section, but an independent section operating outside the field of section 1.' But, as Lord Macnaghten's words have been a matter of inquiry since the year 1900 (see Attorney-General v. Dobree, per Channell J.) and since Lord Haldane himself gave a substantially different explanation of the relation of the two sections in Nevill v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, when he said: 'The principle is contained in section 1. Section 2 combines definitions of such property with the extension of the application of the principle laid down in section 1 to certain cases which are not in reality cases of changing hands on death at all...', I think we may safely resign these passages to the list of the many minor mysteries of the law."

Mr. Palkhiwala cited the case reported in *Public Trustee v. I. R. Comrs.*⁹ In that case, a testator appointed A to be one of his executors and trustees and directed that the income of his residuary estate be divided among a number of persons, of whom A was one, in specified shares and so that when one beneficiary died the total income was divided among the survivors or survivor. The income directed to be paid to A was expressed to be given to him in respect of his acting as executor and trustee and by way of remuneration for his so doing. At the date of his death, A was receiving 6/99 of the income of the residuary estate and estate duty was claimed on 6/99 of the capital of the fund under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. It was not disputed that the relevant charging provision was s. 1 and not s. 2(1)(b) of the Act of 1894, but the trustee contended that the claim was precluded by virtue of s. 2(1)(b) which excluded "property the interest in which of the deceased... was only an interest as holder of an office" from property deemed by s. 2(1)(b) to be included in property passing on the death of the deceased. It was held that since the relevant charging provision was s. 1 and not s. 2(1)(b) of the Act of 1894, the dichotomy between s. 1 and s. 2(1) of that Act precluded the application of the words of exemption quoted above, which related only to a claim arising under s. 2(1)(b). This latest case of the Court of Appeal in England contains some interesting observations by Lord Evershed, Master of the Rolls. Lord Evershed observes as follows (p. 723):—

"It is certainly a forceful contention to observe that property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose, according to the ordinary use of the language, would include the testator's own free estate no less than property over which he had but a general power of appointing. So it is counsel's contention the standing Lord Macnaghten's dictum, s. 2(1) cannot be regarded as dealing with which is exclusive of property strictly within the first section; and that view is fully reflected in the speech of Lord Radcliffe (see especially Sanderson v. Inland Commissioners). I add further that Lord Radcliffe notices language used by learned Judge, Channell J. in *A.-G. v. Dobree*¹¹ and also the differing views of the House in a later case, A.-G. v. Milne. Notwithstanding the weight of those I feel myself compelled to the view that in this Court, as before Danckwerts, not do other than treat Lord Macnaghten's dictum as still applicable."

In dealing with the case of Sanderson v. Inland Revenue Commissioners serves as follows (p. 723):—

"It may well be that this case has disclosed, perhaps for the first time, in which a strict application of the dichotomy has hitherto concealed, and the other anomalies—one being in relation to a corporation sole—which, if the Crown which have been indicated in argument are right, may add some to the view that the matter is one which ought properly to be considered by the House resolved only by, the House of Lords itself."

In this connection, reference may be made to the instructive observation of Lord Dunedin in his dissenting judgment in the case of Attorney General v. Lord. At pages 774-775 he observes as follows:—

"The paramount enacting section of the Act is undoubtedly to be found in s. 2. If that section stood alone it is reasonably clear that much property would be included which the framers of the Act wished to tax. Accordingly we have s. 1. It was authoritatively discussed in your Lordships' House in the case of Edwards. Whether Lord Macnaghten was strictly correct or not in saying that the two classes were mutually exclusive seems to me to matter little. At any rate—and that is material—s. 2 sweeps into the net various things which s. 1 would have excluded. It is secure,...

How does s. 2 do this? It does not do it by being conceived in the working section imposing the duty on certain specified kinds of property. It does it by including that property passing on the death of the deceased—which is already included by virtue of s. 1—shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say, the property then follow the various sub-sections.

...The net result is that the expression, 'property which passes', in the definition of the duty must include property which is deemed to pass by virtue of the 2nd section of the Act, the only taxing section."

In connection with the dichotomy enshrined in the speech of Lord Macnaghten it would not be out of place to refer to the following statement in Death Duties, 12th edn., at p. 94:

"Where the deceased is both an annuitant and a life-tenant of an aliquot share of the surplus income of the settled funds, duty is charged (a) under s. 1, on the share of the funds, with a deduction for the appropriate proportion of the annuity, and (b) under s. 2(1)(b) on the aliquot share of the funds required to provide the annuity, so far as attributable to the other share or shares of the funds. This dichotomy, even though hallowed by time, has been assailed in recent years. Forceful arguments based on sound logic have been advanced against it."

Mr. Palkhivala now seeks to establish in India a dichotomy between the provisions of s. 5(1) and s. 12 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953. Under s. 5(1) is provided that property passing under any settlement made by the testator by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will whereby the property is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor shall be included in the settlement. Now, the words "property passing under any settlement" in s. 12 refer not to property passing on the death, but to property comprised in the settlement. It has been stated in Green's Death Duties

edn., p. 127, that property "passing" under a settlement or trust in the context of the corresponding provisions in the English statute does not connote a passing on death, in the sense of s. 1 of the Finance Act of 1894. Broadly speaking, it means merely property comprised in the settlement or subject to the trust. To a similar effect are the observations in Dymond's Death Duties, 12th edn., at p. 183. It is the property which is comprised in the settlement which is deemed to pass on the settlor's death on the conditions mentioned in s. 12 being fulfilled. The property comprised in the settlement must be property in which "an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved". The words "an interest" in the context mean any interest however small. It has been so considered under the analogous provisions in England. It has been so stated in Green's Death Duties, 4th edn., at p. 129. There is a decision reported in *Attorney General v. Earl Grey*¹³, where a similar view is expressed. In that case by a deed made in 1885 the owner of certain estates gave them to his nephew in fee subject to the reservation of an annual rent charge payable to the donor and expressed to be issuing out of the estates so given. The annual income of the estates was considerably in excess of the rent charge. At page 325 of that report Channell J. observes as follows:

"...Any interest however small will do, provided it issues out of such property—that is, out of the property sought to be taxed. I agree that if several parcels of land be given by one and the same deed of gift, and an interest be reserved to the donor out of one of those parcels only, estate duty would not be payable upon the whole subject-matter of the gift, but only out of that specific portion in which the interest is expressed to be reserved."

There are no words which qualify the words "an interest" in s. 12(1) provided it is for life or any other period determinable by reference to death. The interest may be an aliquot share in the income of the property settled upon trust. If Mr. Palkhivala's contention was to be accepted, it would mean that where an interest in property has been reserved by the settlor which constitutes an aliquot share of the income of the property, this section would not apply. I do not see any warrant for such a construction. Section 12 also refers to another set of circumstances under which the whole property may be deemed to pass on the settlor's death. It is where the settlor has reserved to himself the right by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property. If Mr. Palkhivala's contention is right, where a settlor reserves to himself the power to restore to himself the absolute interest in the property settled upon trust and reserves to himself also a very small, say a thousandth share in the income of that property for life, then to the extent of a thousandth share of the corpus it would pass under s. 5(1) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, without the aid of any deeming provisions and the application of s. 12 would be excluded. There is no reason to exclude the operation of s. 12 in such cases. The Legislature has not laid down that where any interest in any property, however small, passes on the death of a person within the ordinary meaning of those words under s. 5(1), the deeming provisions contained in ss. 6 to 16 of the Act cannot be invoked. There is no reason to add words to that effect. Where there is a deeming provision, it does not necessarily imply that what is sought to be included thereby must of necessity have otherwise been wholly excluded. In this connection, reference may be made to the following observations of Lord Radcliffe in the case of *St. Aubyn v. Attorney-General*¹⁴ (p. 53):—

"...The word 'deemed' is used a great deal in modern legislation. Sometimes it is used to impose for the purposes of a statute an artificial construction of a word or phrase that would not otherwise prevail. Sometimes it is used to put beyond doubt a particular construction that might otherwise be uncertain. Sometimes it is used to give a comprehensive description that includes what is obvious, what is uncertain and what is, in the ordinary sense, impossible."

It seems to me clear that the object of the Legislature in enacting s. 12 was that where an interest, however small, is reserved by a settlor under any settlement not taking effect as a will for life or any other period determinable by reference to death, the whole of the property would be deemed to pass even though otherwise a lesser part thereof might pass, and that if he has reserved to himself the right by the exercise of any power to restore to himself or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property, the whole property would pass whether he has reserved any aliquot share in the income or any other interest in the property or not. Any other construction would not give full effect to the words used by the Legislature. The dichotomy of Lord Macnaghten has not in terms been extended even in England to a case like the one before us and I see no reason why, however hallowed by time the dichotomy may be in England, it should be extended to the provisions contained in s. 5 and s. 12 of the Estate Duty Act, 1953. Section 3(3) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, provides that all references in the Act to property passing on the death of a person shall be construed as including references to property deemed to pass on the death of such person. Section 5 is the charging section within which all properties liable to estate duty have to fall before they may be charged to estate duty. By s. 12 the Legislature has cast a wide net and if it has hauled up in the catch the whole of the property settled upon trust by the wakf executed by Aishabai, there is no scope for escape by reference to the provisions of s. 5. The clear language of s. 12 embraces cases like the present and the whole of the property settled upon trust must be deemed to pass on the settlor's death.

Mr. Palkhivala has then advanced an alternative argument. Mr. Palkhivala says that even if the provisions of s. 5 are not considered to exclude the application of s. 12, both s. 5 and s. 12 should be applied, wherever they are applicable. He urges that under the provisions of s. 5, 62½ per cent. of the corpus of the wakf properties would pass on the death of Aishabai as Aishabai had reserved an interest in 62½ per cent. of the net income for her life. Then he says that as regards the balance of 37½ per cent., it cannot be said that the settlor had reserved any interest therein and that as she had not reserved any interest therein, it does not fall within the ambit of s. 12. There is a fallacy in this argument. What is reserved by the settlor is not the income of 62½ per cent. of the corpus of the trust properties. She has reserved for herself 62½ per cent. of the net income of every one of the properties settled upon trust. She has reserved an interest in every property. It is not possible to say that she has an interest reserved only in some properties and not in others. As the settlor has reserved an interest in each one of the properties settled upon trust, even though that interest may not extend to the whole of the net income thereof, it is sufficient for the purpose of attracting the provisions of s. 12 so that all the properties settled upon trust would pass on her death. On the basis of the alternative argument of Mr. Palkhivala all the properties settled upon trust are liable to pass on the death of Aishabai.

Mr. Palkhivala has lastly urged that even if s. 12 applied in its entirety, effect should not be given thereto as s. 10 can be said equally to apply. Section 10 is in terms following:

"Property taken under any gift, whenever made, shall be deemed to pass on the donor's death to the extent that bona fide possession and enjoyment of it was not immediately assumed by the donee and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise:

Provided that the property shall not be deemed to pass by reason only that it was not, as from the date of the gift, exclusively retained as aforesaid, if, by means of the surrender of the reserved benefit or otherwise, it is subsequently enjoyed to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him for at least two years before the death." He says that s. 10 imposes a lighter burden and that he is entitled to the benefit thereof. In my view, s. 12 is the specific section which governs the matter. It deals with settlements with reservation. Gifts may be made through the medium of a trust or a settlement. But when under the trust or settlement the settlor reserves for himself or herself an interest in the property so settled for life or any other period determinable by reference to death, s. 12 will apply and the whole property will be deemed to pass on the settlor's death. We are dealing here with the case of a wakf, which is a settlement within the meaning of s. 2(19) of the Act wherein the settlor has reserved 62½ per cent. of the net income of the settled properties for herself for life. It is not necessary to set out here the difference in the provisions of law relating to gifts and wakfs as applicable to a Hanafi Sunni Mahomedan like the settlor. If the wakf in question was treated only as a disposition by way of gift, a large number of its provisions would have to be regarded as invalid under the Mahomedan law of gift though they may be valid under the law applicable to Wakfs.

Mr. Palkhivala has relied upon *Commissioner for Stamp Duties, New South Wales v. Perpetual Trustee Co.*¹⁵ In that case, by an indenture of settlement made between the settlor and five trustees, of whom the settlor himself was one, it was declared that the trustees should hold certain company shares of which the settlor was the owner in trust, to apply during the minority of his son the whole or any part of the income or corpus as the trustees should think fit for the maintenance, advancement or benefit of the son, and on his attaining the age of twenty-one years to transfer to him as his absolute property all the assets and property whatsoever, including accumulations of income. At page 439 of the report the following observations have been made by the Privy Council:

"...In their opinion the property comprised in the gift was the equitable interest in the eight hundred and fifty shares, which was given by the settlor to his son. The disposition of that interest was effected by the creation of a trust, i.e., by transferring the legal ownership of the shares to trustees, and declaring such trusts in favour of the son as were co-extensive with the gift which the settlor desired to give. The donee was the recipient of the gift; whether the son alone was the donee...or whether the son and the body of trustees together constituted the donee, seems immaterial. The trustees alone were not the donee. They were in no sense the object of the settlor's bounty. Did the donee assume bona fide possession and enjoyment immediately upon the gift? The linking of possession with enjoyment as a composite object which has to be assumed by the donee indicates that the possession and enjoyment contemplated is beneficial possession and enjoyment by the object of the donor's bounty. This question therefore must be answered in the affirmative, because the son was (through the medium of the trustees) immediately put in such bona fide beneficial possession and enjoyment of the property comprised in the gift as the nature of the gift and the circumstances permitted."

In that case, bona fide possession and enjoyment of the property comprised in the gift was assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforth retained to the entire exclusion of the deceased or of any benefit to him. That case is clearly distinguishable from the facts of the present case.

It is not necessary for the purpose of the present reference to decide whether in India, when there is a choice between two alternative provisions, the authorities are entitled to choose that which yields the higher duty as in England.

Mr. Joshi, the learned counsel for the respondent, has urged that the scheme of the Indian enactment is materially different from the scheme of the enactment in England. In our view, the scheme of both the enactments is substantially the same. Mr. Joshi has asked us to look at the provisions of s. 12, to look at the settlement and to see if that section applies having regard to the terms of the settlement. He says that if that section applies, there is no reason why it should not be made applicable and the whole property should not be deemed to pass thereunder. We agree with Mr. Joshi. The section in terms applies, and if it in terms applies, there is no reason why effect should not be given to the provisions of that section.

In the result, I agree with my brother Mr. Justice S. T. Desai as re-answer to the question raised in this reference and the order for costs.

objection was taken before the trial Judge to the admissibility of these notes on two grounds, namely—

(1) that they could not be admitted in evidence as copies had not been supplied to the accused under s. 173 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and

(2) that they could not be given in evidence under s. 157 of the Evidence Act (hereinafter called the Act) as corroboration of Santook's evidence.

The trial Judge negatived both these contentions and admitted the notes in evidence. He referred to them in his charge to the jury. Eventually, however, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty by a majority of 5 : 3. The trial Judge thereupon made a reference to the High Court under s. 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The High Court went through the entire evidence, including exh. V, found the case proved, and convicted the appellant.

Learned counsel for the appellant has given up the attack on the admissibility of these notes on the basis of s. 173 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in view of the decision of this Court in *Narayan Rao v. The State of Andhra Pradesh*¹. He has, however, strenuously contended that the notes cannot be admitted in evidence under s. 157 of the Act.

Section 157 is in these terms—

"In order to corroborate the testimony of a witness, any former statement made by such witness relating to the same fact at or about the time when the fact took place, or before any authority legally competent to investigate the fact, may be proved."

The contention is that the words 'statement made by' in this section require that there must be a communication of the statement by the maker of it to another person and that a statement within the meaning of s. 157 does not include any writing or memorandum made by a person for his own use when it is not communicated to any other person. It is said that such a writing may be used to refresh the memory of a witness under s. 159; but it does not become admissible in evidence unless the other party cross-examines the witness on the document under s. 161. In this case there was no question of cross-examination upon the document as the prosecution itself produced the notes during the examination-in-chief of Santook in order to corroborate him. In short, the contention of the learned counsel is that such a writing can only be used under s. 159 and cannot be called a statement within the meaning of s. 157, for the word 'statement' used in s. 157 implies that it must have been communicated to another person.

Now, the word 'statement' is not defined in the Act. We have, therefore, to go to the dictionary meaning of the word in order to discover what it means. Assistance may also be taken from the use of the word 'statement' in other parts of the Act to discover in what sense it has been used therein.

The primary meaning of the word 'statement' to be found in Shorter Oxford English Dictionary and Webster's New World Dictionary is 'something that is stated'. Another meaning that is given in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary is 'written or oral communication'. There is no doubt that a statement may be made to someone in the sense of a communication. But that is not its primary meaning. Unless, therefore, there is something in s. 157 or in the other provisions of the Act, which compels us to depart from the primary meaning of the word 'statement', there is no reason to hold that communication to another person is of the essence and there can be no statement within the meaning of s. 157 without such communication. The word 'statement' has been used in a number of sections of the Act in its primary meaning of 'something that is stated' and that meaning should be given to it under s. 157 also unless there is something that cuts down that meaning for the purpose of that section. Words are generally used in the same sense throughout in a statute unless there is something repugnant in the context.

The first group of sections in the Act in which the word 'statement' occurs, are ss. 17 to 21, which deal with admissions. Section 17 defines the word

'admission', ss. 18 to 20 lay down what statements are admissions, and s. 21 deals with the proof of admissions against persons making them. The words used in ss. 18 to 21 in this connection are 'statements made by'. It is not disputed that statements made by persons may be used as admissions against them even though they may not have been communicated to any other person. For example, statements in the account-books of a person showing that he was indebted to another person are admissions which can be used against him even though these statements were never communicated to any other person. Illustration (b) of s. 21 also shows that the word 'statement' used in these sections does not necessarily imply that they must have been communicated to any other person. In the Illustration in question entries made in the book kept by a ship's captain in the ordinary course of business are called statements, though these entries are not communicated to any other person. An examination, therefore, of these sections show that in this part of the Act the word 'statement' has been used in its primary meaning, namely, 'something that is stated' and communication is not necessary in order that it may be a statement.

The next section to which reference may be made is s. 32 of the Act. It deals with statements made by persons who are dead, or cannot be found or who become incapable of giving evidence or whose attendance cannot be procured without an amount of delay or expense which appears to the Court unreasonable. Sub-section (2) in particular shows that any entry or memorandum made in books kept in the ordinary course of business or in the discharge of professional duty is a statement, though there is no question of communicating it to another person. Similarly, sub-s. (6) shows that statements relating to the existence of any relationship made in any will or deed relating to the affairs of the family, or in any family pedigree, or upon any tombstone, or family portrait are statements though there is no question of their communication to another person.

Again, s. 39 shows that a statement may be contained in a document which forms part of a book. In this case also there is no question of any communication of that statement to another person in order to make it a statement.

Then, there is s. 145, which lays down that a witness may be cross-examined as to previous statements made by him in writing or reduced into writing for the purpose of contradicting him. Under this section a witness may be contradicted by statements in a diary kept by him, though there is no question of any communication of those statements to another person.

Then comes s. 157, which we have already set out above. Here also the words used are 'statement made by'. We see no reason why the word 'statement' should not have been used in its primary meaning in this section also. There is nothing in the section which in any way requires that an element of communication to another person should be imported into the meaning of the word 'statement' used therein. It was urged that if we do not imply communication to another person in the meaning of the word 'statement' in this section, it would result in a witness corroborating himself by producing some writing made by him and kept secret and that this would be very dangerous. Now, a distinction must be made between admissibility of such a writing and the value to be attached to it. Section 157 makes previous statements even of this type admissible; but what value should be attached to a corroboration of this nature is a different matter to be decided by the Court in the circumstances of each case. The witness who is sought to be corroborated is produced in the witness-box and is liable to cross-examination. The cross-examiner may show that no reliance should be placed on such an earlier statement. The danger, therefore, which the learned counsel for the appellant emphasised is really no danger at all for the witness it subject to cross-examination. The main evidence is the statement of the witness in the witness-box and a document of this nature is only used to corroborate him. If the main evidence is shaken by cross-examination, corroboration by such a document would be of no use. There is, therefore, no reason to give a different meaning to the word 'statement' in this section because of this alleged danger, which really does not exist.

Learned counsel for the appellant particularly referred to s. 159 of the Act to show that notes like exh. V can only be used for refreshing memory and can be evidence under the conditions prescribed under s. 161. He does not suggest that what comes under s. 159 is necessarily excluded from the meaning of the word 'statement' under s. 157. For example, a man may write a letter to another referring to certain facts at or about the time when they took place and may use it to refresh his memory. A letter is a communication to another person; it would, even according to the learned counsel for the appellant, be a statement within the meaning of s. 157 and be admissible for purposes of corroboration. Therefore, it cannot be said that because a document can be used to refresh memory under s. 159 it cannot be a statement within the meaning of s. 157. Section 159 deals with a particular set of circumstances and the word 'statement' does not appear therein at all. Section 159 is, in our opinion, of no help in deciding what the word 'statement' means in s. 157. Refreshing memory under s. 159 is confined to statements in writing made under the conditions mentioned in that section, while corroboration under s. 157 may be by statements in writing or even by oral statements. That is why there is difference in language of ss. 157 and 159. But that difference does not, in our opinion, lead to any conclusion which would cut down the meaning of the word 'statement' under s. 157 to those statements only which are communicated to another person. On a consideration, therefore, of the primary meaning of the word 'statement' and the various sections of the Act, we come to the conclusion that a 'statement' under s. 157 means only 'something that is stated' and the element of communication to another person is not necessary before 'something that is stated' becomes a statement under that section. In this view of the matter the notes of attendance would be statements within the meaning of s. 157 and would be admissible to corroborate Santook's evidence under s. 157.

Let us now turn to the cases cited at the bar. In *The King v. Nga Myo*², a full bench of the Rangoon High Court was considering questions relating to the nature of corroboration and the circumstances in which it should be sought when a person is accused of a crime and the evidence against him is partly or wholly that of an accomplice or accomplices. The point, therefore, which is specifically raised before us was not before the Rangoon High Court. In passing, the learned Judges referred to s. 157 of the Act and stated that it was settled law that a person cannot corroborate himself. In making these observations, the learned Judges must be referring to the settled law in England before the amendment by the English Evidence Act, 1938. A change was, however, introduced in the English law by the Evidence Act, 1938, (1 and 2 Geo. VI, c. 28). That Act provides that in any civil proceeding where direct oral evidence of a fact would be admissible, any statement made by a person in a document and tending to establish that fact shall, on production of the original document, be admissible as evidence of that fact, if the maker of the statement had personal knowledge of the matters dealt with by the statement and if he is called as a witness in the proceeding. Thus notes of an interview prepared by a solicitor similar to exh. V are now admissible as statements in a document under certain conditions in England (See In Re. Powe (deceased): *Powe v. Barclays Bank Ltd.*³). For this reason and also because the judgment does not consider the specific question raised before us it is of no help.

The next case is *Bhogilal v. Royal Insurance Co. Ltd.*⁴ Reliance is placed on the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in these words at p. 820:—

"The second matter on which their Lordships feel it desirable to observe is the tendering and reception in evidence of the letter written by Bhattacharjee to his official chief in June 30, 1923. This letter was tendered and received under s. 157 of Evidence Act. Their Lordships desire emphatically to say that the letter was that section, properly receivable for any purpose."

These observations do not in our opinion help the learned counsel of appellant. His contention throughout has been that a statement within the meaning of s. 157 has to be communicated to another person. These observations show that the letter which their Lordships were rejecting was certain statement which was communicated to another person. Therefore, if their Lordships rejected the letter it could not be on the ground that the letter was not communicated to another person; it must be due to the want of evidence of Bhattacharjee, which was considered in the previous paragraph.

It is clear, therefore, the word 'statement' used in s. 157 of the Evidence Act means 'something that is stated' and the element of communication to another person is not included in it. As such the notes of attendance prepared by the appellant were statements within the meaning of s. 157 and admissible in evidence.

The result is that the appeal fails and is hereby dismissed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar.

M. F. DeSOUZA v. CHILDREN'S EDUCATIONAL UPLIFT SOCIETY.
Indian Easements Act (V of 1882), Sec. 69—Parties agreeing that licence to occupy granted by one to the other to be irrevocable for certain duration. Plaintiff can terminate such licence at will.

If parties enter into a contract and arrive at an agreement to the effect that the licence shall be irrevocable or shall be limited for a particular duration, the licensee will not be entitled to terminate or revoke the licence at his will.

The plaintiff who had lost his suit in the first Court for possession of a portion of the room and further agreed that the defendant's right as a licensee to occupy it was irrevocable so long as the Bombay Rent Act remained in force. In the subsequent suit by the plaintiff for possession of the one-third portion of the room in occupation of the defendant, it was contended by the plaintiff that the licence was revocable at his will as it did not fall in any of the two classes of cases of licences set out in s. 60 of the Indian Easements Act, 1882:—

Held, that apart from s. 60 of the Indian Easements Act which means that a case falls in either of the two categories mentioned therein the licence is irrevocable, under the law of contract the plaintiff was precluded from terminating the contract because of the contractual engagement into which he had entered.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

The applicant in person.

MUDHOLKAR J. This is a defendant's application for revision of the order of the Presidency Small Cause Court, Bombay, decreeing the plaintiff's possession of a portion of a room which is in the occupation of the defendant as a licensee by virtue of a compromise decree passed in the previous suit between the parties by this Court. Now, one of the terms of the compromise decree is that the defendant will be entitled to occupy the aforesaid portion of the room as a licensee and that the licence in her favour would be irrevocable.

plaintiff, which is an educational society, contends that it is entitled to revoke the licence because the defendant has not been paying any compensation to the plaintiff for the use and occupation of the portion of the room in her possession as a licensee. The defendant contended that the consent decree made no reference whatsoever to the payment of rent or compensation to the plaintiff, and that, therefore, she was not liable. She further stated that while she was a licensee in respect of the entire room, she used to pay Rs. 15 per month as rent to the plaintiff, and now that she is in possession of only one-third the portion, she is liable to pay only Rs. 5 per month. She has further stated that she has tendered rent or compensation to the plaintiff at the rate of Rs. 5 per month, but that the plaintiff has refused to accept it and therefore, according to her, she has committed no breach whatsoever of the terms of the licence.

On behalf of the plaintiff it is contended before me that a licence must always be regarded as revocable at the will of the licensor except in the two cases set out in s. 60 of the Easements Act. Section 60 reads thus:—

"A licence may be revoked by the grantor, unless—

(a) it is coupled with a transfer of property and such transfer is in force;

(b) the licensee, acting upon the licence, has executed a work of a permanent character and incurred expenses in the execution."

The learned counsel for the plaintiff points out that there is no mention here of a third class of cases wherein a licence would be irrevocable, that is, cases where parties have agreed that it shall be irrevocable. In my opinion, the argument advanced by the learned counsel is not sound. It is no doubt true that s. 60 mentions only two classes of cases in which the licence would be regarded as irrevocable. This means that where a case falls in either of these categories the licence is made irrevocable by operation of law, that is the Easements Act. But apart from the Easements Act, there is the law of contract, and if parties enter into a contract and arrive at a solemn agreement to the effect that the licence shall be irrevocable or shall be limited for a particular duration, it follows that the licensor will be bound by his engagement and will not be entitled to terminate the licence or revoke the licence at his sweet will and pleasure. If authority were necessary for this proposition, I may refer to the following passage in Corpus Juris Secundum, Vol. LIII, pp. 815-816:—

"As a general rule a mere licence, that is, one which is merely a personal privilege not coupled with an interest in the land, may be revoked by the licensor at any time, at his pleasure. This rule generally applies regardless of how long the use has been permitted, and although the intention was to confer a continuing right, and even though the licence was created by a deed or other written instrument. The general rule, however, is not without its modifications and exceptions, and does not apply where the licence is coupled with or partakes of the character of an easement and the rights under it are affirmatively and definitely fixed and settled, or where it constitutes part of a contract between the parties..."

Now, here the consent decree to which I have referred earlier was passed in an appeal which the plaintiff had brought to this Court from the dismissal of its suit for possession of the very room a portion of which is in the defendant's occupation. The plaintiff, which had lost its suit in the first Court, agreed to allow the defendant to be in exclusive possession of one-third portion of that room, and further agreed that her right as a licensee to occupy the room will be irrevocable so long as the Bombay Rent Act remains in force. Now, it is clear that the plaintiff, which had lost earlier in the City Civil Court, wanted to rescue something out of its original claim and therefore it entered into the aforesaid compromise. The consideration for the compromise was apparently the defendant's parting with her right to the use of two-thirds of the room, because as a result of the compromise she became entitled to use only one-third of the room. The plaintiff having thus received consideration for the compromise, cannot in equity and in all fairness be allowed to go back upon it. Therefore, I am of opinion that, quite apart from s. 60 of the Easements Act, the Court will have to bear in mind in a suit of this nature whether the licensor is precluded from revoking the licence because of any contractual engagement into which he has entered. There being an engagement of this kind here, I am of the opinion that the plaintiff cannot claim to itself the right of revocation at its free will and pleasure. To hold otherwise and to decree possession in such circumstances would be nothing else than putting the seal of approval of the Court to a breach of contract.

Then it was contended that the learned Judge of the Court below has found that the defendant has not been paying any compensation to the plaintiff for her occupation of the 1/3rd portion of the room and has therefore committed a breach of a term of the licence. Because of the breach of the term, the plaintiff says that it is entitled to revoke the licence. Now, if we scan the terms of the consent decree passed in the preliminary suit, we find that there is no reference whatsoever to the right of occupation being conditioned by the liability to pay compensation. The learned counsel for the plaintiff, however, says that this must be implied in the agreement between the parties. He further points out that, even according to the defendant herself, she was occupying the room or using it without paying rent, and that when she was examined before the Court below she has admitted that she did not expect to use the room gratis and that she was liable to pay the proportionate amount of rent, i.e. Rs. 5. From this he wants me to conclude that one of the conditions of the licence was the payment of compensation by the defendant to the plaintiff. All that we have is the plaintiff's statement in the "Cause of Action" to the effect that the defendant neglected to pay "the licence charges at the rate of Rs. 15 per month". There is no averment there, or even in the evidence of Dharamdas who was examined on behalf of the plaintiff, to the effect that the payment of Rs. 15 per month was a condition for the occupation of one-third of the room. Now, since the plaintiff has failed to establish that the payment of Rs. 15 per month was a condition of the licence, it is not open to it to say that it is entitled to revoke the licence because the defendant has not been paying compensation at the aforesaid rate.

That being the position, I am of the opinion that the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court acted erroneously in the exercise of his jurisdiction in passing a decree in favour of the plaintiff. Accordingly, I allow the application in revision and make the rule absolute with costs.

GULABRAO FAKIRRAO HARPHALE v. BABURAO FAKIRRAO HARPHALE.*

Tenants in common—Ancestral property, after partition between members of joint Hindu family, remaining with one of the members—Such member receiving income of other members from property and mixing it with his own from such property—Purchase of property by member from such income—Separate accounts of income received on behalf of other members not maintained—Whether property so acquired belonged to erstwhile members as tenants in common—Indian Trusts Act (II of 1882), Secs. 90, 94, 95.

The entire immovable property of a joint Hindu family which consisted of ancestral property and subsequent acquisitions remained, after severance of the joint family status by partition between the plaintiffs and the defendant, who were members of the family, with the defendant. The defendant did not maintain separate accounts of the income received from the properties in which the plaintiffs had a share and the properties acquired by him after the partition. The defendant dealt with the income derived from his share and the share of the plaintiffs. It was contended by the plaintiffs that when the defendant continued to receive the share of the income even after partition in the ancestral and joint family properties and mixed up the income belonging to their share with the income of his own share and acquired properties from time to time, all the properties so acquired must be deemed to be impressed with the character of the fund out of which the properties were acquired i.e. the acquired properties belonged to the plaintiffs and the defendant as tenants in common:—

*Decided, November 18/19, 1958. First Division, at Poona, in Special Civil Suit No. 8 Appeal No. 90 of 1955, against the decision of M. V. Purandare, Joint Civil Judge, Senior of 1953.

Held, that because the defendant continued to receive the rents and profits of the share of the plaintiffs in the properties which were originally ancestral or joint family properties he did not thereby become a trustee of the rents and profits so received for the plaintiffs, although he was liable to account for the rents and profits received by him, that the fact that the defendant failed to maintain separate accounts of the income of the plaintiffs' share collected by him did not impress the fund accumulated by him after severance with the character of a fund belonging to the plaintiffs and the defendant, that the fund in the hands of the defendant was still a fund of which he was the owner and it was not impressed with any trust in favour of the plaintiffs, and that the property acquired with the aid of that fund was the exclusive property of the defendant and the plaintiffs had no claim or share in that property.

*Kennedy v. De Trafford*¹ and *Ramabai Govind v. Raghunath*², referred to.

ONE Fakirrao Manikrao, a resident of the village of Fursungi in the district of Poona, died on March 12, 1929, leaving him surviving two sons—Baburao (defendant) and Gulabrao (plaintiff)—and his wife Anusuyabai. At the time of Fakirrao's death, the defendant was about 19 years of age and the plaintiff was about 5 years of age. Fakirrao was the village Patil, and after his death the office of Patil devolved upon the defendant. The family was receiving an annual income of Rs. 150 whenever the duties of the office of the Patil were performed by members thereof. Between 1910 and 1920 Fakirrao officiated as the Patil, and between the years 1930 and 1940 the defendant performed the duties of the Patil. Fakirrao was possessed of certain lands and three houses in Fursungi. Some of these lands were mortgaged and sold by Fakirrao. After the death of Fakirrao the defendant assumed management of the joint family and exerted himself with a view to improve the condition of the family. The only ancestral lands which were in the possession of the defendant were a few lands and by exerting himself in these and certain lands which were obtained by him on lease, the defendant was able to accumulate a sufficient amount with the aid of which he redeemed one of the mortgages. In 1937 the defendant purchased a survey number from one Ranu Kule for Rs. 200 and later redeemed another mortgage. Some time about 1941 an income of about Rs. 600 was received by the defendant from orange trees planted by him on some land taken on lease. Thereafter by several transactions of sale and purchase the defendant made a profit of about Rs. 3,000. On July 8, 1943, the defendant purchased from one Anusuya a house at Fursungi for Rs. 1,150. Till the year 1940 the plaintiff was attending school and in 1943 his marriage was performed and Rs. 500 were spent by the defendant for the marriage ceremony. Some time about the end of 1944 there were disputes between the plaintiff and the defendant. It was the case of the defendant that there was an arrangement to partition the joint family properties between the two brothers, that the cattle, ornaments, utensils and the agricultural implements were partitioned between the two brothers and the plaintiff took his share of the ornaments, utensils and the furniture; that the agricultural implements were left with the defendant at Fursungi, and that the immoveable properties of the joint family were not divided because the defendant insisted upon receiving the share payable by the plaintiff for redeeming the ancestral lands which were redeemed by the defendant, as he claimed, at his own expense. On March 31, 1945, a transferee reconveyed the land to the defendant for Rs. 1,050 which was paid by the latter. On August 11, 1945, the defendant executed a rent note for five years in respect of a survey number and agreed to take those lands on lease at an annual rental of Rs. 500. Possession of this land was obtained on April 5, 1946. He also executed a rent note in respect of a survey number and obtained possession thereof on March 6, 1946, to be held on lease at an annual rental of Rs. 300. Thereafter by various transactions he purchased some lands between March 6, 1947, and August 22, 1947. On January 8, 1953, the plaintiff and his mother Anusuyabai commenced the present suit in the Court of the Joint Civil Judge, Senior Division, at Poona, against the defendant for a declaration that they had each a third share in the properties described in the plaint and for separate possession of their shares by metes and bounds. In the alternative, it was claimed that if the Court held that Anusuyabai was not entitled to a share in the property, provision be made for her maintenance and the plaintiff be awarded his share in the properties. It was the case of the plaintiffs that all the properties which were in the possession of the defendant were either ancestral properties or properties acquired with the aid of ancestral properties or properties which were thrown into the common stock or acquired by joint exertions by the parties and the same were accordingly impressed with the character of joint family property and that the plaintiffs had under the Hindu law collectively a 2/3rd share therein and the defendant had the remaining one-third share. The defendant contended inter alia that the properties in which the plaintiffs claimed a share were not joint or ancestral estate, that the properties in his possession were his exclusive properties and that the plaintiffs had no share therein, that he had never blended the properties acquired by him with any joint family or ancestral property in his hand, that in any event there was severance between him and the plaintiffs some time after the year 1944 and that the moveables belonging to the plaintiffs and the defendant were divided but the immoveable properties could not be divided because the plaintiff declined to pay his share of the debts charged upon the properties which were satisfied by the defendant. The trial Judge held that certain lands and houses were joint family properties and certain other lands were not joint family properties. He ordered that in the properties declared to be joint family properties the plaintiffs had a 2/3rd share.

SHAH J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts of the case and holding that there was in fact severance of the joint family status in 1945 between the plaintiffs and the defendants, proceeded.] The content of the presumption is set out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Appalaswami v. Suryanaraynamurti,¹ in the following terms (p. 631):

"...Proof of the existence of a joint family does not lead to the presumption that property held by any member of the family is joint, and the burden rests upon anyone asserting that any item of property is joint to establish the fact. But where it is established that the family possessed some joint property which from its nature and relative value may have formed the nucleus from which the property in question may have been acquired, the burden shifts to the party alleging self-acquisition to establish affirmatively that the property was acquired without the aid of the joint family property."

The presumption applies only to property acquired during the subsistence of the joint family and not thereafter. Mr. Paranjape has not been able to invite our attention to any rule of Hindu law which supports the submission that property which is acquired, after severance of the joint family status must, even if there be no agreement in that behalf, be regarded as acquired for the family. Evidently by the severance of the status effected in the year 1945 the plaintiffs and the defendant became tenants in common of the property held by them. The entire immoveable property of the family, which consisted of the ancestral lands and the subsequent acquisitions till the year 1945, remained after severance with the defendant, and it is admitted by the defendant that he did not maintain separate accounts of the income received from the properties in which the plaintiff had a share, and the properties acquired by him after the partition. The defendant also, it is conceded, dealt with the income derived from his own share and the share of the plaintiffs.

Mr. Paranjpe says that when the defendant continued to receive the plaintiffs' share of the income even after partition, in the ancestral and the joint family properties and mixed up the income belonging to the plaintiffs' share with the income of his own share and acquired properties from time to time, all the properties so acquired must be deemed to be impressed with the character of the fund out of which the properties were acquired, i.e., that the properties belonged to the three parties to the suit as tenants in common. Counsel does not rely in support of this contention upon any agreement express or implied in that behalf. He merely asserts it as a proposition of law that a co-sharer in possession of immoveable property belonging to himself and other sharers is a trustee for the other co-sharers, and when he mixes up the income received by him from property in which he is a co-sharer with his own fund and acquires property with that fund, the property so acquired is impressed with the same tenure in which the other property of which the income is received is held; and in support of this argument Mr. Paranjpe relies upon ss. 90, 94 and 95 of the Trusts Act. In our judgment, the argument of Mr. Paranjpe proceeds upon several assumptions which are not warranted. Because the defendant continued to receive the rents and profits of the share of the plaintiffs in the properties which were originally ancestral or joint family properties he did not thereby become a trustee of the rents and profits so received for the plaintiffs. As a co-sharer, it is true, the defendant was and continued to be liable to account for the rents and profits received by him, but the fact that the defendant failed to maintain separate accounts of the income of the plaintiffs' share collected by him did not impress the fund accumulated by him after severance with the character of a fund belonging jointly to the plaintiffs and the defendant: the fund in the hands of the defendant was still a fund of which he was the owner. It was not impressed with any trust in favour of the plaintiffs: and the property acquired with the aid of that fund was the exclusive property of the defendant and the plaintiffs had no claim or share in that property. Mr. Paranjpe also urged that when the income received by the defendant from the properties held by him as a tenant in common with the plaintiffs was blended by the defendant with the other income received by him, the defendant was guilty of conversion and the property which was acquired by that conversion must be regarded as impressed with the rights which the plaintiffs had in the property from which the income was received from time to time. But this is the same argument in another guise; and in support of this contention also Mr. Paranjpe has not been able to cite any authority or to advance any substantial argument.

In Kennedy v. De Trafford,² it was observed:

"There is no fiduciary relation between tenants in common of real estate as such. Nor can one tenant in common of real estate by leaving the management of the property in the hands of his co-tenant impose upon him an obligation of a fiduciary character."

A co-sharer collecting rents and profits of the entire property is, therefore, not a trustee for the other co-sharers. It is then difficult to accept the argument of Mr. Paranjpe that when the defendant collected the rents and profits of the immoveable property after the plaintiffs left Fursungi and migrated to Poona, and mixed up the same with the income of his separate acquisitions, the total fund became impressed with a trust in favour of the plaintiffs, and in the property acquired with the aid thereof, the plaintiffs acquired an interest.

Sections 90, 94 and 95 fall in Chap. IX of the Trusts Act, and they deal with certain obligations in the nature of trusts. A person who is not an express trustee, but who holds a position qua another which may be regarded as fiduciary in character, will be subject to certain obligations set out in the various sections of that chapter. Section 90, on which reliance is placed, requires a person who has qualified ownership in any property to hold, for the benefit of all the persons interested, any advantage gained by him by availing himself of his position in derogation of the rights of the other persons interested in the property. In order that s. 90 of the Trusts Act may apply, it must be established that the party against whom relief is sought availed himself of his position, that he gained an advantage by so doing and that the advantage was gained in derogation of the right of the person interested in the property. In other words, a person standing in a fiduciary relation to another cannot by taking advantage of his position gain exclusively for himself an advantage which he could not have obtained but for the position which he occupied. That the defendant when he collected the rents and profits of the property may be liable to account for the same is undisputed. But it is difficult to appreciate when the plaintiffs left the defendant in enjoyment of their share of the property and the latter collected the rents and profits thereof how he may be regarded as having availed himself of his position and having obtained an advantage in derogation of the rights of the plaintiffs which rendered him liable to hold for the benefit of the plaintiffs the property acquired by him out of the fund with which the income of the plaintiff's share was mixed up. In our judgment, s. 90 can have no application to this case.

Section 94 only extends the obligations prescribed by ss. 81 to 93 of the Trusts Act to constructive trusts in cases not otherwise expressly provided for; and does not add substantially to the provisions of s. 90 on which reliance has primarily been placed.

Section 95 of the Trusts Act provides:

"The person holding property in accordance with any of the preceding sections of this Chapter must, so far as may be, perform the same duties, and is subject, so far as may be, to the same liabilities and disabilities, as if he were a trustee of the property for the person for whose benefit he holds it."

If, however, the defendant be not regarded as holding the property in a fiduciary capacity in accordance with any of the preceding sections of Chap. IX, by reason of s. 95 he will not evidently be subject to the liabilities and disabilities of a trustee. There is, in our judgment, nothing in ss. 90, 94 and 95 which expressly or by implication renders the self-acquisition of the defendant liable to be held for the benefit of the plaintiffs merely because the defendant has not maintained a separate account of the income received by him out of the share of the plaintiffs in the property.

But Mr. Paranjpe relied strongly upon a judgment of this Court in Ramabai Govind v. Raghunath,³ in support of his argument. In that case, the Court held that where a trustee had purchased property from a fund, which consisted of the income received from trust property and the other property belonging to the trustee, the property so purchased will be held by the trustee as if the beneficiary had the same right therein as in the trust property. In that case, the person who acquired the property in the view of the Court occupied the position of an express trustee. He had collected the income of the trust property as well as of other properties, and had mixed up the income and out of the fund so collected he had acquired the disputed property. The question then arose whether to the disputed property the beneficiary of the trust could have recourse; and this Court held that the property so acquired must that in all these cases what the Court was called upon to consider was the power of a pleader to enter into a compromise. None of these cases dealt with the question of the power of an advocate to compromise a suit. In *Sourendra Nath Mitra v. or in the mofussil, who derives his general authority for being briefed in a suit on behalf of the client, has implied authority to settle and compromise in all matters connected solely with the action in which he has received a brief (but not in matters merely collateral to the action), unless he has received express instructions to the contrary from his client. This decision of their Lordships goes against the contention advanced before me by Mr. Pendse. Mr. Pendse, however, relies upon the following passage in the judgment of their Lordships (p. 652) :—

“...Their Lordships desire to confine their decision on this point to the case of advocates, whatever their qualifications, admitted as such by the respective appropriate Courts in India, who derived their general authority from being briefed in a suit on behalf of a client. Where the legal representative in Court of a client derives his authority from an express written authority, such as a vakalatnama, different considerations may well arise, and in such cases their Lordships express no opinion as to the existence of any implied authority of the kind in discussion.”

Mr. Pendse argues that these observations of their Lordships would clearly show that where an advocate has filed a vakalatnama, his powers must be deemed to be limited to matters specifically mentioned in the vakalatnama. In other words, his argument is that there is no scope for implying any powers with an advocate who has in his favour a vakalatnama from his client who has engaged him. It seems to me that though their Lordships have stated that other considerations will have to be borne in mind while considering the question as to whether advocates deriving their authority from a vakalatnama have an implied power to enter into a compromise, their Lordships have not expressed any opinion to the effect that where a vakalatnama exists there is no scope for implying in favour of the counsel authority with regard to matters which are not specifically mentioned in the vakalatnama. On the basis of the decision of their Lordships it has been held by a Full Bench of the late High Court of Nagpur in *Jiwibai v. Ramkuwar*⁵, that counsel in India, whether barristers, advocates or pleaders, have inherent powers, both to compromise claims and also to refer disputes in Court to arbitration, without the authority or consent of the client, unless their powers in this behalf have been expressly countermanded, and this is so whether the law requires a written authority to act or to plead or not. It is true that a division bench of the same High Court have in Supaji v. Nagorao,⁶ pointed out that the view taken by the full bench in so far as the scope of the authority of pleaders is concerned is not in accord with the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sarat Kumari v. Amulyadhan and Sourindra v. Heramba. But the division bench has accepted as correct the view of the full bench to the effect that the authority of an advocate to compromise is implicit in the appointment of the advocate unless it is expressly countermanded by the client. I respectfully agree with the view taken in these cases and hold that Mr. Kotwal had an implied authority to enter into a compromise with respect to the matter under appeal.

It must, however, be borne in mind that the implied authority of an advocate to enter into a compromise is limited to the action in which he has been engaged and does not extend to matters which are extraneous to the action or which are merely collateral to it. It is argued by Mr. Pendse that here the compromise is beyond the authority of the counsel because it embraces a matter which is extraneous to the appeal before this Court. It seems to me that this argument is correct and must be accepted. Now, the matter which was before this Court was whether a temporary injunction should issue to the present applicant, i.e. to the respondent in the appeal, or not. No question of depositing any money was at all involved in this appeal. On the other hand, what was sought by the appellants in the appeal, i.e. the present opponents, was a restraint order against the present applicant, prohibiting him from withdrawing certain monies which were in deposit with certain banks. The effect of the order of the High Court passed on the consent accorded by Mr. Kotwal is to make available to opponent No. 1 the amount with respect to which the opponents had sought an injunction. No doubt, under that order the applicant is only required to deposit half of the amount withdrawn by him in Court; but upon the order as it stands, if such amount is deposited by the applicant, the opponents will be at liberty to obtain permission of the Court to withdraw the amount on such terms as the Court may impose on them. In my opinion, what was agreed to by Mr. Kotwal is thus quite extraneous to the matter which was before this Court in the appeal. In *Shoonandan Prasad Singh v. Abdul Fateh Mohammad Reza*⁷, their Lordships of the Privy Council observed as follows (pp. 847-48):—

"But whatever may be the authority of counsel, whether actual or ostensible, it frequently happens that actions are compromised without reference to the implied authority of counsel at all. In these days communication with actual principals is much easier and quicker than in the days when the authority of counsel was first established. In their Lordships' experience both in this country and in India it constantly happens, indeed it may be said, that it more often happens that counsel do not take upon themselves to compromise a case without receiving express authority from their clients for the particular terms: and that this position in each particular case is mutually known between the parties."

Then their Lordships proceeded to observe (p. 848):—

"Their Lordships, however, think it advisable to say that if the facts are as they suppose them to be, viz. that the attack on the plaintiffs' title was not seriously made in the Court of Appeal, counsel's authority could not in any circumstances extend to an agreement to part with the plaintiffs' rights in the property over which the mortgage was claimed which the plaintiffs were seeking to get rid of..."

After making these observations, their Lordships quoted with approval the following observations of Pollock C.B. in *Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford*⁸:—

"The other complaint made in the first count is, that the defendant agreed, on the plaintiff's behalf, that the estate should be given up and a conveyance of it be executed by the plaintiff. As to this, the plaintiff has always contended that the defendant had no authority or power to make such an agreement, that it was not binding, and that the agreement was a nullity; and we are of opinion, that although a counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it, and all that is incident to it—such as withdrawing the record, withdrawing a juror, calling no witnesses, or selecting such as, in his discretion, he thinks ought to be called, and other matters which properly belong to the suit and the management and conduct of the trial—we think he has not, by virtue of his retainer in the suit, any power over matters that are collateral to it. For instance, we think, in an action for a nuisance between the owners of adjoining land,—however desirable it may be that litigation should cease by one of the parties purchasing the property of the other, we think the counsel have no authority to agree to such a sale and bind the parties to the suit without their consent, and certainly not contrary to their instructions, and we think such an agreement would be void."

Here if we substitute "injunction" for "nuisance", the analogy between the case decided by Pollock C.B. and the present case would also be very clear. In my opinion, therefore, though Mr. Kotwal had authority to compromise, his authority did not extend to agreeing on behalf of his client to deposit half the amount in Court.

For these reasons, I allow Civil Application No. 2318 of 1958 and direct that the appeal shall now be heard again. The Rule is made absolute in the civil application.

In view of the fact that the civil application is allowed and the appeal is ordered to be re-heard, the civil revision application (No. 1378 of 1958) has become infructuous and is accordingly dismissed.

There will be no order as to costs.

The appeal from Order will now be heard next week.

the minors accepted delivery on their behalf. Now, the mother had no right to the custody of the minors' property as long as their father was alive. She was not even the de facto guardian. For this reason, she could not accept delivery of possession on their behalf. This is what was held in the Rangoon case referred to above. It was contended by Mr. Karlekar for the donees, who are the appellants before me, that it is not necessary that a gift must be accepted on behalf of the minor donees by their legal guardian and that it would be open to any person to accept a gift on their behalf. He points out that, after all, in accepting delivery of possession of property gifted to a minor, the person who so accepts it does something for the benefit of the minor, and that, therefore, that person must be held to be competent in law to accept such gift. I am afraid I cannot accept this argument, because the law contemplates that delivery of possession is essential for completion of a valid gift; and delivery of possession must ordinarily be made, when the property is capable of actual delivery of possession, to the person who is to take possession of such property or a person duly authorised in law to take delivery of possession on his behalf. In the case of a minor, the only person who can be said to be legally authorised to take possession or accept delivery of possession on behalf of the minor is his legal guardian. A stranger cannot step in and take possession on his behalf. No doubt, in accepting delivery of possession of property gifted to a minor, the person taking possession will be accepting a benefit, but it seems to me that a benefit cannot be forced upon a minor in this way. It can be accepted only by someone who is competent to act on behalf of the minor.

One of the properties gifted is a house in which the grandfather, who is the donor, the donees and their father and mother live. Relying upon the decision of West J. in Shah Ibham v. Shah Suloman,³ Mr. Karlekar contended that in a case of this kind no actual delivery of possession by the donor to the donees was necessary. In the decision just referred to, West J. has observed as follows (pp. 150-151) :—

“...As to the delivery of the house, the principle is to be borne in mind, that when a person is present on the premises proposed to be delivered to him, a declaration of the person previously possessed puts him into possession. He occupies certain part, and this occupation becoming actual possession by the will of the parties, extends to the whole which is in immediate connection with such part where the possession is rightfully, though not where it is wrongfully taken—Ex parte Fletcher. An appropriate intention where two are present on the same premises may put the one out as well as the other into possession without any actual physical departure or formal entry, and effect is to be given, as far as possible, to the purpose of an owner, whose intention to transfer has been unequivocally manifested.”

It is not necessary for me to consider how far this statement of the law can be regarded as correct in view of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Musa Miya v. Kadar Bux, because the decision of West J. is distinguishable. In the case before him, the donee does not appear to have been a minor and was thus a person who could legally form an intention to continue in possession of the property as an owner. Where the donee is a minor, an intention of the kind contemplated by West J. could only be formed on his behalf by his legal guardian.

Then Mr. Karlekar pointed out that the suit property was actually mutated in the name of the minor and, therefore, it must be held that the possession of that property was delivered to him. It may be mentioned that even the record of rights does not show that the minors were in possession through their legal guardian. On the contrary, it shows that they were in possession through their mother. Therefore, even if it is held that possession had been delivered by the donor, it was so delivered, not to the legal guardian, but to the mother of the minors who could not in law be entitled to act for and on behalf of the minors and accept delivery of possession.

That being the position, I hold that the Courts below were right in coming to the conclusion that the deed of gift was not complete and, therefore, not valid in law. Accordingly, I dismiss the appeals with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

Minimum Wages Act (XI of 1948), Secs. 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 20, 26—Constitution of India, Arts. 13, 14—Whether obligatory upon State Government to fix or revise rates of minimum wages according to cost of living index—Section 3(3)(a)(iv) of Act whether discriminatory—Burden of proof where notification issued under statute challenged as being discriminatory—Whether necessary to prove that discrimination intentional and purposeful.

The Minimum Wages Act, 1948, does not cast a statutory obligation upon the State Government to fix or revise the rates of minimum wages strictly according to the cost of living index. Therefore, if the cost of living index in a particular locality is not strictly followed while fixing or revising the rates of minimum wages under s. 3 of the Act, no breach of a statutory duty is committed.

Section 3(3)(a)(iv) of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, is not discriminatory and it, therefore, does not violate the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution of India.

Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer,¹ referred to.

When a notification issued by Government in pursuance of the power conferred upon it by the statute is challenged under art. 14 of the Constitution of India as being discriminatory, the challenger must prove not only that the notification is not based on any classification or that it is based on classification which is not founded upon intelligible differentia having rational relation to the object which the Legislature has sought to attain by enacting the statute, but further that the discrimination is intentional and purposeful.

Article 13(3) of the Constitution of India does not confer upon the order, rule, regulation, notification etc. referred to in cl. VYAS J. This is an application under art. 226 of the Constitution of India by the owners of the Bidi manufacturing concerns of Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits and it raises certain important questions of law.

In the year 1948 the Central Legislature passed an Act, being Act No. XI of 1948, called the Minimum Wages Act. Section 3(1) of the Act empowers the appropriate Government to fix the minimum rates of wages for certain industries which are described as "scheduled industries". Section 3, sub-s. (3), cl. (a), sub-cl. (iv), provides that different minimum rates of wages may be fixed for different localities at the time of fixing or revising the minimum rates of wages. Section 4 lays down what the minimum rates of wages fixed or revised by the appropriate Government under s. 3 may consist of. Section 5, sub-s. (1), cl. (a), provides for the appointment of a Committee to hold enquiries in the matter of fixing minimum rates of wages in respect of any scheduled employment. Section 5, sub-s. (2), empowers the appropriate Government to fix the minimum rates of wages in respect of each scheduled employment, after considering the advice of the Committee appointed under cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 5. Section 6 requires the appropriate Government to appoint Advisory Committees and Sub-committees to inquire into the conditions prevailing in any scheduled employment and to advise the appropriate Government in the matter of revising the rates of wages in respect of such employment. Under s. 7 the appropriate Government is empowered to appoint an Advisory Board for coordinating the work of the Advisory Committees and Sub-committees. Section 8 provides that the Central Government shall appoint a Central Advisory Board for the purpose of advising the Central Government and State Governments in the matters of fixation and revision of minimum rates of wages and other matters under the Act and for coordinating the work of the Advisory Boards. Section 10 lays down that before revising any minimum rates of wages fixed under the Act, the appropriate Government shall consult all the Advisory Committees appointed under s. 6 and the Advisory Board also. Section 20 empowers the appropriate Government to appoint an Authority to hear and decide for any specified area all claims arising out of payment of less than the minimum rates of wages to employees employed or paid in that area. Sub-section (2) of s. 20 provides that where an employee is paid less than the minimum rates of wages fixed for his class of work under the Act, the employee himself, or any legal practitioner or any official of a registered trade union authorised in writing to act on his behalf, or any inspector, or any person acting with the permission of the Authority appointed under sub-s. (1), may apply to such Authority for a direction under sub-s. (3) of s. 20. Then, there is s. 26, sub-s. (2A) whereof provides:

"The appropriate Government may, if it is of opinion that, having regard to the terms and conditions of service applicable to any class of employees in a scheduled employment generally or in a scheduled employment in a local area, it is not necessary to fix minimum wages in respect of such employees of that class as are in receipt of wages exceeding such limit as may be prescribed in this behalf, direct, by notification in the Official Gazette and subject to such conditions, if any, as it may think fit to impose, that the provisions of this Act or any of them shall not apply in relation to such employees."

In the year 1952 the State of Bombay issued a notification No. 146/48-XIII under s. 5, sub-s. (2), of the Act (the Minimum Wages Act) fixing the rates of minimum wages with effect from March 31, 1952, for workers employed in certain Bidi manufacturing concerns. Under that notification the districts of Thana, Ahmednagar, East Khandesh, West Khandesh, Nasik, Poona, Satara North, Kolaba and Dangs comprised Zone No. III; the districts of Banaskantha, Panchmahala, Broach and Surat comprised Zone No. II; and the districts of Dharwar, Bijapur, Belgaum, Kanara, Ratnagiri, Sholapur, Satara South and Kolhapur comprised Zone No. IV. The notification provided that in the districts comprised in Zone No. III the minimum rate of wages to be paid to employees working in the Bidi manufacturing concerns in that Zone was Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis.

It may be noted at this stage that the towns of Akola, Sangamner and places situated within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits fell within the District of Ahmednagar. Sinnar is a town situated in the District of Nasik. Jalgaon is a town situated in the District of East Khandesh and Dhulia is a town situated in the District of West Khandesh.

On August 29, 1953, the State of Bombay issued a notification under s. 26, sub-s. (2), of the Act declaring that the Act shall not apply during from August 30, 1953, to December 31, 1953, to any locality in Bombay except certain specified localities and the localities so excluded the towns of Sangamner and Akola. By a notification dated 1953, the above exemption from the provisions of the Act was extended from January 1, 1954, to March 31, 1954. By a further notification dated 1954, once again the said exemption was extended from April 1, 1954, to September 30, 1954. As I have mentioned above, the exemption from the operation of the Act, which was originally declared by the notification dated August 29, 1953, did not apply to certain areas, including the towns of Sangamner and Akola. By a further notification dated September 1, 1954, issued under sub-s. (2) of s. 26, the said exemption was still further extended from October 1, 1954, to December 31, 1954. Again, this exemption was extended by a similar notification from January 1, 1955, to March 31, 1955. By a notification dated March 31, 1955, the State Government extended the above exemption from April 1, 1955, to June 30, 1955. By a notification dated June 30, 1955, issued under sub-s. (2) of s. 26, the Government of Bombay directed that for a period of three months from July 1, 1955, the provisions of the Act shall not apply to any tobacco manufactory in Sangamner and Akola and in 7 miles of their respective municipal limits also. It would thus follow that till June 30, 1955, the provisions of the Act applied to the towns of Sangamner and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits although they did not apply to certain other areas and that with effect from July 1, 1955, the Act ceased to apply even to the towns of Akola and places within 7 miles of their municipal limits. This exemption from the application of the Act was extended from time to time by notifications dated December 31, 1956. However, in the meantime, on August 22, 1956, the Government of Bombay issued a notification No. 2438/48-J cancelling the exemption with effect from September 1, 1956, so far as Sangamner, Akola and 7 miles of their municipal limits were concerned.

During the period from March 31, 1952, to June 30, 1955, a period during which the Act applied to Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits, the State Government issued a notification on August 1, 1955, revising the minimum rates of wages. As a result of this notification, the minimum rates of wages in Sinnar, Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits were raised. In Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits, the rate was raised from Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis to Rs. 2-4-0 for thousand Bidis. So far as the rate in the town of Sinnar was concerned, it was raised from Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis to Rs. 2-4-0 for thousand Bidis. It may be noted that in the case of East Khandesh and West Khandesh, the rate of minimum wages was reduced from Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis to Rs. 1-8-0 for thousand Bidis. So far as the cities of Poona and Sholapur were concerned, the rate of minimum wages was kept constant. In Poona it remained at Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis and in Sholapur it continued to remain at Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis.

Taking advantage of the above position, the Bidi workers at Sangamner, Akola and at various places situated within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits started demanding wages at the revised rates. These claims under s. 20 of the Act before the Authority under the Act. of 1947, of the Bidi manufacturing concerns resisted the claims of the workers on various grounds. One of the contentions put forward by the workers was that complicated questions of law under the Constitution of India were involved in the determination of the claims of the employees and, therefore, the Authority should submit the cases to the High Court for a decision of the questions under the Constitution. The Authority, however, did not consent to accede to the prayer of the employers and proceeded to hear the claims of the workers. On November 6, 1957, the Authority gave his decision in one of the Miscellaneous Applications, namely, Miscellaneous Application No. 65 of 1956, and he held that the Bidi workers were not entitled to receive wages at the revised rates for the period September 1, 1956, to December 31, 1956. But the Authority further declared that with effect from January 1, 1957, onwards the Bidi workers would be entitled to receive wages at the rates revised under the notification dated April 19, 1955. It is from this decision of the Authority that both the parties have filed the various applications. The present application (No. 67 of 1958) is filed by the owners of the Bidi manufacturing concerns of Sangamner, Akola and places situated within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits. As I have mentioned above, both the parties, namely, the owners of the Bidi manufacturing concerns and the employees working in those concerns have felt dissatisfied with the decision of the Authority. The employers contend that the Authority erred in granting a declaration that the Bidi workers in Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits were entitled to the wages of Rs. 2-2-0 for thousand Bidis from January 1, 1957. The Bidi workers, on the other hand, contend that they should have been granted wages at the rate of Rs. 2-2-0 for thousand Bidis for the period from September 1, 1956, to December 31, 1956, also.

Now, the learned advocate Mr. Kotwal for the petitioners has pressed several contentions before us in this application. His first contention is that the procedure requisite under the Minimum Wages Act was not followed by the State Government before revising the rates of minimum wages payable to the Bidi workers, that no sufficient thought was given by Government to the diminishing cost of living index number in the localities concerned and that the revision of the rates of minimum wages was done in a manner which was arbitrary, capricious and against the rules of natural justice. Mr. Kotwal has made this contention in this way: He says that when the rates of minimum wages were originally fixed by a notification dated March 31, 1952, and when various Zones were created for that purpose, Jalgaon and Ahmednagar were placed in the same Zone, being Zone No. III. Akola and Sangamner are towns situated in the district of Ahmednagar. Mr. Kotwal says that the cost of living index number, so far as the town of Jalgaon in the East Khandesh district was concerned, went down substantially in the years 1954 and 1955. The district of East Khandesh and the district of Ahmednagar were grouped together in the same Zone in the year 1952, the basis of the grouping being the similarity of conditions regarding the cost of living. The district of Nasik was also included in the same Zone in the year 1952. As the cost of living index number went down in Jalgaon, says Mr. Kotwal, it must presumably have gone down in Ahmednagar district as well. As between Jalgaon and Ahmednagar, the former being a much more industrialised place, the living must have been more expensive there than in the places in the Ahmednagar district, and yet the revised rates of minimum wages in Jalgaon were lower than in Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits. The rate of minimum wages as originally fixed by the notification, dated March 31, 1952, for Nasik, Jalgaon, Sinnar, Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of the respective municipal limits of Sangamner and Akola was Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis. The revised rate for Nasik was increased to Rs. 2-4-0 for thousand Bidis from Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis. The revised rate for Sinnar, Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of the respective municipal limits of Sangamner and Akola was increased from Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis to Rs. 2-2-0 for thousand Bidis. The revised rate for Jalgaon, on the other hand, was reduced from Rs. 2 for thousand Bidis to Rs. 1-10-0 for thousand Bidis. Thus, says Mr. Kotwal, the rate of minimum wages payable to Bidi workers in the localities where the living was cheaper was increased and it was reduced in places where the living was more expensive. Such a result, Mr. Kotwal says, would not have occurred if proper procedure under the Act had been followed by the State Government at the time of the revision of the rates.

Mr. Kotwal's submission rests on the exaggerated importance attached by him to the cost of living index number in the various places. It is a fallacy to say that if the cost of living index number in one place is higher than that in another, the living is more expensive in the former place than in the latter. Cost of living indices are family baskets containing varying quantities of variable factors, such as, needs of the people concerned, their standards of living, the quality of goods available to them for consumption, transport charges, etc. We do not think it could be seriously disputed that an index number of the cost of living is really the ratio that the current cost of fixed collection of goods and services bears to the cost of the same collection of goods and services during a based period. One has to keep before him the family basket with contents varying in quantity as well as in quality. The cost of living index over a period of years is a measure of the variations in the prices of identical family baskets. We cannot compare the index for two different places, because the contents and size of the baskets in two places may be different, as, for example, in Bombay the basket may contain 28 items of food, whereas in Ahmednagar it may contain only 14 items of food. It would, therefore, not be entirely safe to rely exclusively upon the test of the cost of living index number while determining the question whether the rates of minimum wages fixed or revised were arbitrarily or properly fixed or revised.

It may be noted at this stage—and this is important—that the Minimum Wages Act does not cast a statutory obligation upon the State Government to fix or revise the rates of minimum wages strictly according to the cost of living index. Therefore, if the cost of living index in a particular locality is not strictly followed while fixing or revising the rates of minimum wages, there is no breach of a statutory duty committed. Section 4, sub-s. (1), merely provides that a minimum rate of wages fixed or revised by the appropriate Government under s. 3 may consist of any one of the three alternative methods. The first and the third methods in which there is a reference to the cost of living index are not obligatory. The State Government may adopt them or may not. Of course, if the State Government does adopt these methods, the element of the cost of living index may to a certain extent influence the rate. In the present case, however, there is nothing to show what method was adopted by the State Government for revising the rates of minimum wages by the notification, dated April 19, 1955. Indeed, we do not know what particular method was adopted by the State Government when the rates were originally fixed in 1952. If the method adopted by the State Government was the one provided by cl. (ii) of sub-s. (1) of s. 4, the cost of living index would not play the part which Mr. Kotwal says it should in the fixing or revising the rates of minimum wages. I have referred to this aspect of the case in some detail, because Mr. Kotwal has laid an emphasis, which appears to us to be an exaggerated emphasis, on the cost of living index number in the context of the question of fixing or revising the rates of minimum wages under the Act.

Next Mr. Kotwal says that the revision of the minimum rates of wages was done by the State Government arbitrarily and in a manner against the rules of natural justice. We have considered this contention carefully, but have felt ourselves unable to accept it. As I have stated above, s. 5, sub-s. (1), of the Act provides for the appointment of a Committee to hold an enquiry and advise the appropriate Government in the matter of fixing the minimum rates of wages. Section 6 provides for the appointment of Advisory Committees and Sub-Committees to enquire into the conditions prevailing in any scheduled employment and to advise the appropriate Government in the matter of the revision of the rates of minimum wages. It is not disputed that in this case an Advisory Committee was appointed by the State Government under s. 6. The said Committee was consulted by the State Government. It is also not disputed that this Committee made requisite enquiry into the conditions prevailing in the Bidi making industry in the District of Ahmednagar wherein the towns of Akola, Sangamner and the places within 7 miles of their respective municipal limits are situated. This Committee, after due deliberations, made a report to the State Government, i.e., the Government of Bombay. After the report of the Advisory Committee was received by the Government of Bombay, the Government appointed an Advisory Board under s. 7 of the Act. It appears that the report submitted to the Government by the Advisory Committee was not a unanimous report. The Advisory Committee consisted of seven members. Three of the members were representatives of the employers, and three others were representatives of the employees. Shri P. S. Bakhle was the Chairman of the Committee. The Government sent the Committee's report to the Advisory Board and the Board, after going carefully into the question of the revision of the rates of minimum wages, made a unanimous report to the Government.

It may be noted at this stage that on June 29, 1954, the Under-Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Development Department, wrote a letter, being letter No. 2438/48-J, to the Chairman of the Advisory Board. Along with this letter the Government forwarded to the Chairman of the Board a copy of the report of the Advisory Committee. In the course of this letter the Government brought it to the notice of the Chairman that the Bidi Manufacturers and Merchants Association of Sholapur had represented to the Government that the rates of wages in the Bidi factories in the neighbouring areas of Hyderabad were unduly low and that the rate of minimum wages at Re. 1-14-0 for thousand Bidis, which was prevailing at Sholapur, would not allow them to compete with the Bidi factories in the Hyderabad area. The Chairman of the Advisory Board was requested by the Government to go into that question and to give to the Government the benefit of the Board's advice on that point. It may be noted—and this is important—that along with this letter, dated June 29, 1954, Government forwarded to the Chairman of the Advisory Board a copy of a letter, dated September 29, 1953, which was received from the Chairman, Nasik-Sinnar-Sangamner Bidi Karkhandar Mandal, Sinnar, on the subject of the revision of minimum rates of wages and the Chairman of the Advisory Board was particularly requested to take into consideration the various suggestions which were made by the Chairman of the above-mentioned Bidi Karkhandar Mandal in the matter of revising the minimum rates of wages.

Not only this, but on July 30, 1954, Shri Joshi, the Secretary of the Advisory Board, wrote letters to the employers in the Bidi industry. In these letters the employers in the Bidi industry were in terms told that the Government had referred the question of revising the rates of minimum wages, which were originally fixed in pursuance of the notification, dated December 27, 1951, to the Advisory Board. The employers were requested to forward their suggestions, if any, to the Advisory Board on or before August 9, 1954. In particular, the employers in the Bidi industry were requested to forward to the Secretary of the Advisory Board certified accounts for the year 1952-53, income-tax statements and sales-tax returns (in support of the case of the employers), details of the price for preparing 1000 Bidis, selling price and wage rate respectively for each year since 1948, the strength of the workers employed by them in the factory as well as on "Khep", etc., etc. The employers were also requested to inform the Secretary of the Advisory Board as to what rate of minimum wages was appropriate in their view. It is, therefore, reasonable to assume that the employers must have made representations to the Advisory Board and must have told the Board what they considered was an appropriate rate of minimum wages payable to the workers in their factories. The Advisory Board must have taken into consideration all the material supplied to them by the employers and the employees. Thereupon the Board made a unanimous recommendation to the appropriate Government. The said unanimous recommendation was the basis upon which the notification, dated April 19, 1955, was issued by the State of Bombay and it was under that notification that the revision of the rates of minimum wages was ordered in Nasik, Sinnar, Sangar and places situated within 7 miles of the respective municipal limits and Akola. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to contend of Mr. Kotwal that the rates of minimum wages were in a manner that was arbitrary and contrary to the rules of natural justice.

The next contention of Mr. Kotwal is that s. 3, sub-s. (3), cl. (a), of the Minimum Wages Act is a discriminatory law. Mr. Kotwal is using the expression "different localities" in sub-cl. (iv), the Legislature conferred an unfettered power upon Government to make a discrimination of the various localities, and he contends that this power in a manner may be abused by the Government. It is contended for the petitioner that the phraseology "different localities" is too wide and vague and may mean a town or a street of a town or even a house in a particular town, and a grievance is made that in the body of the Act no guiding principle has been laid down to throw light as to the proper meaning assigned to the words "different localities."

We have heard Mr. Kotwal at considerable length upon this point and do not see force in this contention. In Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd. v. State of Ajmer,¹⁰ it was contended that the provisions relating to the fixation of minimum wages were unreasonable and arbitrary and that the whole question had been left to the unfettered discretion of the Government. A point was made that the restrictions put by the Act were unreasonable and excessive with regard to a class of employers whose factories might be situated in one locality and who for purely economic reasons might not be able to pay minimum rates of wages, but who might have had no intention to export at all. It was argued in that case that the provisions of the Act in question would have no reasonable relation to the object which the Act sought to achieve. It was held by their Lordships that the restrictions imposed upon freedom of contract by the fixation of minimum rates of wages, though they interfered to some extent with the freedom of trade or business, were justified under art. 19, cl. (1), sub-cl. (g), of the Constitution, were not unconstitutional and that they were being imposed in the interest of the general public with a view to carry out one of the directive principles of the State embodied in art. 43 of the Constitution and were protected by the provisions of cl. (6) of art. 19.

If s. 3, sub-s. (3), cl. (a), sub-cl. (iv), were the only provision of the Act relating to the subject of fixing or revising the minimum rates of wages, it might have been a different matter. But upon examining the scheme of the Act it is clear that adequate safeguards against discrimination are provided by the Act itself. Under s. 5, sub-s. (1), it is obligatory upon the appropriate Government to have recourse to one of the two procedures before fixing the rates of wages and each of these procedures is an adequate safeguard against discrimination. Clause (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 5 provides:

"In fixing minimum rates of wages in respect of any scheduled employment for the first time under this Act, the appropriate Government shall—

(a) appoint a committee to hold enquiries and advise it in this behalf and may also appoint sub-committees for different localities as it may deem expedient to appoint to the committee,..."

It is clear, therefore, that the Committee, which is required to be appointed under cl. (a), is charged with the duty of advising the State Government on the matter of fixing minimum rates of wages in different localities. Under cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 5 Government is required to publish its proposals and to give the information of persons likely to be affected thereby and two months' notice has to be given to enable the persons likely to be affected to make representations against the proposals if they wish to make any. Sub-section (2) requires the Government to consider the advice that may be tendered by the Committee appointed under cl. (a) of sub-s. (1). It also requires ernment to take into consideration such representations as might have been received by it from the persons affected by its proposals. Section 7 requires the appropriate Government to appoint an Advisory Board for the purpose of co-ordinating the work of the Committees, Sub-Committees, Advisory Committees and Advisory Sub-Committees appointed under ss. 5 and 6. Section 10 requires that before revising the rates of minimum wages, the Government shall consult all the Advisory Committees appointed under s. 6 and also the Advisory Board. Section 28 provides that the Central Government may give directions to a State Government as to the carrying into execution of the Act. All these provisions of the Act are to be considered together. Therefore, upon a proper examination of the scheme of the Act, it is clear that under the Act no scope is left for the State Government to make arbitrary discrimination between different localities.

The next point pressed by Mr. Kotwal is that the notification, dated April 19, 1955, was itself discriminatory and, therefore, it infringed the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution. Mr. Kotwal says that while revising the rates of minimum wages by this notification, the rates were increased in some places, reduced in other localities and kept constant in some areas. In Nasik the rate was increased from Rs. 2 to Rs. 2-4-0 for thousand Bidis; in Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of the respective municipal limits of Sangamner and Akola the rate was increased from Rs. 2 to Rs. 2-2-0 for thousand Bidis; in Poona and Sholapur the rate was kept constant at Rs. 2 and Re. 1-14-0 for thousand Bidis respectively; and in East Khandesh and West Khandesh the rate was reduced from Rs. 2 to Re. 1-10-0 for thousand Bidis. The petitioners say that this discrimination, which flowed from the notification dated April 19, 1955, was purposeful and intentional. It would be convenient in this context to set out some of the contents of para. 11 of the petition wherein the petitioners contend:

"The words 'different localities' are so elastic as to be capable of being applied even to different parts of the same village or to different parts of the same lane in the same village. The provisions of section 3, sub-section 3(iv) give the executive ample and unlimited scope for discriminating between industries in one area from those in another merely on the ostensible ground that they are situate in different localities. It leaves the door wide open to a purposeful and intentional discrimination on the part of the executive on political and other important grounds."

To say that the notification, dated April 19, 1955, was discriminatory and that the discrimination was purposeful and intentional is to say that the notification was issued with an "evil eye". Now it is necessary to remember that after the Advisory Committee was appointed by the State Government under s. 6 of the Act and after that Committee made its report, the State Government appointed an Advisory Board. Not only did the State Government forward the report of the Advisory Committee to the Advisory Board, but it also addressed letters to the employers in the Bidi industry asking them to forward to the Advisory Board certified copies of their accounts for the year 1952-53, Income-tax statements and Sales-tax returns in support of their contentions, details of the price for preparing 1000 bidis, selling price and wage rate respectively for each year since 1948, etc., etc. The State Government also forwarded to the Advisory Board a letter received by it from the Chairman of the Nasik-Sinnar-Sangamner Bidi Karkhandar Mandal on the subject of the revision of the rates of minimum wages. After a consideration of all the material which was placed before the Advisory Board by the employers and employees, the Board, consisting, besides the Chairman, of 20 members who were drawn equally from the employers and employees made a unanimous recommendation to the State Government. The Government accepted the said recommendation and made it the basis of the notification, dated April 19, 1955. In other words, the notification issued by the State Government on April 19, 1955, was in terms of the recommendation made unanimously by the Advisory Board consisting of 10 representatives of the employers, 10 representatives of the employees and the Chairman. In these circumstances, the allegation of the petitioners that the notification made purposeful and intentional discrimination appears to be fantastic.

Mr. Kotwal says that the appointment of the Advisory Board in this case was a farce. As I have said, the Advisory Board was constituted of 21 persons, one of whom, Shri Bakhle, was the Chairman. Ten persons represented the employers and ten others represented the employees. Mr. Kotwal contends that only one out of the 10 representatives of the employers was connected with the tobacco industry and only one person out of the employees' representatives had also some connection with the Bidi making industry. 9 out of 10 representatives of the employers and 9 out of 10 representatives of the employees were not connected with the Bidi making industry. They were concerned with different industries, such as oil industry, road construction, building operations, stone breaking, stone crushing, motor transport, tannery, leather manufacturing, salt-pan industry, agriculture etc. They resided in various areas or localities remote from the District of Ahmednagar. In short, Mr. Kotwal says that a large majority of the representatives of the employers and the employees were not connected with the Bidi industry and they did not even belong to any place situated near the District of Ahmednagar. Therefore, says Mr. Kotwal, the appointment of the Advisory Board was merely "an eye wash".

Now, in this connection it is to be borne in mind that s. 7 of the Act does not require that the State Advisory Board should be constituted of the employers and employees belonging to a particular industry. The Central Advisory Board is required to be constituted in such a manner that there has got to be a representative upon it of the employers and employees in the scheduled employment. But that is not the case with the constitution of the State Advisory Board. In our view, the Advisory Board appointed by the State Government was a good Board. It consisted of independent men belonging to different industries and different places and with minds free from predilections and prejudices. To the Board of such independent character requisite material was supplied by the employers in the Bidi industry in response to the letter, dated July 30, 1954, written by the Board's Secretary. This independent body of the representatives of the employers and the employees applied their minds to the said material, considered it carefully and then arrived at certain unanimous conclusions upon which the notification, dated April 19, 1955, was based. In these circumstances we find ourselves unable to accept Mr. Kotwal's contention that the notification proceeded upon a purposeful and intentional discrimination.

Mr. Kotwal has referred us to the case of Chiranjitlal Chowdhuri v. The Union of India.¹¹ In this case the Governor General of India, finding that on account of mis-management and neglect a situation had arisen in the affairs of the Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company Limited which had prejudicially affected the production of an essential commodity and had caused serious unemployment amongst a certain section of the community and that an emergency had thereby arisen which rendered it necessary to make special provision for the proper management and administration of the said company, promulgated an Ordinance, which was subsequently re-enacted in the form of a legislation called the Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1950. The result of the promulgation of the Ordinance was that the Managing Agents of the said company were dismissed, the Directors holding office vacated their office automatically, the Government was authorised to appoint new Directors, the rights of the shareholders of the company were curtailed in the matter of voting, appointment of Directors, passing of resolutions and applying for winding up, and power was also given to the Government to modify the Indian Companies Act in its application to the company. In accordance with the provisions of the Ordinance new Directors were appointed by Government. A share-holder made an application under art. 32 of the Constitution for a declaration that the Act was void and for enforcement of his fundamental rights by a writ of mandamus against the Central Government, the Government of Bombay and the Directors restraining them from exercising any powers under the Act and from interfering with the management of the company on the ground that the Act was not within the legislative competence of the Parliament and infringed his fundamental rights guaranteed by arts. 19(1)(f), 31 and 14 of the Constitution and was consequently void under art. 13. It was held by their Lordships of the Supreme Court that the presumption was always in favour of the constitutionality of an enactment, since it must be assumed that the Legislature understood and correctly appreciated the needs of its own people, that its laws were directed to problems made manifest by experience and that its discriminations were based upon adequate grounds. It was also held that the above presumption regarding constitutionality of an enactment might be rebutted in certain cases by showing that on the face of the statute there was no classification at all or none on the basis of any apparent difference specially peculiar to any particular individual or class and not applicable to any other person or class of persons. Now, in the present case, on the face of the notification there is a classification. It is ex facie clear that the Government of Bombay had appointed an Advisory Committee for the purpose of enquiring into the conditions of employment in the Bidi making industry, that the said Committee had made its report as to those conditions, that the Government had also consulted the Advisory Board and that it was after considering the advice of the Committee and the Board that the rates of minimum wages were revised. It is, therefore, clear on the face of the notification that the conditions of employment in the Bidi making industry must have been found different in the different areas. As I have mentioned in the earlier part of this judgment, the Advisory Board had called upon the employers to submit certain details, such as the accounts, the income-tax statements, the sales-tax returns in respect of the industry, the selling price and the wage rate since 1948, the strength of the employees in the industry etc. The advice tendered by the Board to the Government must have been in the light of the above material. It is but reasonable to assume that the examination of the above material must have revealed that the employers in the various areas mentioned in the notification had varying capacity to pay wages to their employees, that their profits from the industry were unequal, that the industrial competition which they had to encounter from the industry in the neighbouring areas was not uniform, that the quantum of production, conditions of labour and transport facilities in different places were different etc., etc. It is, therefore, apparent that the notification proceeded upon a classification that was based upon differences, peculiar to the particular employers and employees. These differences or distinctions were real and substantial and they had a reasonable relation to the object which the Legislature sought to attain by enacting the Act.

The learned advocate Mr. Kotwal for the petitioners-employers contends that it is for the State of Bombay to show that the notification, dated April 19, 1955, was not discriminatory. The learned Advocate General, on the other hand, says that the onus to show that the notification is discriminatory is upon the petitioners. In Chiranjitlal Chowdhuri v. The Union of India, it was held that the burden was upon him who attacked the constitutionality of an enactment to show that there had been a clear transgression of constitutional principles. Their Lordships held in that case that the petitioner had not been able to rebut the presumption which was in favour of the constitutionality of the enactment which was challenged. In *Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Tendolkar J.*¹² also, where a certain notification issued by the Government was challenged, it was observed by their Lordships of the Supreme Court that it was to be expected—and, until the contrary was proved, it was to be presumed—that the Government, which was responsible to the Parliament, would act honestly, properly and in conformity with the policy and principle laid down by the Parliament. The learned Advocate General is therefore right in the submission made by him that the presumption is in favour of the constitutionality of the notification issued by the State Government under s. 10, sub-s. (2). It is true that in The State of Rajasthan v. Rao Manohar Singhji,¹³ where the jagirdars of only a particular area of Rajasthan were subjected to a disability in that the revenue which till then was collected by them was required thenceforward to be collected by and paid to Government, it was held by the Supreme Court that the classification might have been justified if the State had shown that it was based upon a substantial distinction, namely, that the jagirdars of the area subjected to the disability were in some way different to those of the other areas of Rajasthan who were not similarly situated. It is to be seen however that in that case s. 8A of the Act which was introduced by Ordinance X of 1949 was ex facie discriminatory. The section read:

"Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions, it is hereby enacted that the revenue which was heretofore collected by Jagirdars shall henceforward be collected by and paid to the Government; the Government will after deducting the collection and other expenses pay it to the Jagirdar concerned."

The discrimination between the Jagirdars of one area of Rajasthan and those of the other areas was apparent on the face of the enactment itself. In the case of the present notification whose constitutionality is challenged, namely, the notification, dated April 19, 1955, issued under s. 10, sub-s. (2), by the State of Bombay, it is clear that on the face of it there was classification which, as I have stated in this judgment, was based upon distinctions which were real and substantial and which bore a reasonable relation to the object which was sought to be attained by enacting the Minimum Wages Act. That being so, the decision in The State of Rajasthan v. Rao Manohar Singhji would not assist the petitioners. In *Ram Prasad Narayan Sahi v. The State of Bihar*¹⁴ their Lordships stated that where on the face of a statute there was no classification at all and where no attempt had been made to select an individual or a group with reference to any differentiating attribute peculiar to that individual or group and not possessed by others, the presumption in favour of the constitutionality of the enactment was of little or no assistance to the State. This case also would not help the petitioners, since the notification in the present case proceeded upon a classification. Therefore, so far as the question of onus of proof is concerned, we must accept the contention pressed before us by the learned Advocate General that it is for the petitioners to show that the notification dated April 19, 1955, was discriminatory and therefore offended against the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution. This the petitioners have failed to show. Beyond merely alleging that there was no "plausible and reasonable" basis for laying down different rates for the different localities and that there was no plausible or reasonable basis for laying down higher rates for places where the cost of living was lower and lower rates at places where the cost of living was higher and that there was no justification for Government to make a distinction against Sinnar, Sangamner, Akola and places situated within 7 miles of Akola and Sangamner, they have said nothing. It is clear upon a proper construction of the notification that this is a case where persons differently circumstanced were differently treated. The essence of a discriminatory notification would lie in differently treating persons who were similarly circumstanced. That is not the case with the notification, dated April 19, 1955.

It is settled on authority that when a legislative enactment is challenged as being discriminatory, the challenger must prove that the enactment is not based on any classification at all or that it is based on a classification which is not founded upon any intelligible differentia having a rational relation to the object sought to be attained by the enactment. Ram Prasad Narayan Sahi v.

*The State of Bihar and Budhan Choudhry v. The State of Bihar*¹⁶ are authorities on this point. In the present case, I have already shown that the classification is apparent on the face of the notification and further that the classification was founded on a reasonable differentia distinguishing the cases of employers and employees in Nasik, Sinnar, Sangamner, Akola and places within 7 miles of Sangamner and Akola from those in other areas. There was clearly a nexus between the said differentia and the object of the Act, viz. the revision of the rates of minimum wages. When a notification issued by Government in pursuance of the power conferred upon it by the statute is challenged under art. 14 as being discriminatory, the challenger must prove not only that the notification is not based on any classification or that it is based on classification which is not founded upon intelligible differentia having rational relation to the object which the Legislature has sought to attain by enacting the statute, but further that the discrimination is intentional and purposeful.

In Snowden v. Hughes,¹⁶ the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment which are analogous to the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution of India came up for consideration before the Supreme Court of the United States. The learned Judges of the Supreme Court said that it was not every denial of a right conferred by the State law that involved a denial of the equal protection of the law, even though the denial of the right to one person might operate to confer it on another. It was also pointed out that where the executive action purported to be in conformity to the statutory classification, an erroneous or mistaken performance of the statutory duty, although a violation of the statute, was not, without more, a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Their Lordships said that an unlawful administration by the State officers of a State statute fair on its face, resulting in its unequal application to those who were entitled to be treated alike, was not a denial of equal protection, unless there was shown to be present in it an element of intentional or purposeful discrimination. Their Lordships further observed that the Constitution did not assure uniformity of decisions or immunity from merely erroneous action whether by the Courts or the executive agencies of a State, and then they pointed out that:

"the talk in some of the cases about systematic discrimination is only a way of indicating that in order to give rise to a constitutional grievance a departure from a norm must be rooted in design and not derived merely from error or fallible judgment."

Upon the application of the principle laid down in Snowden's case it is clear that although the Advisory Board might have committed an error in making the recommendation which it did make to the State of Bombay and although the State might likewise have committed an error in accepting the unanimous recommendation of the Advisory Board, the notification could not, merely on that ground, be held to be in violation of the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution. In order to come to the conclusion that the notification offended against the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution, the Court must hold that the discrimination was purposeful and intentional discrimination.

The above principle of Snowden's case was approved by the Supreme Court of India in Budhan Choudhry's case, where their Lordships dealt with a contention that discrimination might be brought about either by the Legislature or the Executive or even the Judiciary and that the inhibition of art. 14 extended to all actions of the State denying equal protection of the laws, whether it was the action of any one of the three limbs of the State. Dealing with this contention, their Lordships said (p. 1054):

"...It has, however, to be remembered that, in the language of Frankfurter, J., in Snowden v. Hughes, 'the Constitution does not assure uniformity of decisions or immunity from merely erroneous action, whether by the Courts or the executive agencies of a State.' The judicial decision must of necessity depend on the facts and circumstances of each particular case and what may superficially appear to be an unequal application of the law may not necessarily amount to a denial of equal protection unless there is shown to be present in it an element of intentional and purposeful discrimination."

It is clear, therefore, that although ostensibly it might appear that tobacco dealers in the different localities referred to in the notification were unequally treated, that by itself would not amount to a denial of equal protection of the laws unless it was further shown that in the notification there was an element of purposeful and intentional discrimination. A point which I wish to emphasise is that the principle of Snowden,¹⁷ the gist of infringement of the Fourteenth Amendment, which is an article 14 of the Constitution, lay in purposeful and intentional discrimination. This was approved by the Supreme Court of India in Budhan Choudhry.

This principle would by implication appear to have been reiterated by the Supreme Court in Ram Krishna Dalmia's case wherein their Lordships dealing with a notification of the Government of India regarding the Commission of Inquiry, observed (p. 207):

"...We feel sure, however, that if this law (meaning thereby the notification by the Government regarding the Commission of Inquiry) is administered by the Government 'with an evil eye and an unequal hand' or for an oblique or unwarranted purpose the arms of this Court will be long enough to reach it and to strike down with a heavy hand."

It is implicit in these observations that their Lordships took the view that in order to hold that the notification issued by the Government about the Commission of Inquiry was in violation of article 14 of the Constitution, it was necessary to hold that there was purposeful and intentional discrimination made by the said notification.
